TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH,
BY THE GRACE OF GOD OF ENGLAND,

VNDER hope of your highneſſe gratious and accuſtomed fauor, I haue preſumed to preſent here vnto your Maieſtie, Plutarkes liues tranſlated, as a booke fit to be protected by your highneſſe, and meete to be ſet forth in Engliſh. For who is fitter to giue countenance to ſo many great ſtates, than ſuch an high and mightie Princeſſe? who is fitter to reuiue the dead memorie of their fame, than ſhe that beareth the liuely image of their vertues? who is fitter to authorize a worke of ſo great learning and wiſedome, than ſhe whom all do honor as the Muſe of the world? Therefore I humbly beſeech your Maieſtie, to ſuffer the ſimpleneſſe of my tranſlation, to be couered vnder the ampleneſſe of your highneſſe protection. For, moſt gracious Soueraigne, though this booke be no booke for your Maieſties ſelf, who are meeter to be the chiefe ſtorie, than a ſtudent therein, and can better vnderſtand it in Greeke, than any man can make it Engliſh: yet I hope the common ſort of your ſubiects, ſhall not onely profit them ſelues hereby, but alſo be animated to the better ſeruice of your Maieſtie. For among all the profane books that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your highneſſe beſt knowes) that teacheth ſo much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuotion to Princes, as theſe liues of Plutarke do. How many examples ſhall your ſubiectes reade here, of ſeuerall perſons, and whole armies, of noble and baſe, of young and old, that both by ſea and land, at home and abroad, haue ſtrayned their wits, not regarded their ſtates, ventured their perſons, caſt away their liues, not onely for the honor and ſafetie, but alſo for the pleaſure of their Princes?

Then well may the Readers thinke, if they haue done this for heathen kings, what ſhould we doe for Chriſtian Princes? If they haue done this for glorie, what ſhould we do for religion? If they haue done this without hope of heauen, what ſhould we do that looke for immortalitie? And ſo adding the encouragement of theſe examples, to the forwardneſſe of their owne diſpoſitions: what ſeruice is there in warre, what honor in peace, which they will not be readie to do, for their worthie Queene?

And therfore that your highnes may giue grace to the booke, and the booke may do his ſeruice to your Maieſtie: I haue tranſlated it out of French, and do here moſt humbly preſent the ſame vnto your highneſſe, beſeeching your Maieſtie with all humilitie, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardon the errors of your moſt humble and obedient ſubiect and ſeruant, who prayeth God long to multiply all graces and bleſſings vpon your Maieſtie. VVritten the 16. day of Ianuarie. 1579.

To the Reader.

THE profit of ſtories, and the praiſe of the Author, are ſufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epiſtle to the Reader: ſo that I ſhall not neede to make many words therof. And indeed if you will ſupply the defects of this tranſlation, with your owne diligence and good vnderſtanding: you ſhall not neede to truſt him, you may proue your ſelues, that there is no prophane ſtudie better then Plutarke. All other learning is priuate, fitter for Vniuerſities then cities, fuller of contemplation than experience, more commendable in ſtudents themſelues, than profitable vnto others. Whereas ſtories are fit for euery place, reach to all perſons, ſerue for all times, teach the liuing, reuiue the dead, ſo farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to ſee learning in noble mens liues, than to reade it in Philoſophers writings. Now for the Author, I will not denie but loue may deceiue me, for I muſt needes loue him with whom I haue taken ſo much paine: but I beleeue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitableſt ſtorie of all Authors. For all other were faine to take their matter, as the fortune of the countreys whereof they wrote fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath choſen the ſpeciall actes of the beſt perſons, of the famouſeſt nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your ſelues. My onely purpoſe is to deſire you to excuſe the faults of my tranſlation, with your owne gentleneſſe, and with the opinion of my diligence and good intent. And ſo I wiſh you all the profite of the booke. Fare ye well. The foure and twentie day of Ianuarie. 1579.

Amiot to the Readers.

THe reading of bookes which bring but a vaine and vnprofitable pleaſure to the reader, is iuſtly miſliked of wiſe and graue men. Againe, the reading of ſuch as doe but only bring profit, and make the reader to be in loue therwith, and doe not eaſe the paine of the reading by ſome pleaſantnes in the ſame: doe ſeeme ſomewhat harshe to diuerſe delicate wits, that cannot tary long vpon them. But ſuch bookes as yeeld pleaſure & profit, and doe both delight and teach, haue all that a man can deſire why they should be vniuerſally liked and allowed of all ſorts of men, according to the common ſaying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight,
Doth winne the price in euery poynt aright.

Either of theſe yeeld his effect the better, by reaſon the one runneth with the other, profiting the more becauſe of the delight, and delighting the more becauſe of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is moſt proper to the reading of ſtories, to haue pleaſure and profit matched together, which kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this wiſe arme in arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or inuention of man. In reſpect whereof it may be reaſonably auowed, that men are more beholding to ſuch good wittes, as by their graue and wiſe writing haue deſerued the name of Hiſtoriographers, then they are to any other kind of writers: becauſe an hiſtorie is an orderly regiſter of notable things ſayd, done, or happened in times paſt, to maintaine the continuall remēbrance of them, and to ſerue for the inſtruction of them to come.

And like as memorie is as a ſtorehouſe of mens conceits and deuiſes, without the which the actions of the other two parts ſhould be vnperfect, and wellneere vnprofitable: ſo may it alſo be ſayed, that an hiſtorie is the very treaſury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and ſayings of men, & the wonderfull aduentures and ſtrange caſes, (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preſerued from the death of forgetfulnes. Hereupon it riſeth that Plato the wiſe ſayeth, that the name of hiſtorie was giuen to this recording of matters, to ſtay the fleeting of our memorie, which otherwiſe would be ſoone loſt, and retaine litle. And we may well perceiue how greatly we be beholding vnto it, if we doe no more but conſider in how horrible darkenes, and in how beaſtlie and peſtilent a quamyre of ignorance we ſhould be plunged: if the remembraunce of all the things that haue bene done, and haue happened before we were borne, were vtterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will ouerpaſſe the excellencie and worthines of the thing it ſelfe, foraſmuch as it is not onely of more antiquitie then any other kinde of writing that euer was in the world, but alſo was vſed among men, before there was any vſe of letters at all: becauſe that men in thoſe daies deliuered in their life times the remembrance of things paſt to their ſucceſſors, in ſongs, which they cauſed their children to learne by hart, from hand to hand, as is to be ſeen yet in our daies by the exāple of the barbarous people that inhabite the newfound landes in the VVeſt, who without anie records of writings, haue had the knowledge of things paſt, welneare eight hundreth yeares afore. Likewiſe I leaue to diſcourſe, that it is the ſureſt, ſafeſt, & durableſt monument that men can leaue of their doings in this world, to cōſecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither picture, nor image of marble, nor arch of triumph, nor Pillar, nor ſumptuous ſepulcher, that can match the durableneſſe of an eloquēt hiſtory, furnished with the properties which it ought to haue. Againe, I mind not to ſtand much vpon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwayes profeſſeth to ſpeake truth, and for that the proper ground thereof is to treate of the greateſt and higheſt things that are done in the world: inſomuch that (to my ſeeming) the great profit thereof is as Horace ſaith, that it is commonly called the mother of troth and vprightneſſe, which commendeth it ſo greatly, as it needeth not elſewhere to ſeeke any authoritie, or ornament of dignitie, but of her very ſelfe. For it is a certaine rule and inſtruction, which by examples paſt, teacheth vs to iudge of things preſent, and to foreſee things to come: ſo as we may know what to like of, and what to follow, what to miſlike, and what to eſchue. It is a picture, which (as it were in a table) ſetteth before our eyes the things worthy of remembrance that haue bene done in old time by mighty nations, noble kings and Princes, wiſe gouernours, valiant Captaines, and perſons renowmed for ſome notable quality, repreſenting vnto vs the maners of ſtrange nations, the lawes and cuſtomes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their conſultations and enterpriſes, the means that they haue vſed to compaſſe thē withall, & their demeaning of them ſelues when they were come to the higheſt, or throwne down to the loweſt degree of ſtate. So as it is not poſsible for any caſe to riſe either in peace or warre, in publike or priuate affaires, but that the perſon which ſhall haue diligently read, well conceiued, and throughly remembred hiſtories, ſhall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counſell whereby to reſolue him ſelfe to take a part, or to giue aduice vnto others, how to chuſe in doubtfull & dangerous caſes that, which may be for their moſt profit, and in time to findout to what point the matter will come if it be well handled: and how to moderate him ſelfe in proſperitie, and how to cheare vp and beare him ſelfe in aduerſitie. Theſe things it doth with much greater grace, efficacie, and ſpeed, than the bookes of morall Philoſophie do: foraſmuch as examples are of more force to moue and inſtruct, than are the arguments and proofes of reaſon, or their preciſe precepts, becauſe examples be the very formes of our deedes, and accompanied with all circumſtances. VVhereas reaſons and demonſtrations are generall, and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into vnderſtanding: and examples tend to the ſhewing of them in practiſe and execution, becauſe they do not only declare what is to be done, but alſo work a deſire to do it, as well in reſpect of a certaine naturall inclination which all men haue to follow examples, as alſo for the beautie of vertue, which is of ſuch power, that wherſoeuer she is ſeene, she maketh her ſelfe to be loued and liked. Againe, it doth things with greater weight and grauitie, than the inuentions and deuiſes of the Poets: becauſe it helpeth not it ſelfe with any other thing than with the plaine truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly inrich things by commending them aboue the ſtarres and their deſeruing, becauſe the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreouer, it doth things with more grace and modeſtie than the ciuill lawes and ordinances do: becauſe it is more grace for a man to teach and inſtruct, than to chaſtiſe or punish. And yet for all this, an hiſtorie alſo hath his maner of punishing the wicked, by the reproch of euerlaſting infamie, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance, which is a great meane to withdraw them from vice, who otherwiſe would be leudly and wickedly diſpoſed. Likewiſe on the contrarie part, the immortall praiſe and glorie wherewith it rewardeth weldoers, is a very liuely and sharpe ſpurre for men of noble courage and gentlemanlike nature, to cauſe them to aduenture vpon all maner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high courage and wiſedome, who for deſire to continue the remembrance of their name, by the ſure and certaine record of of hiſtories, haue willingly yeelded their liues to the ſeruice of the common weale, ſpent their goods, ſuſtained infinit paines both of bodie and mind in defence of the oppreſſed, in making common buildings, in ſtablishing of lawes and gouernments, and in the finding out of artes and ſciences neceſſarie for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithfull regiſtring whereof, the thanke is due to hiſtories. And although true vertue ſeeke no reward of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her ſelfe with the conſcience of her well doing: yet notwithſtanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meete to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their vertuous deeds, ſeeing that honor doth naturally accompany vertue, as the shadow doth the body. For we commonly ſee, not to feele the ſparkes of deſire of honor, is an infallible ſigne of a baſe, vile and cloynish nature: and that ſuch as account it an vnneceſſarie, needleſſe, or vnſeemely thing to be praiſed, are likewiſe no doers of any things worthy of praiſe, but are commonly men of faint courage, whoſe thoughts extend no further than to their liues, whereof alſo they haue no further remembrance, than is before their eyes. But if the counſell of old men be to be greatly eſteemed, becauſe they muſt needes haue ſeene much by reaſon of their long life: and if they that haue trauelled long in ſtrange countries, and haue had the managing of many affaires, and haue gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for ſage, and worthy to haue the reynes of great gouernments put into their hands: how greatly is the reading of hiſtories to be eſteemed, which is able to furnish vs with more examples in one day, than the whole courſe of the longeſt life of any man is able to do? Inſomuch that they which exerciſe them ſelues in reading as they ought to do, although they be but yong, become ſuch in reſpect of vnderſtanding of the affaires of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they neuer haue remoued out of their houſes, yet are they aduertiſed, informed, and ſatisfied of all things in the world, as well as they that haue shortened their liues by innumerable trauels and infinite daungers, in running ouer the whole earth that is inhabited: whereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done and come to paſſe before they were borne, continue ſtill as children, though they be neuer ſo aged, and are but as ſtrangers in their owne natiue countreyes. To be short, it may be truly ſayd, that the reading of hiſtories is the ſchoole of wiſedome, to fashion mens vnderſtanding, by conſidering aduiſedly the ſtate of the world that is paſt, and by marking diligently by what lawes, maners, and diſcipline, Empires, kingdomes and dominions, haue in old time bene ſtablished, and afterward maintained and increaſed: or contrariwiſe changed, diminished, and ouerthrowen. Alſo we reade, that whenſoeuer the right ſage and vertuous Emperour of Rome, Alexander Seuerus, was to conſult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned warres or gouernment: he alwayes called ſuch to counſell, as were reported to be well ſeene in hiſtories. Notwithſtanding I know there are that will ſtand againſt me in this point, and vphold that the reading of hiſtories can ſerue to ſmall purpoſe, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: becauſe skill conſiſteth in action, and is ingendred by the very experience and practiſe of things, when a man doth well marke and throughly beare away the things that he hath ſeene with his eyes, and found true by proofe, according to the ſaying of the ancient Poet Afranius:

My name is Skill, my Syre Experience hight,
And Memorie bred and brought me foorth to light.

VVhich thing was meant likewiſe by the Philoſopher that ſayd, that the hand is the inſtrument of skill. By reaſon whereof it comes to paſſe (ſay they) that ſuch as ſpeake of matters of gouernment and ſtate, but ſpecially of matters of warre by the booke, ſpeake but as booke knights, as the French prouerbe termeth them, after the maner of the Grecians, who call him a booke Pilot, which hath not the ſure and certaine knowledge of the things that he ſpeakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to truſt to the vnderſtanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that conſiſt in the deed doing, where the hand is to be ſet to the worke: no more then the often hearing of men talk and reaſon of painting, or the diſputing vpon colors, without taking of the penſill in hand, can ſtand a man in any ſteed at all to make him a good painter. But on the contrary part, many haue proued wiſe men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Beſides this, they alleage further, that in matters of warre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by meanes whereof the ſlights and policies that are to be learned out of bookes, will ſerue the turne no more than mynes that are blowen vp. According whereunto Cambyſes telleth his ſonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Muſicke the neweſt ſongs are commonly beſt liked of for once, becauſe they were neuer heard afore: So in the warres, thoſe pollicies that neuer were practiſed afore, are thoſe that take beſt ſucceſſe, & commonly haue the beſt effect, becauſe the enemies do leaſt doubt of them. Neuertheleſſe I am not he that will maintaine that a wiſe gouernor of a common weale, or a great Captaine can be made of ſuch a perſon, as hath neuer trauelled out of his ſtudy, and from his bookes: howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieutenant of the Romanes, to make warre againſt king Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the warres, and yet afterward he beſtowed ſo great diligence in the reading of hiſtories, & in conferring vpon euery point with the old Captaines and men of long experience, whom he caried with him, that by the time of his comming into Aſia, where he was in deede to put his matters in execution, he was found to be a very ſufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: in ſo much that by thoſe wayes, cleane contrary to the common order of warre, he diſcomfited two of the moſt puiſſant, and greateſt Princes that were at that time in the Eaſt. For his vnderſtanding was ſo quicke, his care ſo vigilant, and his courage ſo great, that he needed no long trayning, nor groſſe inſtruction by experience. And although I graunt there haue bene diuerſe Gouernours and Captaines, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by long continued experience) haue done goodly and great exploytes: yet can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the giftes of nature with the knowledge of learning, & the reading of hiſtories, they might haue done much greater things, and they might haue become much more perfect. For like as in euery other cunning and skill wherein a man in-

tendeth to excell: ſo alſo to become a perfect & ſufficient perſon to gouerne in peace & warre, there are 3 things of neceſſity required, namely, nature, art, & practiſe. Nature (in the caſe we treate of) muſt furnish vs with a good mother wit, with a body well diſpoſed to endure all maner of trauell, and with a good will to aduance our ſelues: Arte muſt giue vs iudgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wiſe diſcourſes that we haue read & double read in good hiſtories: and practiſe will get vs readines, aſſurednes, & the eaſe how to put things in execution. For though skill be the ruler of doing the deede, yet it is a vertue of the minde which teacheth a man the meane poynt betweene the two faultie extreamities of too much & too litle, wherein the commendation of all doings conſiſteth. And whoſoeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely tryall of experience, and had rather learne it at his owne coſt, than at another mans: he may well be of the number of thoſe that are touched by this auncient prouerbe, which ſayth, Experience is the ſchoolemiſtreſſe of fooles: becauſe mans life is ſo short, and experience is hard and dangerous, ſpecially in matters of warre, wherin (according to the ſaying of Tamachus the Athenian Captaine) a man can not faulte twice, becauſe the faultes are ſo great, that moſt commonly they bring with them the ouerthrow of the ſtate, or loſſe of the liues of thoſe that doe them. Therefore we muſt not tarie for this wit that is wonne by experience, which coſteth ſo deare, and is ſo long in comming, that a man is oft times dead in the ſeeking of it before he haue attained it, ſo as he had neede of a ſecond life to imploy it in, becauſe of the ouerlate comming by it. But we muſt make ſpeede by our diligent and continuall reading of hiſtories both old and new, that we may enioy this happineſſe which the Poet ſpeaketh of:

A happie wight is he that by miſhappes
Of others, doth beware of afterclappes.

By the waye, as concerning thoſe that ſay that paper will beare all things: if there be any that vnworthylie take vppon them the name of Hiſtoriographers, and doe deface the dignitie of the ſtorie for hatred or fauour, by mingling any vntruth with it: that is not the faulte of the hiſtorie, but of the men that are partiall, who doe abuſe that name vnworthylie, to couer and cloake their owne paſſions withall, which thing shall neuer come to paſſe, if the writer of the ſtorie haue the properties that are neceſſarilie required in a ſtorie-writer, as theſe: That he ſet aſide all affection, be voyde of enuie, hatred, and flatterie: that he be a man experienced in the affayres of the world, of good vtteraunce and iudgement, to diſcerne what is to be ſayed and what to be left vnſayed, and what would doe more harme to haue it declared, than doe good to haue it reproued or condemned: foraſmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to ſerue the common weale, and that he is but as a regiſter to ſet downe the iudgementes and definitiue ſentences of goddes Court, whereof ſome are giuen according to the ordinarie courſe and capacitie of our weake naturall reaſon, and other ſome goe according to gods infinite power and incomprehenſible wiſedome, aboue and againſt all diſcourſe of mans vnderſtanding, who being vnable to reach to the bottome of his iudgementes and to finde out the firſt motions and groundes thereof, doe impute the cauſe of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought elſe but a fained deuiſe of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of ſuch brightneſſe, and confounded at the gazing of ſo bottomleſſe a deepe, howbeit, nothing commeth to paſſe nor is done without the leaue of him that is the verie right and truth it ſelfe, with whom nothing is paſte or come, and who knoweth and vnderſtandeth the verie originall cauſes of all neceſſitie. The conſideration whereof teacheth men to humble themſelues vnder his mightie hande by acknowledging that there is one firſt cauſe which ouerruleth nature, whereof it commeth, that neither hardineſſe is allwayes happie, nor wiſedome allwayes ſure of good ſucceſſe. Theſe ſo notable commodities are euerie where accompanied with ſingular delighte, which proceedeth chieflie of diuerſitie and noueltie wherein our nature delighteth and is greatly deſirous of: becauſe wee hauing an earneſt inclination towards our beſt proſperitie and aduancement, it goth on ſtill, ſeeking it in euery thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But foraſmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content it ſelfe vnder the cope of heauen, it is ſoone wearie of the things that it had earneſtly deſired before, and ſo goeth on wandering in the vnskilfullneſſe of her likings whereof she neuer ceaſſeth to make a continuall changing vntill she haue fully ſatisfied her deſires, by attaining to the laſt end, which is to be knit to her chiefe felicity, where is the full perfection of all goodlines and goodnes. This liking of variety cannot be better releeued, than by that which is the finder out and the preſeruer of time, the father of all noueltie, and meſſenger of antiquitie. For if we finde a certaine ſingular pleaſure, in harkening to ſuch as be returned from ſome long voyage, and do report things which they haue ſeene in ſtrange coũtries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the faſhions of liues, differing from ours: and if we be ſometime ſo rauiſhed with delight and pleaſure at the hearing of the talke of ſome wiſe, diſcreete, and well ſpoken olde man, from whoſe mouth there floweth a ſtreame of ſpeech ſweeter than honny, in rehearſing the aduentures which he hath had in his greene & youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath endured, and the perils that he hath ouerpaſſed, ſo as we perceiue not howe the time goeth away: howe much more ought we to be rauiſhed with delight and wondering, to behold the ſtate of mankind, & the true ſucceſſe of things, which antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the ſetting vp of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the riſing and falling of kingdomes, and all things els worthie admiration, & the ſame liuely ſet forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that ſo liuely, as in the very reading of them we feele our mindes to be ſo touched by them, not as though the things were already done and paſt, but as though they were euen then preſently in doing, and we finde our ſelues caried away with gladneſſe & griefe through feare or hope, well neare as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithſtanding we be not in any paine or danger, but onely conceiue in our mindes the aduerſities that other folkes haue endured, our ſelues ſitting ſafe with our contentation and eaſe, according to thoſe verſes of the Poet Lucretius.

It is a pleaſure for to ſit at eaſe
Vpon the land, and ſafely for to ſee
How other folkes are toſſed on the ſeas,
That with the bluſtring windes turmoyled be.
Not that the ſight of others miſeries
Doth any way the honeſt hart delight,
But for becauſe it liketh well our eyes,
To ſee harmes free that on our ſelues might light.

Alſo it is ſeene that the reading of hiſtories doth ſo holde and allure good wits, that diuers times it not onely maketh them to forget all other pleaſures, but alſo ſerueth very fitly to turne away their griefes, and ſometimes alſo to remedie their diſeaſes. As for example, we find it written of Alphonſus king of Naples, that Prince ſo greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wiſedome and goodneſſe, that being ſore ſicke in the city of Capua, when his Phiſicions had ſpent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he ſaw that nothing preuailed: he determined with himſelfe to take no mo medicins, but for his recreation cauſed the ſtorie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deeds of Alexander the great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke ſo wonderfull pleaſure, that nature gathered ſtrength by it, and ouercame the waywardnes of his diſeaſe. VVhereupon hauing ſoone recouered his health, he diſcharged his Phiſitions with ſuch words as theſe: Feaſt me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, ſith they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my health: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could ſo good skill to helpe me to recouer my health. Now if the reading & knowledge of hiſtories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I ſay it is much more for great Princes and Kings, becauſe they haue to do with charges of greateſt weight and difficultie, to be beſt ſtored with giftes and knowledge for the diſcharge of their duties: ſeeing the ground of ſtories is, to treate of all maner of high matters of ſtate, as warres, battels, cities, coũtries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it ſeemeth more fit for them, than for any other kind of degrees of men: becauſe they being bred and brought vp tenderly, and at their eaſe, by reaſon of the great regard and care that is had of their perſons (as meet is for ſo great ſtates to haue) they take not ſo great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth thoſe to take which will learne the noble ancient languages, and the painefull doctrine comprehended in Philoſophie. Againe when they come to mans ſtate, their charge calleth thẽ to deale in great affaires, ſo as there remaineth no excerciſe of wit more conuenient for thẽ, than the reading of hiſtories in their own tongue, which without paine is able to teach them euen with great pleaſure and eaſe, whatſoeuer the painefull workes of the Philſophers concerning the gouernment of common wealthes can ſhewe them, to make them skilfull in the well ruling & gouerning of the people and coũtries that God hath put vn-

der their ſubiection. But the worſt is, that they euer (or for the moſt part) haue ſuch maner of perſons about them as ſeeke nothing els but to pleaſe them by all the wayes they can, and there are verie few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrary part, an hiſtory flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of ſuch as were like them in greatneſſe of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerius (a man renowmed aſwell for his skill in the good gouernment of a common weale, as for his excellent knowledge otherwiſe) counſelled Ptolomy, firſt king of Aegypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he ſhould often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the gouernment of kingdoms, becauſe (ſaid he) thou ſhalt find many things there, which thy ſeruantes and familiar friends dare not tell thee. Moreouer this is another thing, that ſuch great perſonages cannot eaſily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to goe view ſtrange countries as priuate perſons doe: becauſe the iealouſie of their eſtate, and the regard of their dignity, requires that they ſhould neuer be in place where another man might cōmand them. And oftentimes for want of hauing ſeene the countries, and known the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue adventured vpon attempts without good ground: to auoide the which, the inſtruction they may haue by the reading of hiſtories, is one of the eaſieſt & fitteſt remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cauſe then onely this laſt, ſurely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of hiſtories, wherein are written the heroicall deedes of wiſe and valiant men, ſpecially of kings that haue bene before them, the conſideration whereof may cauſe them to be deſirous to become like them, ſpecially which were of ſtately and noble courage: becauſe the ſeedes of Princely vertues that are bred with themſelues, doe then quicken them vp with an emulation towards thoſe that haue bene or are equall in degree with them, aſwell in reſpect of noblenes of blood, as of greatnes of ſtate, ſo as they be loth to giue place to any perſon, and much leſſe can find in their harts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doings. VVhereof innumerable examples might be alleadged, if the thing were not ſo well knowen of it ſelfe, that it were much more againſt reaſon to doubt of it, than needfull to proue it. Therfore a man may truly conclude, that an hiſtorie is the ſchoolemiſtriſſe of Princes, at whoſe hand they may without paine, in way of paſtime, and with ſingular pleaſure learne the moſt part of the things that belong to their office. Now, according to the diuerſitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and maner of writing that it vſeth, it hath ſundry names giuen vnto it: But yet among the reſt there are two chiefe kinds. The one which ſetteth downe mens doings and aduentures at length, is called by the common name of an hiſtorie: the other which declareth their natures, ſayings, & maners is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both do cloze very neare in one, yet doth the one reſpect more the things, and the other the perſons: the one is more common, and the other more priuate: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceed from within: the one the euents, the other the conſultations: betweene the which there is oftentimes great oddes, according to this anſwer of the Perſian Siramnes, to ſuch as maruelled how it came to paſſe, that his deuiſes being ſo politicke had ſo vnhappy ſucceſſe: It is (quoth he) becauſe my deuiſes are wholly frō my own inuention, but the effects of them are in the diſpoſition of fortune & the king. And ſurely among all thoſe that euer haue taken vpon them to write the names of famous men, the chiefe prerogatiue, by the iudgement of ſuch as are cleareſt ſighted, is iuſtly giuen to the Greeke Philoſoper Plutarke, borne in the citie of Chæronea in the country of Bœotia, a nobleman, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they liſt to read them through, who all his life long euen to his olde age, had to deale in affaires of the common weale, as he himſelfe witneſſeth in diuers places, ſpecially in the treatiſe which he intituled, VVhether an olde man ought to meddle with the gouernment of a common weale or not: and who had the hap & honor to be ſchoolmaiſter to the Emperor Traian, as is commonly beleeued, and as is expreſly pretended in a certaine Epiſtle ſet before the Latine tranſlation of his matters of ſtate, (which to ſay the truth) ſeemeth in my iudgment to be ſomewhat ſuſpitious, becauſe I find it not among his works in Greeke, beſides that it ſpeaketh as though the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifeſtly diſproued by the beginning of the book, and by diuers other reaſons. Yet notwithſtanding becauſe me thinks it is ſagely & grauely written, and well beſeeming him: I haue ſet it downe heere in this place. Plutarke vnto ” Traian ſendeth greeting. I know well that the modeſtie of your nature was not deſirous of Soue- ”

„ raigntie, though you haue alwayes indeuored to deſerue it by your honorable conuerſation: by reaſon whereof you haue bene thought ſo much the worthier of it, as you haue bene found the further off from all ambition. And therefore I do now reioyce in your vertue & my fortune, if it be ſo great as to cauſe you to adminiſter that thing with iuſtice, which you haue obtained by deſert. For otherwiſe I am ſure you haue put your ſelfe in hazard of great dangers, and me in perill of ſlaunderous tongues, becauſe that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voice of the people is alwayes wont to caſt the faultes of the ſchollers in the teeth of their ſchoolemaiſters: as for example: Seneca is rayled vpon by ſlanderous tongues, for the faults of his ſcholler Nero: the ſcapes of Quintilians young ſchollers are imputed to Quintilian himſelfe: and Socrates is blamed for being too mild to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you ſhall doe all things well enough, ſo you keepe you as you are. If you firſt ſet your ſelfe in order, and then diſpoſe all other things according to vertue, all things ſhall fall out according to your deſire. I haue ſet you downe the meanes in writing, which you muſt obſerue for the well gouerning of your common weale, and haue ſhewed vnto you of how great force your behauior may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow thoſe things, you haue Plutarke for the director & guider of your life: if not, I proteſt vnto you by this Epiſtle, that your falling into danger to the ouerthrow of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epiſtle witneſſeth plainly that he was the ſchoolemaiſter of Traian, which thing ſeemeth to be auowed by this writing of Suidas: Plutarke being borne in the citie of Chæronea in Bœotia, was in the time of the Emperour Traian, and ſomewhat before. But Traian honored him with the dignity of Conſulship, and commaunded the officers and magiſtrates that were throughout all the country of Illyria, that they ſhould not doe any thing without his counſell and authoritie. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am of opinion, that Traian being ſo wiſe an Emperour, would neuer haue done him ſo great honor, if he had not thought himſelf greatly beholding to him for ſome ſpeciall cauſe. But the thing that maketh me moſt to beleeue it true, is, that the ſame goodneſſe and iuſtice appeared to be naturally imprinted in moſt of Traians ſayings and doings, whereof the patterne and mould (as a man might terme it) is caſt and ſet downe in Plutarkes Morals, ſo as men may perceiue expreſly, that the one could well skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wiſely. For Dion writeth, that among other honors which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree vnto Traian, they gaue him the title of the Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth that euen vnto his time, when a new Emperour came to be receiued of the Senate, among the cries of good hanſell, and the wiſhes of good lucke that were made vnto him, one was: happier be thou than Auguſtus, and better than Traian. Howſoeuer the caſe ſtood, it is very certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes vnto him. But when he had liued a long time at Rome, and was come home againe to his owne houſe, he fell to writing of this excellent worke of Liues, which he calleth Parallelon, as much to ſay, as a coupling or matching together, becauſe he matcheth a Grecian with a Romane, ſetting downe their liues each after other, and comparing them together, as he found any likeneſſe of nature, conditions, or aduentures betwixt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worſer, greater or leſſer than the other: which things he doth with ſo goodly and graue diſcourſe euery where, taken out of the deepeſt and moſt hidden ſecrets of morall and naturall Philoſophy, with ſo ſage precepts & frutefull inſtructions, with ſo effectuall commendation of vertue, and deteſtation of vice, with ſo many goodly allegations of other authors, with ſo many fit compariſons, & with ſo many high inuentions: that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treaſory of all rare & perfect learning, than by any other name. Alſo it is ſayd, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of ſingular learning, and a worthie of the auncient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which ſaw him ſo earneſtly giuen to his ſtudie, that he forgot all other things) what author he had leuereſt to chuſe, if he were at that point that he muſt needes chuſe ſome one to hold him to alone, did aunſwere, that he would chuſe Plutarke: becauſe that if they were all put together, there was no one both ſo profitable, and ſo pleaſant to reade, as he. Soſsius Senecio to whom he dedicateth his worke, was a Senatour of Rome, as witneſſeth Dion, who writeth that the three perſons whom Traian moſt loued and honoured, were Soſsius, Parma, and Celſus, inſomuch that he cauſed images of them to be ſet vp. True it is that he wrote the liues of many other mē, which the ſpitefulnes of the time hath bereft vs of, among which he himſelfe maketh mention of the liues of Scipio Africanus, & Metellus Numidicus.

cus. And I haue read a litle Epiſtle of a ſonne of his, whoſe name is not expreſſed, copied out of an old copie in the Librarie of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, a regiſter of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the couples of liues, he ſetteth downe the liues of Scipio and Epaminondas, and laſtly the liues of Auguſtus Cæſar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But hauing vſed all the diligence that I could in ſearching the chiefe Libraries of Venice, and Rome, I could neuer finde them out. Onely I drewe out certaine diuerſities of readings, and many corrections, by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which haue ſtood me in great ſtead to the vnderſtanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I haue reſtored by coniecture, by the iudgement and helpe of ſuch men of this age, as are of greateſt knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine ſome places vnamended, howbeit very few, becauſe ſome lines were wanting in the originall copies, whereof (to my ſeeming) it was better for me to witneſſe the want by marking it with ſome ſtarre: than to gueſſe at it with all aduenture, or to adde any thing to it. Now finally, if I haue ouerſhot my ſelfe in any thing, as it is verie eaſie to do in ſo hard and long a worke, ſpecially to a man of ſo ſmall abilitie as I am: I beſeech the Readers, to vouchſafe for my diſcharge, to admit the excuſe which the Poet Horace giueth me, where he ſayth:

A man may well be ouerſeene
In workes that long and tedious beene.

Specially ſith that of ſo many good men, and men of ſkill as haue heretofore ſet hand to the tranſlating of it, there was neuer yet any one found that went through with it in any language, at leaſt wiſe that I haue ſeene or heard of: and that ſuch as haue enterpriſed to tranſlate it, ſpecially into Latine, haue euidently witneſſed the hardneſſe thereof, as they may eaſily perceiue which liſt to conferre their tranſlations with mine. Neuertheleſſe if it ſo fortune that men find not the ſpeech of this tranſlation ſo flowing, as they haue found ſome other of mine, that are abrode in mens hands: I beſeech the readers to conſider, that the office of a fit tranſlator, conſiſteth not onely in the faithfull expreſſing of his authors meaning, but alſo in a certaine reſembling and ſhadowing out of the forme of his ſtyle, and the maner of his ſpeaking: vnleſſe he will commit the error of ſome painters, who hauing taken vpon them to draw a man liuely, do paint him long where he ſhould be ſhort, and groſſe where he ſhould be ſlender, and yet ſet out the reſemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harſh or rude ſoeuer my ſpeech be, yet am I ſure that my tranſlation will be much eaſier to my countrimen, than the Greeke copie is, euen to ſuch as are beſt practiſed in the Greeke tongue, by reaſon of Plutarkes peculiar maner of inditing, which is rather ſharpe, learned, and ſhort, than plaine, poliſhed, and eaſie. At the hardeſt, although I haue not compaſſed my matters ſo happily as ye could haue wiſhed and deſired: yet do I hope that your Lordſhips in reading it will hold the parties good will excuſed, which hath taken ſuch paines in doing of it to profit you. And if my labour be ſo happie, as to content you: God be praiſed for it, which hath giuen me the grace to finiſh it.

THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE GREEKES AND ROMAINES, THE MOST OF THEM COMPAred together by that graue learned Philoſopher and Hiſtoriographer PLVTARCH of Chœronea.

Willm Shakspere

Theſeus.

LIKE as the hiſtoriographers which do ſet forth the deſcription of the earth in figure (my friend Soſsius Senecio) are wont to place in the lowermoſt part of their mappes, the farre diſtant regions vnknowne vnto them, and to marke in the margent ſuch like notes and reaſons as theſe: beyond theſe countreyes are nothing but deepe drye ſands without water, full of foule ill fauoured venimous beaſts, or much mudde vnnauigable, or SCYTHIA forſaken for cold, or elſe the ſea froſen with Iſe. Euen ſo in this my hiſtorie, I could ſpeake of ſtrange things and more ancient, and further off from mens memorie. But herein I haue compared the liues of ſome noble men, the one with the other, hauing followed all thoſe times, whereof the monuments remaine yet ſo whole, that men may ſpeake of verie great likelihood, or rather write a very troth. What hath bin written before, is but of ſtrange faynings, and full of monſtrous fables, imagined and deuiſed by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine, and moſt vntrue. Howbeit hauing heretofore ſet foorth the liues of Lycurgus (which eſtabliſhed the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and of king Numa Pompilius, me thought I might with reaſon alſo aſcẽd vnto the time of Romulus, ſithens I was come ſo neere

vnto his time. Wherfore hauing long debated with my ſelfe what Æſchilus the Poet ſayd:

VVhat champion may with ſuch a man compare?
or who (thinke I) ſhalbe againſt him ſet?
VVho is ſo bold? or who is he that dare defend his force, in ſuch encounter met?

Theſeus and Romulus very like.

In the end I reſolued, to compare him which did ſet vp the noble and famous citie of ATHENS, vnto him which founded the glorious and inuincible cittie of ROME. Wherein I would haue wiſhed, that the fables of her antiquity had beene ſet out ſo in our writings, that we might yet haue graced them with ſomē apparance of hiſtoricall narration. But if by chance in ſome places they range a litle to boldly out of the boundes or limites of true apparance, and haue no manner of conformity with any crediblenes of matter: the readers in curteſie muſt needes hold me excuſed, accepting in good part that which may be written, and reported, of things ſo extreamely old and ancient. Now ſurely me thinkes, that Theſeus in many things was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by ſtealth, and out of lawfull matrimony, they were both bruted to be borne of the ſeede of gods.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know.

Pelops King of Peloponneſus.

The wiſdome of Pitheus.

Both were very wiſe, and ſtrong beſides of body. The one of them built ROME, and the other the city of ATHENS, two of the moſt noble cities of the world. The one and the other were rauiſhers of women: and neither the one nor the other could auoid the miſchiefe of quarell and contention with their friends, and to defile themſelues with the bloud of their neareſt kinſemen. Moreouer, they ſay that both the one and the other in the end, did get the hate and ill will of their citizens. At the leaſt if we beleeue thoſe things which are left written, and cary greateſt ſhow of troth, Theſeus of his fathers ſide, was deſcended of the right linage of Erichtheus the great, & of the firſt inhabitants which occupied the countrey of ATTICA, the which ſince were called AVTOCTHONES, as much to ſay, as born of themſelues. For there is no memory, or other mention made, that they came out of any other countrey then that. And of his mothers ſide he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightieſt King of al the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, not ſo much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many in number, he beſtowed them on the greateſt Lords of all the coutrey: his ſonnes alſo, which likewiſe were many, he diſperſed into euery city and free towne, finding meanes to make them gouernours and heads of the ſame. Pitheus, granfather to Theſeus on the mother ſide, was one that founded the litle city of TROEZEN, & was reputed to be one of the beſt learned and wiſeſt men of his time. But the knowledge and wiſedome, which onely carried eſtimation at that time, conſiſted altogether in graue ſentences and morall ſayings. As thoſe are, which wan the Poet Heſiodus ſuch fame for his booke intituled, The works and dayes: in the which is read euen at this preſent, this goodly ſentence, which they father vpon Pitheus.

Thou ſhalt performe, thy promiſe and thy pay:
to hired men, and that without delay.

AEgeus the father of Theſeus.

And this doth Ariſtotle the Philoſopher himſelfe teſtifie: and the Poet Euripides alſo, calling Hippolytus the ſcoller of the holy Pitheus, doth ſufficiently declare of what eſtimation he was. But AEgeus deſiring (as they ſay) to know how he might haue children, went vnto the city of DELPHES to the oracle of Apollo: where, by a Nunne of the temple, this notable prophecie was giuen him for an aunſwer. The which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned againe to ATHENS. And becauſe the words of this prophecy were ſomewhat darke, and hard, he returued by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnto Pitheus. The words of the prophecy were theſe.

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace,
plucke not the tappe out of thy truſty tunne: Before thou do, returne vnto thy place,
in Athens towne, from whence thy race doth runne.

Pitheus vnderſtanding the meaning, perſwaded him, or rather cunningly by ſome deuiſe deceiued him, in ſuch ſort, that he made him to lie with his daughter called AEthra. AEgeus, after he had accompanied with her, knowing that ſhe was Pitheus daughter with whom he had lyen, and douting that he had gotten her with child: left her a ſword and a payre of ſhoes, the which he hidde vnder a great hollow ſtone, the hollownes wherof ſerued iuſt to receiue thoſe things which he layde vnder it, and made no liuing creature priuie to it but her alone, ſtraightly charging her, that if ſhe happened to haue a ſonne, when he were come to mans ſtate, and of ſtrength to remoue the ſtone, and to take thoſe things from vnder it which he left there: that ſhe ſhould then ſende him vnto him by thoſe tokens, as ſecretly as ſhe could, that no body els might know of it. For he did greatly feare the children of one called Pallas, the which lay in wayte and ſpyall by all the meanes they could to kill him, only of deſpight becauſe he had no children, they being fiftie brethren, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. And AEthra within few moneths after was deliuered of a goodly ſonne, the which frō that time was called Theſeus: & as ſome ſay, ſo called, becauſe of the tokens of knowledge his father had layd vnder the ſtone. Yet ſome others write, that it was afterwards at ATHENS when his father knew him, and auowed him for his ſonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie & childhood, he was brought vp in the houſe of his granfather Pitheus, vnder the gouernmēt & teaching of one called Connidas, his ſchoolemaſter: in honor of whom the ATHENIANS to this day doe ſacrifice a weather, the day before the great feaſt of Theſeus, hauing more reaſon to honour the memorie of this gouernour, then of a Silanion and of a Parrhaſius, to whom they doe honour alſo, becauſe they painted and caſt mowldes of the images of Theſeus. Now there was a cuſtome at that time in GRECE, that the yong men after their infancy and growth to mans ſtate, went vnto the citie of DELPHES, to offer part of their haires in the temple of Apollo. Theſeus alſo went thither as other did: and ſome ſay that the place where the ceremonie of this offering was made, hath euer ſince kept the olde name, (and yet continueth) Theſeia. Howbeit he did not ſhaue his head but before onely, as Homer ſayth, like the faſhion of the ABANTES in olde time: and this manner of ſhauing of haires, was called for his ſake, Theſeida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in trothe they were the very firſt that ſhaued them ſelues after this faſhion: neuertheleſſe they learned it not of the ARABIANS as it was thought of ſome, neither did they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS. But becauſe they were warlicke and valiant men, which did ioyne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the worlde were ſkilfulleſt in fight hande to hand, and would keepe their ground: as the Poet Archilochus witneſſeth in theſe verſes.

The Pallantides.

Pallas had fiftie ſonnes.

Why Theſeus was ſo called.

Connidas Theſeus ſchoolemaiſter.

Theſeus maner of ſhauing.

The Abantes.

They vſe no ſlynges in foughten fields to haue,
nor bended bowes: but ſwords and trenchant blades.
For when fierce Mars beginneth for to raue,
in bloudy field: then euery man inuades
His fierceſt foe, and fighteth hand to hand, then doe they deedes, right cruell to recompt.
For in this wiſe, the braue and warlike bande
doe ſhew their force which come from Negrepont.

The cauſe why they were thus ſhauen before, was, for that their enemies ſhould not haue the vauntage to take them by the hayres of the head while they were fighting. And for this ſelfe ſame conſideration, Alexander the great commanded his captaines to cauſe all the MACEDONIANS to ſhaue their beards: becauſe it is the eaſieſt holde (and readieſt for the hand) a man can haue of his enemie in fighting, to hold him faſt by the ſame. But to returne to Theſeus. AEthra his mother had euer vnto that time kept it ſecret from him, who was his true father. And Pitheus alſo had giuen it out abroad, that he was begotten of Neptune, becauſe the TROEZENIANS haue this god in great veneration, and doe worſhip him as patron and protector of their citie, making offerings to him of their firſt fruits: and they haue for the marke and ſtamp of their money, the three picked mace, which is the ſigne of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and luſtines of his youth, and that with the ſtrength of his body he ſhewed a great courage, ioyned with a natural wiſedome, and ſtayednes of wit: then his mother brought him to the place where this great hollow ſtone lay, and telling him truely the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, & gaue him counſell to go by ſea to ATHENS vnto him. Theſeus eaſily lift vp the ſtone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: Howbeit he anſwered plainely, that he would not goe by ſea, notwithſtanding that it was a great deale the ſafer way, and that his mother and grandfather both had inſtantly intreated him, becauſe the way by lande from TROEZEN to ATHENS was very daungerous, all the wayes being beſet by robbers and murderers. For the world at that time brought forth men, which for ſtrongneſſe in their armes, for ſwiftneſſe of feete, and for a generall ſtrength of the whole bodie, did farre paſſe the common force of others, and were neuer wearie for any labour or trauell they tooke in hand. But for all this, they neuer employed theſe gifts of nature to any honeſt or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanouſly to hurt and wrong others: as if all the fruit and profite of their extraordinary ſtrength had conſiſted in crueltie, and violence onely, and to be able to keepe others vnder and in ſubiection, and to force, deſtroy, and ſpoyle all that came to their handes. Thinking that the more part of thoſe which thinke it a ſhame to doe ill, and commende iuſtice, equitie, and humanitie, doe it of faint cowardly hearts, becauſe they dare not wrong others, for feare they ſhoulde receiue wrong themſelues: and therefore, that they which by might could haue vantage ouer others, had nothing to doe with ſuch quiet qualities. Now Hercules, trauelling abroade in the worlde, draue away many of thoſe wicked theeuiſh murderers, and ſome of them he ſlew and put to death, other as he paſſed through thoſe places where they kept, did hide themſelues for feare of him, and gaue place: in ſo much as Hercules, perceiuing they were well tamed and brought low, made no further reckoning to purſue them any more. But after that by fortune he had ſlaine Iphitus with his owne handes, and that hee was paſſed ouer the ſeas into the countrie of LYDIA, where he ſerued Queene Omphale a long time, condemning him ſelfe vnto that voluntarie paine, for the murder he had committed. All the Realme of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and ſecuritie from ſuch kinde of people. Howbeit in GRECE, and all thereabouts, theſe old miſchiefes beganne againe to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before: becauſe there was no man that puniſhed them, nor that durſt take vpon him to deſtroy them. By which occaſion, the way to goe from PELOPONNESVS to ATHENS by lande was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto Theſeus, what manner of theeues there were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all trauellers and wayfaring men, ſought the rather to perſwade him thereby to take his voyage along the ſeas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glory of Hercules noble deedes, had long before ſecretly ſet his heart on fire, ſo that hee made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly hearkened vnto thoſe which would ſeeme to deſcribe him what manner of man he was, but chiefely vnto thoſe which had ſeene him, and beene in his companie, when he had ſayde or done any thing worthy of memorie. For then he did manifeſtly open himſelfe, that he felt the like paſſion in his heart, which Themiſtocles long time afterwardes endured, when he ſaide: that the victorie and triumph of Miltiades would not let him ſleepe. For euen ſo, the wonderfull admiration which Theſeus had of Hercules courage, made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble actes and doings, and in the day time, pricked forwardes with emulation and enuie of his glorie, he determined with himſelfe one day to doe the like, and the rather, becauſe they were neere kinſemen, being coſins remoоued by the mother ſide. For Æthra was the daughter of Pitheus, and Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyſidices, the which was halfe ſiſter to Pitheus, both children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he ſhould be vtterly ſhamed and diſgraced, that Hercules trauelling through the world in that ſort, did ſeeke out thoſe wicked theeues to ridde both ſea and land of them: and that he, farre otherwiſe, ſhould fly occaſion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he ſhould meete on his way. Moreouer, he was of opinion, he ſhould greatly ſhame and diſhonour him, whom fame and common bruite of people reported to be his father: if in ſhunning occaſion to fight, he ſhould conuey himſelfe by ſea, and ſhould carrie to his true father alſo a paire of ſhooes, (to make him knowen of him) and a ſword not yet bathed in bloud. Where he ſhould rather ſeeke cauſe, by manifeſt token of his worthy deedes, to make knowen to the world, worlde, of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was deſcended. With this determination, Theſeus holdeth on his purpoſed iourney, with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himſelfe, and to be reuenged of thoſe which would take vpon them to aſſault him. The firſt therefore whom he ſlewe within the territories of the citie of EPIDAVRVM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber vſed for his ordinarie weapon to carrie a clubbe, and for that cauſe he was commonly ſurnamed Corynetes, that is to ſay, a clubbe carrier. So he firſt ſtrake at Theſeus to make him ſtande: but Theſeus fought ſo luſtely with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was ſo glad, and chiefly for that he had wonne his clubbe, that euer after he caryed it himſelfe about with him, as Hercules did the Lyons ſkinne. And like as this ſpoyle of the Lyon did witneſſe the greatnes of the beaſt which Hercules had ſlaine: euen ſo Theſeus went all about, ſhewing that this clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne handes inuincible. And ſo going on further, in the ſtreightes of PELOPONNESVS he killed another, called Sinnis ſurnamed Pityocamtes, that is to ſay, a wreather or bower of pineapple trees: whom he put to death in that ſelfe cruell manner that Sinnis had ſlaine many other trauellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practiſe or exerciſe: but onely to ſhew, that cleane ſtrength could doe more, then either art or exerciſe. This Sinnis had a goodly faire daughter called Perigouna, which fled away, when ſhe ſawe her father ſlaine: whom he followed and ſought all about. But ſhe had hidden her ſelfe in a groue full of certaine kindes of wilde pricking ruſhes called Stæbe, and wild ſparage, which ſhe ſimply like a childe intreated to hide her, as if they had heard, and had ſenſe to vnderſtande her: promiſing them with an oath, that if they ſaued her from being found, ſhee would neuer cut them downe, nor burne them. But Theſeus finding her, called her, and ſware by his faith he would vſe her gently, and doe her no hurt, nor diſpleaſure at all. Vpon which promiſe ſhe came out of the buſh, and lay with him, by whom ſhee was conceiued of a goodly boy, which was called Menalippus. Afterwardes Theſeus maried her vnto one Deioneus, the ſonne of Euritus the Oechalian. Of this Menalippus, the ſonne of Theſeus, came Ioxus: the which with Ornytus brought men into the Countrie of CARIA, where he built the Citie of IOXIDES. And hereof commeth that old auncient ceremonie, obſerued yet vnto this day by thoſe of IOXIDES, neuer to burne the bryers of wilde ſparage, nor the Stæbe, but they haue them in ſome honour and reuerence. Touching the wild ſauage Sowe of Crommyon, otherwiſe ſurnamed Phæa, that is to ſay, ouergrowen with age: ſhe was not a beaſt to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. Theſeus notwithſtanding taryed for her, and killed her in his iourney, to the ende it ſhould not appeare to the worlde, that all the valiant deedes hee did, were done by compulſion, and of neceſſitie: adding thereto his opinion alſo, that a valiant man ſhould not onely fight with men, to defende him ſelfe from the wicked: but that he ſhould be the firſt, to aſſault and ſlay wilde hurtfull beaſtes. Neuertheleſſe others haue written, that this Phæa was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her bodie, which ſpoyled thoſe that paſſed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where ſhe dwelt: and that ſhe was ſurnamed a Sow, for her beaſtly brutiſh behauiour, and wicked life, for the which in the end ſhe was alſo ſlayne by Theſeus. After her he killed Sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, becauſe he robbed all trauellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others ſay, for that of a cruell, wicked, and ſauage pleaſure, he put forth his feete to thoſe that paſſed by the ſea ſide, and compelled them to waſh them. And then when they thought to ſtowpe to doe it, hee ſtill ſpurned them with his feete, till he thruſt them headlong into the ſea: ſo Theſeus threw him headlong downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, and deſirous (as Simonides ſayth) to ouerthrowe it that had continued by preſcription of time: did maintayne that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked perſon, but rather a purſuer and puniſher of the wicked, and a friend and a kinſeman of the moſt honeſt, and iuſteſt men of GRECE. For there is no man but will confeſſe, that Æacus was the moſt vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychreus the SALAMINIAN is honoured and reuerenced as a god at ATHENS: and there is no man alſo but knoweth, that Peleus and Telamon were men of a ſingular vertue. that this Sciron was the ſonne in lawe of Cychreus, father in law of Æacus, and grandfather of Peleus and of Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the ſayde Sciron, and of his wife Chariclo. Alſo it is not very likely, that ſo many good men would haue had affinitie with ſo naughtie and wicked a man: in taking of him, and giuing him that, which men loue beſt of all things in the worlde. And therefore the Hiſtoriographers ſay, that it was not the firſt time, when Theſeus went vnto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron: but that it was many dayes after, when he tooke the citie of ELEVSIN, which the MEGARIANS helde at that time, where hee deceiued the gouernour of the citie called Diocles, and there he ſlewe Sciron. And theſe be the obiections the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter.

For euen ſo did Hercules ſacrifice Buſiris. So he ſtifled Antheus in wreſtling. So he put Cycrus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus head, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, which continueth yet vnto this daye: for this Termerus did vſe to put them to death in this ſort whom he met: to iolle his head againſt theirs. Thus proceeded Theſeus after this ſelfe manner, puniſhing the wicked in like ſort, iuſtly compelling them to abide the ſame paine and torments, which they before had vniuſtly made others abide.

And ſo he helde on his iourney vntill he came to the riuer of CEPHISVS, where certaine perſons of the houſe of the Phytalides were the firſt which went to meete him, to honour him, and at his requeſt they purified him according to the ceremonies vſed at that time: and afterwardes hauing made a ſacrifice of propitiation vnto their goddes, they made him great cheare in their houſes: and this was the firſt notable entertainement he found in all his iourney. It is ſuppoſed he arriued in the citie of ATHENS, the eight day of the moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius. Hee found the common wealth turmoyled with ſeditions, factions, and diuiſions, and particularly the houſe of AEgeus in very ill termes alſo, becauſe that Medea (being baniſhed out of the citie of CORINTHE) was come to dwell in ATHENS, and remayned with AEgeus, whom ſhe had promiſed by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children.

But when ſhe heard tell that Theſeus was come, before that the good king AEgeus (who was now become old, ſuſpitious, and affrayde of ſedition, by reaſon of the great factions within the citie at that time) knewe what he was, ſhe perſwaded him to poyſon him at a feaſt which they would make him as a ſtraunger that paſſed by. Theſeus fayled not to goe to this prepared feaſt whereunto hee was bidden, but yet thought it not good to diſcloſe him ſelfe. And the rather to giue AEgeus occaſion and meane to know him: when they brought the meate to the borde, he drewe out his ſworde, as though he would haue cut with all, and ſhewed it vnto him.

AEgeus ſeeing it, knewe it ſtraight, and foorthwith ouerthrewe the cuppe with poyſon which was prepared for him: and after he had enquired of him, and asked things, he embraced him as his ſonne. Afterwardes in the common aſſembly of the inhabitants of the citie, he declared, how he auowed him for his ſonne. Then all the people receiued him with exceeding ioy, for the renowne of his valiantneſſe and manhoode. And ſome ſay, that when AEgeus ouerthrew the cuppe, the poyſon which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this preſent a certaine compaſſe incloſed all about within the temple, which is called Delphinium. For euen there in that place, in the olde time, ſtoode the houſe of AEgeus: in witneſſe whereof, they call yet at this preſent time the image of Mercurie (which is on the ſide of the temple looking towardes the riſing of the ſunne) the Mercury gate of AEgeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before ſtoode alwaies in hope to recouer the Realme of ATHENS, at the leaſt after AEgeus death, becauſe he had no children: when they ſaw that Theſeus was knowen, and openly declared for his ſonne and heire, and ſucceſſour to the Realme, they were not able any longer to beare it, ſeeing

ing that not onely AEgeus (who was but the adopted ſonne of Pandion, and nothing at all of the bloud royall of the Erictheides) had vſurped the kingdome ouer them, but that Theſeus alſo ſhould enioy it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both, and deuiding them ſelues into two partes, the one came openly in armes with their father, marching directly towardes the citie: the other lay cloſe in ambuſhe in the village GARGETTVS, meaning to giue charge vppon them in two places at one inſtant. Now they brought with them an Heraulde borne in the towne of AGNVS, called Leos, who bewrayed vnto Theſeus the ſecrete and deuiſe of all their enterpriſe. Theſeus vppon this intelligence went forth, and did ſet on thoſe that lay in ambuſhe, and put them all to the ſword. The other which were in Pallas company vnderſtanding thereof, did breake and diſperſe them ſelues incontinently. And this is the cauſe (as ſome ſay) why thoſe of Pallena doe neuer make affinity nor marriage with thoſe of AGNVS at this day. And that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer ſpeake theſe wordes which are cried euery where elſe through out the whole countrey of ATTICA, Acouete Leos, (which is as much to ſay, as Hearken, O people) they doe ſo extreamely hate this word Leos, for that it was the Heraulds name which wrought them that treaſon. This done, Theſeus who would not liue idlely at home and doe nothing, but deſirous therewithall to gratifie the people, went his way to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which did great miſchiefes to the inhabitants of the countrey of TETRAPOLIS. And hauing taken him aliue, brought him through the city of ATHENS to be ſeene of all the inhabitants. Afterwardes he did ſacrifice him vnto Apollo Delphias. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to haue lodged him, and to haue giuen him good entertainement, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the old time, thoſe townes and villages there aboutes did aſſemble together, and made a common ſacrifice which they called Hecaleſion, in the honour of Iupiter Hecalian, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutiue name, Hecalena: becauſe that when ſhee receiued Theſeus into her houſe, being then but very yong, ſhee made much of him, and called him by many prety made names, as old folkes are wont to call young children. And foraſmuch as ſhee had made a vow to Iupiter to make him a ſolemne ſacrifice, if Theſeus returned ſafe from the enterpriſe he went about, and that ſhe died before his returne: in recompence of the good cheare ſhe had made him, ſhee had that honour done vnto her by Theſeus commaundement, as Philochorus hath written of it. Shortly after this exploite, there came certaine of King Minos ambaſſadours out of CRETA, to aske tribute, being now the third time it was demaunded, which the ATHENIANS payed for this cauſe. Androgeus, the eldeſt ſonne of king Minos, was ſlaine by treaſon within the countrey of ATTICA: for which cauſe Minos purſuing the reuenge of his death, made very hot and ſharpe warres vppon the ATHENIANS, and did them great hurt. But beſides all this, the goddes did ſharpely puniſh and ſcourge all the countrey, aſwell with barrenneſſe and famine, as alſo with plague and other miſchieues, euen to the drying vp of their riuers. The ATHENIANS perceyuing theſe ſore troubles and plagues, ranne to the oracle of Apollo, who aunſwered them that they ſhould appeaſe Minos, and when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrath of the goddes would ceaſe againſt them, and their troubles ſhould haue an end. Whereuppon the ATHENIANS ſent immediatly vnto him, and intreated him for peace: which he graunted them, with condition that they ſhould be bound to ſend him yearely into CRETA, ſeuen young boyes, and as many young girles. Now thus farre, all the Hiſtoriographers doe very well agree: but in the reſt not. And they which ſeeme furtheſt off from the troth, doe declare, that when theſe young boyes were deliuered in CRETA, they cauſed them to be deuoured by the Minotaure within the Laberinth: or elſe that they were ſhut within this Laberinth, wandring vp and downe, and could finde no place to get out, vntill ſuch time as they dyed, euen famiſhed for hunger. And this Minotaure, as Euripides the Poet ſayeth, was

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS doe not confeſſe that, but ſay that this Laberinth was a gayle or priſon, in the which they had no other hurt, ſauing that they which were kept there vnder locke and key, could not flie nor ſtart away: and that Minos had, in the memory of his ſonne Androgeus, inſtituted games and playes of priſe, where he gaue vnto them that wanne the victorie, thoſe young children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time notwithſtanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the priſon of the Laberinth: and that at the firſt games that were kept, one of the Kings captaines called Taurus, who was in beſt credite with his maiſter, wanne the priſe. This Taurus was a churliſhe, and naughty natured man of condition, and very hard and cruell to theſe children of ATHENS. And to verifie the ſame, the Philoſopher Ariſtotle him ſelfe, ſpeaking of the common wealth of the BOTTIEIANS, declareth verie well, that he neuer thought that Minos did at any time cauſe the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but ſayeth, that they poorely toyled in CRETA, euen to crooked age, earning their liuing by true and painefull ſeruice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to ſatisfie an old vow of theirs which they had made of auncient time) ſent ſometimes the firſt borne of their children vnto Apollo in the city of DELPHES: and that amongeſt them they alſo mingled thoſe which were deſcended of the auncient priſoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But becauſe they could not liue there, they directed their iourney firſt into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of PVGLIA, and afterwardes from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIEIANS. In memory whereof, the daughters of the BOTTIEIANS in a ſolemne ſacrifice they make, doe vſe to ſing the foote of this ſong: Let vs to ATHENS goe. But thereby we may ſee how perillous a thing it is, to fall in diſpleaſure and enmity with a city, which can ſpeake well, and where learning and eloquence doth floriſh. For euer ſince that time, Minos was alwayes blaſed and diſgraced throughout all the Theaters of ATHENS. The teſtimony of Heſiodus, who calleth him the moſt worthy King, doth nothing helpe him at all, nor the praiſe of Homer, who nameth him Iupiters familiar friend: becauſe the tragicall Poets got the vpper hand in diſgracing him, notwithſtanding all theſe. And vppon their ſtages where all the tragedies were played, they ſtill gaue forth many ill fauored words, and fowle ſpeaches of him: as againſt a man that had beene moſt cruell and vnnaturall. Yet moſt men thinke, that Minos was the King which eſtabliſhed the lawes: and Radamanthus the iudge and preſeruer of them, who cauſed the ſame alſo to be kept and obſerued. The time now being come about for payment of the third tribute, when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet married, to giue them to be put forth to take their chaunce and lot: the citizens of ATHENS beganne to murmur againſt AEgeus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cauſe of all this euill, was onely alone exempted from this griefe. And that to bring the gouernment of the Realme, to fall into the hands of a ſtraunger his baſtard: he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnnaturally compelled to leaue and forſake them. Theſe iuſt ſorrowes and complaintes of the fathers, whoſe children were taken from them, did pearce the heart of Theſeus, who willing to yeelde to reaſon, and to runne the ſelfe ſame fortune as the citizens did: willingly offered himſelfe to be ſent thither, without regard taking to his happe or aduenture. For which, the citizens greatly eſteemed of his courage and honourable diſpoſition, and dearely loued him for the good affection he ſeemed to beare vnto the communalty. But AEgeus hauing vſed many reaſons and perſwaſions to cauſe him to turne, and ſtay from his purpoſe, and perceiuing in the end there was no remedy but he would go: he then drue lots for the children which ſhould goe with him. Hellanicus notwithſtanding doth write, that they were not thoſe of the city which drew lots for the children they ſhould ſend, but that Minos him ſelfe went thither in perſon and did chooſe them, as he choſe Theſeus the firſt, vpon conditions agreed betweene them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS ſhould furniſh them with a ſhippe, and that the children ſhould ſhippe and imbarke with him, carrying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaure, this tribute ſhould ceaſe. Now before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of ſafety of their children, therefore the ATHENIANS alwayes wayes ſent a ſhippe to conuay their children with a blacke ſayle, in token of aſſured loſſe. Neuertheleſſe Theſeus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good courage, and promiſing boldly that he would ſet vppon this Minotaure: AEgeus gaue vnto the maiſter of the ſhippe a white ſayle, commaunding him that at his returne he ſhould put out the white ſayle if his ſonne had eſcaped, if not, that then he ſhould ſet vp the blacke ſayle, to ſhew him a farre off his vnlucky and vnfortunate chaunce. Simonides notwithſtanding doeth ſay, that this ſayle which AEgeus gaue to the maiſter, was not white, but redd, pyed in graine, and of the colour of Scarlet: and that he gaue it him to ſignifie a farre off, their deliuerie and ſafety. This maiſter was called Phereclus Amarſiadas; as Simonides ſayeth. But Philochorus writeth, that Scirus the SALAMANIAN gaue to Theſeus a maiſter called Nauſitheus, and another marriner to tackle the ſayles, who was called Phæas: becauſe the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practiſed to the ſea, And this did Scirus, for that one of the children on whom the lot fell was his nephew: and thus much the chappels doe teſtifie, which Theſeus built afterwardes in honour of Nauſitheus, and of Phæas, in the village of Phalerus, ioyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is ſayd moreouer, that the feaſt which they call Cyberneſia, that is to ſay, the feaſt of Patrons of the ſhippes, is celebrated in honour of them. Now after the lots were drawen, Theſeus taking with him the children allotted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of ſupplication which they call Hiceteria: which was an oliue bough hallowed, wreathed about with white wolle. After he had made his prayer, he went downe to the ſea ſide to imbarke, the ſixt day of the moneth of March: on which day at this preſent time they doe ſend their young girles to the ſame temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the goddes. But ſome ſay, that the oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES had aunſwered him, that he ſhould take Venus for his guide, and that he ſhould call vppon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cauſe he did ſacrifice a goat vnto her vppon the ſea ſide, which was found ſodainely turned into a ramme, and that herefore they ſurnamed this goddeſſe Epitragia, as one would ſay, the goddeſſe of the ramme. Furthermore, after he was arriued in CRETA, he ſlew there the Minotaure (as the moſt part of auncient authors doe write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fanſie with him, did giue him a clue of threede, by the helpe whereof ſhe taught him, how he might eaſely winde out of the turnings and cranckes of the Labyrinth. And they ſay, that hauing killed this Minotaure, he returned backe againe the ſame way he went, bringing with him thoſe other young children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne alſo he carried afterwardes away. Pherecides ſayth moreouer, that he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the ſhippes of CRETA, becauſe they ſhould not ſodainely ſet out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the captaine of Minos) was killed in a fight by Theſeus, euen in the very hauen mouth as they were ready to ſhippe away, and hoiſe vp ſaile. Yet Philochorus reporteth, that king Minos hauing ſet vp the games, as he was wont to doe yearely in the honour and memory of his ſonne, euery one began to enuy captaine Taurus, becauſe they euer looked that he ſhould carry away the game and victory, as he had done other yeares before: ouer and aboue that, his authority got him much ill will and enuy, becauſe he was proud and ſtately, and had in ſuſpicion that he was great with Queene Paſiphaë. Wherefore when Theſeus required he might encounter with Taurus, Minos eaſily graunted it. And being a ſolemne cuſtome in CRETA that the women ſhould be preſent, to ſee theſe open ſports and ſights, Ariadne being at theſe games amongeſt the reſt, fell further in loue with Theſeus, ſeeing him ſo goodly a perſon, ſo ſtrong, and inuincible in wreſtling, that he farre exceeded all that wreſtled there that day. King Minos was ſo glad that he had taken away the honour from captaine Taurus, that he ſent him home francke and free into his countrey, rendring to him all the other priſoners of ATHENS: and for his ſake, clearely releaſed and forgaue the city of ATHENS the tribute, which they ſhould haue payed him yearely. Howbeit Clidemus ſearching out the beginning of theſe things to the vtmoſt, reciteth them very particularly, and after another ſort. For he ſayeth, about that time there was a generall reſtraint throughout all

Grece, reſtrayning all manner of people to beare ſayle in any veſſell or bottome, wherein there were aboue fiue perſons, except onely Iaſon, who was choſen captaine of the great ſhippe Argus, and had commiſſion to ſaile euery where, to chaſe and driue away rouers and pyrates, and to ſcoure the ſeas throughout. About this time, Dædalus being fled from Creta to Athens in a little Barke: Minos contrarie to this reſtraint, would needes follow him with a fleete of diuers veſſels with owers, who being by force of weather driuen with the coaſt of Sicile, fortuned to die there. Afterwards his ſonne Deucalion, being marmeilouſly offended with the Athenians, ſent to ſummon them to deliuer Dædalus vnto him, or elſe he would put the children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hoſtages. But Theſeus excuſed himſelfe, and ſayd he could not forſake Dædalus, conſidering he was his neare kinſeman, being his coſin germaine, for he was the ſonne of Merope, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by he cauſed many veſſels ſecretly to be made, part of them within Attica ſelfe in the village of Thymetades, farre from any high wayes: and part of them in the cittie of Troezen, by the ſufferance of Pitheus his grandfather, to the end his purpoſe ſhould be kept the ſecretlyer. Afterwards when all his ſhippes were ready, and rigged out, he tooke ſea before the Cretans had any knowledge of it: in ſo much as when they ſaw them a farre off, they did take them for the barkes of their friends. Theſeus landed without reſiſtaunce, and tooke the hauen. Then hauing Dædalus, and other baniſhed Cretans for guydes, he entred the cittie ſelfe of Gnosvs, where he ſlew Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinthe, with all his guard and officers about him. By this meanes the kingdome of Creta fell by inheritance into the hands of his ſiſter Ariadne. Theſeus made league with her, and carried away the young children of Athens, which were kept as hoſtages, and concluded peace and amity betweene the Athenians and the Cretans: who promiſed, and ſware, they would neuer make warres againſt them. They report many other things alſo touching this matter, and ſpecially of Ariadne: but there is no troth not certaintie in it. For ſome ſay, that Ariadne hung her ſelfe for ſorrow, when ſhe ſaw that Theſeus had caſt her off. Other write, that ſhe was tranſported by mariners into the Ile of Naxos, where ſhe was married vnto OEnarus, the prieſt of Bacchus: and they thinke that Theſeus left her, because he was in loue with another, as by theſe verſes ſhould appeare.

Hereas the Megarian ſayth, that theſe two verſes in old time were among the verſes of the Poet Heſiodus, howbeit Piſiſtratus tooke them away: as he did in like manner adde theſe other here in the deſcription of the helles in Homer, to gratifie the Athenians.

Other hold opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theſeus: the one of them was named OEnopion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongſt others the Poet Ion writeth it, who was borne in the Ile of Chio, and ſpeaking of his cittie, he ſayth thus:

OEnopion which was the ſonne of worthy Theſeus,
did cauſe men build this ſtatelie towne, which now triumpheth thus.

Theſeus leaueth Ariadne in Cyprus.

Now what things are found ſeemely in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner ſing them. But one Paenon borne in the cittie of Amathvnta, reciteth this cleane after another ſort, and contrarie to all other: ſaying, that Theſeus by tempeſt was driuen with the Ile of Cyprvs, hauing with him Ariadne, which was great with childe, and ſo ſore ſea ſicke, that ſhe was not able to abide it. In ſo much as he was forced to put her a land, and himſelfe afterwards returning abourd hoping to ſaue his ſhippe againſt the ſtorme, was forthwith compelled to looſe into the ſea. The women of the countrey did curteouſly receiue and intreat Ariadne: and to comfort her againe, (for ſhe was marueilouſly out of heart, to ſee ſhee was thus forſaken ) they counterfaited letters, as if Theſeus had written them to her. And when her groning time was come, and ſhee to be layed, they did their beſt by all poſſible meanes to ſaue her: but ſhe dyed notwithſtanding in labour, and could neuer be deliuered. So ſhe was honorably buried by the Ladyes of CYPRVS. Theſeus not long after returned thither againe, who tooke her death maruellous heauily, and left money with the inhabitants of the Countrie, to ſacrifice vnto her yearely: and for memory of her, he cauſed two litle images to be molten, the one of copper, and the other of ſiluer, which he dedicated vnto her. This ſacrifice is done the ſecond day of September, on which they doe yet obſerue this ceremonie: they doe laye a young childe vpon a bed, which pittifully cryeth and lamenteth, as women trauelling with childe. They ſay alſo, that the AMATHVSIANS doe yet call the groue where her Tombe is ſet vp, the woode of Venus Ariadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that report this otherwiſe: ſaying, there were two Minoes, and two Ariadnees, whereof the one was married to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whom Staphylus was borne: and the other the youngeſt, was rauiſhed and caryed away by Theſeus, who afterwardes forſooke her, and ſhe came into the Ile of NAXOS with her nurce, called Corcyna, whoſe graue they doe ſhewe yet to this day. The ſecond Ariadne dyed there alſo, but ſhe had no ſuch honour done to her after her death, as to the firſt was giuen. For they celebrate the feaſt of the firſt with all ioy and myrth: where the ſacrifices done in memorie of the ſeconde, be mingled with mourning and ſorrow. Theſeus then departing from the Ile of CRETA, arriued in the Ile of DELOS, where he did ſacrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gaue there a litle image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then with the other young boyes that he had deliuered, hee daunced a kinde of daunce, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they ſay: in which there are many turnes and returnes, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of daunce, the crane, as Dicæarcus ſaith. And Theſeus daunced it firſt about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to ſay, horneſtaffe: becauſe it is made and builded of hornes onely, all on the left hande well and curiouſly ſet together without any other binding. It is ſaide alſo that hee made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the firſt was giuen to him that ouercame, a braunch of palme for rewarde of victorie. But when they drue neere the coaſt of ATTICA, they were ſo ioyfull, he and his maſter, that they forgate to ſet vp their white ſayle, by which they ſhoulde haue giuen knowledge of their health and ſafety vnto AEgeus. Who ſeeing the blacke ſayle a farre off, being out of all hope euer more to ſee his ſonne againe, tooke ſuch a griefe at his heart, that he threw him ſelfe headlong from the toppe of a clyffe, and killed himſelfe. So ſoone as Theſeus was arriued at the port named Phalerus, he performed the ſacrifices which he had vowed to the goddes at his departure: and ſent an Heraulde of his before vnto the citie, to carie newes of his ſafe arriuall. The Herauld found manie of the citie mourning the death of King AEgeus. Many other receiued him with great ioy, as may be ſuppoſed. They would haue crowned him alſo with a garlande of flowers, for that he had brought ſo good tidings, that the children of the citie were returned in ſafetie. The Herauld was content to take the garland, yet would he not in any wiſe put it on his head, but did wind it about his Heraulds rodde he bare in his hand, and ſo returneth forthwith to the ſea, where Theſeus made his ſacrifices. Who perceiuing they were not yet done, did refuſe to enter into the temple, and ſtayed without for troubling of the ſacrifices. Afterwardes all ceremonies finiſhed, he went in and tolde him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for ſorow, haſted with ſpeede towards the citie. And this is the cauſe, why to this day, at the feaſt called Oſcophoria (as who would ſay the feaſt of boughes) the Herauld hath not his head but his rod onely crowned with flowers, and why the aſſiſtants alſo after the ſacrifice done, doe make ſuch cryes and exclamations: Ele, leuſ, iou, iou: whereof the firſt, is the cry and voyce they commonly vſe one to another to make haſte, or elſe it is the foote of ſome ſong of triumph: and the other is the cry and voyce of men as it were in feare and trouble. After he had ended the obſequies aud funeralles for his father, he performed alſo his ſacrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed the ſeuenth day of the moneth of October, on which they arriued at their returne into the citie of ATHENS. Euen ſo the cuſtome which they vſe at this day to ſeeth all manner of pulſe, commeth of this: that thoſe which then returned with Theſeus, did ſeeth in a great braſſe pot all the remaine of their prouiſion, and therewith made good chere together. Euen in ſuch ſort as this, came vp the cuſtome to carie a branch of oliue, wreathed about with wooll, which they call Ireſione: becauſe at that time they caried boughs of ſupplication, as we haue told ye before. About which they hang all ſorts of fruites: for then barrenneſſe did ceaſſe, as the verſes they ſang afterwards did witneſſe.

Howbeit there are ſome which wil ſay, that theſe verſes were made for the Heraclides, that is to ſay, thoſe that deſcended from Hercules: which flying for their ſafetie and ſuccour vnto the ATHENIANS, were entertained & much made of by them for a time. But the moſt part hold opinion, they were made vpon the occaſion aforeſaid. The veſſel in which Theſeus went and returned, was a galliot of thirtie owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the old peeces of wood that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer ſince, in the diſputations of the Philoſophers, touching things that increaſe, to wit, whether they remaine alwayes one, or elſe they be made others: this galliot was alwayes brought in for example of doubt. For ſome mainteined, that it was ſtill one veſſell: others to the contrarie defended it was not ſo. And they hold opinion alſo, that the feaſt of boughes which is celebrated at Athens at this time, was then firſt of all inſtituted by Theſeus. It is ſayd moreouer, that he did not carie all the wenches vpon whom the lots did fall, but choſe two faire yong boyes, whoſe faces were ſweete and delicate as maydens be, that otherwiſe were hardie, and quicke ſpirited. But he made them ſo oft bathe them ſelues in hote bathes, and keepe them in from the heate of the ſunne, and ſo manie times to waſh, annoint, and rubbe them ſelues with oyles which ſerue to ſupple and ſmooth their ſkinnes, to keepe freſh and faire their culler, to make yellow and bright their haires: and withall did teach them ſo to counterfet the ſpeech, countenance and faſhion of yong maides, that they ſeemed to be like them, rather then yong boyes. For there was no manner of difference to be perceiued outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a proceſſion, in which both he & the other yong boyes were apparelled then, as they be now, which carie boughes on the day of the feaſt in their hands. They carie them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is told of them: or rather becauſe they returned home iuſt at the time and ſeaſon, when they gather the fruite of thoſe trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to ſay, ſupper cariers, which are aſſiſtants to the ſacrifice done that day, in repreſenting the mothers of thoſe, vpon whom the lots did fall, becauſe they in like ſort brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for ſo did their mothers tattle to their children, to comfort and encourage them. All theſe particularities were written by Demon the hiſtoriographer. There was moreouer a place choſen out, to build him a temple in, & he himſelfe ordained, that thoſe houſes which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, ſhould now yerely thenceforth become contributories towards the charges of a ſolemne ſacrifice, which ſhould be done in the honour of him: and he did aſſigne the order and adminiſtration of the ſame, vnto the houſe of the Phytalides, in recompence of the curteſie which they ſhewed him when he arriued. Furthermore, after the death of his father Ægeus, he vndertooke a maruelous great enterpriſe. For he brought all the inhabitants of the whole prouince of ATTICA, to be within the cittie of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, which were before diſparſed into diuers villages, and by reaſon thereof were very hard to be aſſembled together, when occaſion was offered to eſtabliſh anie order concerning the common ſtate. Many times alſo they were at variance together, and by the eares, making warres one vpon another. But Theſeus tooke the paines to go from village to village, and from familie to familie, to let them vnderſtand the reaſons why they ſhould conſent vnto it. So he found the poore people and priuate men, readie to obey and follow his will, but the rich and ſuch as had authoritie in euerie village, all againſt it. Neuertheles he wanne them, promiſing that it ſhould be a common wealth, and not ſubiect to the power of any ſole prince, but rather a popular ſtate. In which he would only reſerue to himſelfe the charge of the warres, and the preſeruation of the lawes: for the reſt, he was content that euery citizen in all and for all ſhould beare a like ſway and authority. So there were ſome that willingly graunted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yeelded notwithſtanding for feare of his diſpleaſure and power which then was very great. So they thought it better to conſent with good will, vnto that he required: then to tarry his forcible compulſion. Then he cauſed all the places where iuſtice was miniſtred, and all their halles of aſſembly to be ouerthrowne and pulled downe. He remoued ſtraight all iudges and officers, and built a towne houſe, & a counſaile hall, in the place where the citie now ſtandeth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY, but he called the whole corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwardes he inſtituted the great feaſt and common ſacrifice for all of the countrie of ATTICA, which they call Panathenæa. Then he ordeined another feaſt alſo vpon the ſixteenth day of the moneth of Iune, for all ſtrangers which ſhould come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metœcia, and is kept euen to this day. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promiſe, and beganne to ſet vp an eſtate or pollicie of a common wealth, beginning firſt with the ſeruice of the goddes. To know the good ſucceſſe of his enterpriſe, he ſent at the very beginning to the oracle of Apollo in DELPHES, to enquire of the fortune of this citie: from whence this anſwere was brought vnto him.

It is found written alſo that Sibylla afterwardes gaue out ſuch a like oracle ouer the citie of ATHENS.

The bladder blowne may fleete vpon the fludde,
but cannot ſinke, nor ſticke in filthy mudde.

Moreouer, becauſe he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his citie, he entiſed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the ſelfe ſame freedome and priuiledges, which the naturall borne citizens had. So that many iudge, that theſe words which are in vſe at this day in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, Come ye hither: be the ſelfe ſame which Theſeus then cauſed to be proclaimed, when he in that ſort did gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he ſuffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without diſtinction of degrees & orders. For he firſt diuided the noble men, from husbandmen & artificers, appointing the noble men as iudges & magiſtrates to iudge vpon matters of Religion, and touching the ſeruice of the goddes: and of them alſo he did chuſe rulers, to beare ciuill office in the common weale, to determine the law, and to tell all holy and diuine things. By this meanes he made the noble men and the two other eſtates equall in voyce. And as the noblemen did paſſe the other in honour: euen ſo the artificers exceeded them in number, and the husbandmen them in profit. Now that Theſeus was the firſt who of all others yeelded to haue a common weale or popular eſtate (as Ariſtotle ſayth) & did giue ouer his regall power: Homer ſelfe ſeemeth to teſtifie it, in numbring the ſhippes which were in the Græcians armie before the citie of TROIA. For amongeſt all the GRÆCIANS, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS people. Moreouer Theſeus coyned money, which he marked with the ſtampe of an oxe, in memorie of the bull of Marathon, or of Taurus the captaine of Minos, or elſe to prouoke his citizens to giue themſelues to labour. They ſay alſo that of this money they were ſince called Hecatombœon, and Decabœon, which ſignifieth woorth a hundred oxen, and worth tenne oxen. Furthermore hauing ioyned all the territorie of the citie of MEGARA, vnto the countrie of ATTICA, he cauſed that notable foure ſquare piller to be ſet vp for their confines within the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and engraued there-

It was he alſo which made the games called Iſthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the ende that as the GRECIANS did celebrate the feaſt of games called Olympia, in the honour of Iupiter, by Hercules ordinance: ſo, that they ſhould alſo celebrate the games called Iſthmia, by his order and inſtitution, in the honor of Neptune. For thoſe that were done in the ſtraights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, & had rather forme of ſacrifice or of a myſterie, then of games & open feaſt. Yet ſome will ſay, that theſe games of Iſthmia were inſtituted in the honour & memorie of Sciron, & that Theſeus ordained them in ſatiſfaction of his death: becauſe he was his coſin germaine, being the ſonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. Other ſay that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Theſeus made theſe games, & not for the memory of the other. How ſoeuer it was, he ſpecially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they ſhould giue vnto thoſe that came from ATHENS to ſee their games of Iſthmia, ſo much place to ſit downe before them (in the moſt honorable part of the feaſt place) as the ſaile of their ſhip ſhould couer, in the which they came from ATHENS: thus do Hellanicus and Andron Halicarnaſſeus write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the ſea Maior, Philochorus, and ſome other holde opinion, that he went thither with Hercules againſt the AMAZONES: and that to honor his valiantnes, Hercules gaue him ANTIOPA the AMAZONE. But the more part of the other Hiſtoriographers, namely Hellanicus, Phereeides, & Herodotus, doe write, that Theſeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, & that he tooke this AMAZONE priſoner, which is likelieſt to be true. For we do not find that any other who went this iorney with him, had taken any AMAZONE priſoner beſides him ſelfe. Bion alſo the Hiſtoriographer, this notwithſtanding ſayth, that he brought her away by deceit and ſtealth. For the AMAZONES (ſayth he) naturally louing men, did not flie at all when they ſaw them land in their countrie, but ſent them preſents, & that Theſeus entiſed her to come into his ſhip, who brought him a preſent: and ſo ſoone as ſhe was abord, he hoyſed his ſayle, and ſo caried her away. Another Hiſtoriographer Menecrates, who wrote the hiſtorie of the citie of NICEA, in the countrie of BYTHINIA, ſayth: that Theſeus hauing this AMAZONE ANTIOPA with him, remained a certain time vpon thoſe coaſts, & that amongſt other he had in his company three yonger brethren of ATHENS, Euneus, Thoas, & Solois. This laſt, Solois, was marueilouſly in loue with ANTIOPA, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, ſauing vnto one with whom he was moſt familiar, and whom he truſted beſt: ſo that he reported this matter vnto ANTIOPA. But ſhe vtterly reiected his ſute, though otherwiſe ſhe handled it wiſely and courteouſly, and did not complaine to Theſeus of him. Howbeit the young man deſpairing to enioy his loue, tooke it ſo inwardly, that deſperately he leapt into the riuer, and drowned him ſelfe. Which when Theſeus vnderſtoode, and the cauſe alſo that brought him to this deſperation and end: he was very ſory, and angry alſo. Whereupon he remembred a certaine oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commaunded to build a citie in that place in a ſtraunge countrie, where he ſhould be moſt ſorie, and that he ſhould leaue ſome that were about him at that time, to gouerne the ſame. For this cauſe therefore he built a citie in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, becauſe he had built it onely by the commandement of the Nunne Pythia. He called the riuer in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memorie of him: and left his two brethren for his deputies and as gouernours of this new citie, with another gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it commeth, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS call a certaine place of their citie, Hermus houſe. But they fayle in the accent, by putting it vpon the laſt ſyllabe: for in pronouncing it ſo, Hermus ſignifieth Mercury. By this meanes they doe transferre the honour due to the memorie of Hermus, vnto the god Mercury. Now heare what was the occaſion of the warres of the AMAZONES, which me thinkes was not a matter of ſmall moment, nor an enterpriſe of a woman. For they had not placed their campe within the very citie of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it ſelfe (called PNYCE) adioyning to the tẽple of the Muſes, if they had not firſt conquered or ſubdued all the countrie thereabouts: neither had they all come at the firſt, ſo valiantly to aſſayle the citie of ATHENS. Now, whether they came by land from ſo farre a countrie, or that they paſſed ouer an arme of the ſea, which is called Boſphorus Cimmericus, being froſen as Hellanicus ſayth: it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very citie it ſelfe, the names of the places which continue yet to this preſent day doe witneſſe it, and the graues alſo of the women which died there. But ſo it is, that both armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theſeus hauing firſt made ſacrifice vnto Feare the goddeſſe, according to the counſaile of a prophecy he had receiued, he gaue them battell in the moneth of Auguſt, on the ſame day, in the which the ATHENIANS doe euen at this preſent ſolemniſe the feaſt, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Hiſtoriographer, deſirous particularly to write all the circumſtances of this encounter, ſayeth that the left point of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right point marched by the ſide of CHRYSA, euen to the place which is called PNYCE, vpon which, the ATHENIANS cõming towards the temple of the Muſes, did firſt giue their charge. And for proofe that this is true, the graues of the women which died in the firſt encounter, are found yet in the great ſtreete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neere vnto the chappell of the little god Chalcodus. And the ATHENIANS (ſayth he) were in this place repulſed by the AMAZONES, euen to the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to ſay of the furies. But on thother ſide alſo, the ATHENIANS cõming towards the quarters of Palladiũ, Ardettus, & Lucium, draue backe their right point euen to within their campe, and ſlew a great number of them. Afterwards, at the end of foure moneths, peace was taken betweene them by meanes of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Hiſtoriographer calleth the AMAZONE which Theſeus maried, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Neuertheles, ſome ſay that ſhe was ſlaine (fighting on Theſeus ſide) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memory wherof, the piller which is ioyning to the temple of the Olympian ground, was ſet vp in her honour. We are not to maruaile, if the hiſtory of things ſo auncient, be found ſo diuerſely written. For there are alſo that write, that Queene Antiopa ſent thoſe ſecretly which were hurt then into the citie of CALCIDE, where ſome of them recouered, & were healed: & others alſo dyed, which were buried neere to the place called AMAZONION. Howſoeuer it was, it is moſt certain that this war was ended by agreement. For a place adioyning to the temple of Theſeus, doth beare recorde of it, being called Orcomoſium: becauſe the peace was there by ſolemne oath concluded. And the ſacrifice alſo doth truely verifie it, which they haue made to the AMAZONES, before the feaſt of Theſeus, long time out of minde. They of MEGARA alſo do ſhew a tumbe of the AMAZONES in their citie, which is as they go frõ the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they finde an auncient tumbe, cut in faſhion & forme of a loſenge. They ſay that there dyed other of the AMAZONES alſo, neere vnto the citie of CHÆRONEA, which were buried all alongſt the litle broke paſſing by the ſame, which in the old time, (in mine opiniõ) was called Thermodon, and is now named Hæmon, as we haue other places written in the life of Demoſthenes. And it ſeemeth alſo, that they did not paſſe through THESSALY, without fighting: for there are ſeene yet of their tombs all about the citie of SCOTVSA, hard by the rocks, which be called the dogs head. And this is that which is worthy memorie (in mine opinion) touching the wars of theſe AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth that the AMAZONES made wars with Theſeus to reuẽge the iniurie he did to their Queene Antiopa, refuſing her, to marrie with Phædra: & for the murder which he telleth that Hercules did, that me thinkes is altogether but deuiſe of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Theſeus maried Phædra, hauing had before of Antiopa a ſonne called Hippolytus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Hiſtoriographers do not in any thing ſpeake againſt the tragicall Poets: in that which concerneth the ill happe that chaunced to him, in the perſons of this his wife and of his ſonne: we muſt needes take it to be ſo, as we find it written in the tragedies. And yet we finde manie other reportes touching the mariages of Theſeus, whoſe beginnings had no great good honeſt groũd, neither fell out their endes verie fortunate: & yet for all that they haue made no tragedies of them, neither haue they bene played in the Theaters. For we read that he tooke away Anaxo the TROEZENIAN, & that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he tooke their daughters perforce: and that he did alſo marie Peribæa, the mother of Aiax, & afterwards Pherebæa, & Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much alſo, for that he ſo lightly forſooke his wiſe Ariadne, for the loue of Ægles the daughter of Panopæus, as we haue recited before. Laſtly, he tooke away Hellen: which rauiſhment filled all the Realme of ATTICA with warres, & finally was the very occaſion that forced him to forſake his countrie, & brought him at the length to his end, as we will tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other princes of GRECE had done many goodly and notable exploits in the warres, yet Herodotus is of opinion, that Theſeus was neuer in any one of them: ſauing that he was at the battell of the Lapithæ againſt the Centauri. Others ſay to the contrary, that he was at the iorney of Cholchide with Iaſon, & that he did helpe Meleager to kill the wild Bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they ſay) this prouerbe came: Not without Theſeus. Meaning that ſuch a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theſeus ſelfe did many famous acts, without aide of any man, and that for his valiantnes this prouerbe came in vſe, which is ſpoken: This is another Theſeus. Alſo he did helpe Adraſtus king of the ARGIVES, to recouer the bodies of thoſe that were ſlaine in the battell, before the citie of THEBES. Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides ſayth, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the THEBANS in battell: but it was by cōpoſition. And thus the greateſt number of the moſt auncient writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus writeth, that this was the firſt treatie that euer was made to recouer the dead bodies ſlayne in battell: neuertheles we doe read in the hiſtories and geſtes of Hercules, that he was the firſt that euer ſuffered his enemies to carrie away their dead bodies, after they had beene put to the ſword. But whoſoeuer he was, at this day in the village of ELEVTHERES, they doe ſhow the place where the people were buried, and where princes tombes are ſeene about the citie of ELEVSIN, which he made at the requeſt of Adraſtus. And for teſtimonie hereof, the tragedie Æſchilus made of the ELEVSINIANS, where he cauſeth it to be ſpoken euen thus to Theſeus himſelfe, doth clearely ouerthrow the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendſhippe betwixt Pirithous and him, it is ſayd it beganne thus. The renowne of his valiancy was marueilouſly blowen abroad through all GRECE, & Pirithous deſirous to knowe it by experience, went euen of purpoſe to inuade his countrie, and brought away a certaine bootie of oxen of his taken out of the countrie of MARATHON. Theſeus being aduertiſed therof, armed ſtraight, and went to the reſcue. Pirithous hearing of his comming, fled not at all, but returned backe ſodainly to meete him. And ſo ſoone as they came to ſee one another, they both wondred at ech others beawtie and courage, and ſo had they no deſire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hand firſt to Theſeus, ſaid vnto him; I make your ſelfe iudge of the damage you haue ſuſteined by my inuaſion, and with all my hearte I will make ſuch ſatisfaction, as it ſhall pleaſe you to aſſeſſe it at. Theſeus then did not only releaſe him, of all the damages he had done, but alſo requeſted him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were preſently ſworne brethren in the field: after which othe betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia, & ſent to pray Theſeus to come to his mariage, to viſite his countrie, and to make mery with the Lapithæ. He had bidden alſo the Centauri to the feaſt: who being druncke, committed many lewde parts, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithæ chaſticed them ſo well, that they ſlew ſome of them preſently in the place, & draue the reſt afterwards out of all the countrie by the helpe of Theſeus, who armed himſelfe, and fought on their ſide. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter ſomewhat contrarie, ſaying that Theſeus went not at all vntill the warre was well begun: and that it was the firſt time that he ſaw Hercules, and ſpake with him neere vnto the citie of TRACHINA, when he was then quiet, hauing ended all his farre voyages, and greateſt troubles. They reporte that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnes, and honourable entertainement betweene them, and great courteſie was offred to eache other. Neuertheleſſe me thinkes we ſhould giue better credit to thoſe writers that ſay they met many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and receiued into the brotherhood of the myſteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenaunce and fauour which Theſeus ſhowed vnto him: and that his purification alſo was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged ged of neceſſitie of all his ill deedes and cruelties, before he could enter into the company of thoſe holy myſteries. Furthermore, Theſeus was fifty yeares old when he tooke away Hellen and rauiſhed her, which was very young, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanicus ſayth. By reaſon whereof, ſome ſeeking to hide the rauiſhment of her as a haynous fact, doe report it was not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that carried her away, who left her in his cuſtodie and keeping: and that Theſeus would haue kept her from them, and would not haue deliuered her to her brethren Caſtor and Pollux, which afterwardes did demaund her againe of him. Others againe ſay it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her him to keepe, for that he was affrayde of Enarſphorus the ſonne of Hippocoon, who would haue had her away by force. But that which commeth neareſt to the troth in this caſe, and which in deede by many authors is teſtified, was in this ſort. Theſeus & Pirithous went together to the citie of LACEDÆMON, where they tooke away Hellen (being yet very young) euen as ſhe was dauncing in the tēple of Diana ſurnamed Orthia. & they fled for life. They of LACEDÆMON ſent after her, but thoſe that followed went no further thē the citie of TEGEA. Now when they were eſcaped out of the coūtrie of PELOPONNESVS, they agreed to draw lots together, which of them two ſhould haue her, with condition that whoſe lot it were to haue her, he ſhould take her to his wife, & ſhould be bound alſo to helpe his companion to get him another It was Theſeus happe to light vpon her, who caried her to the citie of APHIDNES, becauſe ſhe was yet too young to be maried. Whither he cauſed his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recōmending her to his good care, & to keepe it ſo ſecretly, that no body ſhould know what was become of her. Becauſe he would do the like for Pirithous (according to th'agremēt made betwixt thē) he went into EPIRVS with him to ſteale the daughter of Aidoneus, king of the MOLOSSIANS, who had ſurnamed his wife Proſerpina, his daughter Proſerpina, & his dogge Cerberus: with whō he made thē fight which came to aske his daughther in mariage, promiſing to giue her to him that ſhould ouercome his Cerberus. But the king vnderſtāding that Pirithous was come, not to requeſt his daughter in mariage, but to ſteale her away, he tooke him priſoner with Theſeus: & as for Pirithous, he cauſed him preſētly to be torn in peeces with his dogge, & ſhut Theſeus vp in cloſe priſon. In this meane time there was one at ATHENS called Meneſtheus, the ſonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the ſonne of Orneus, and Orneus was the ſonne of Erictheus. This Meneſtheus was the firſt that began to flatter the people, and did ſeeke to winne the fauour of the communaltie, by ſweete entiſing wordes: by which deuiſe he ſtirred vp the chiefeſt of the citie againſt Theſeus (who indeede long before began to be wearie of him) by declaring vnto them how Theſeus had taken from them their royalties and ſigniories, & had ſhut them vp in ſuch ſort within the walles of a citie, that he might the better keepe them in ſubiection & obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour ſort of people, he did ſtirre vp alſo to rebellion, perſwading them that it was no other then a dreame of libertie which was promiſed them: and how contrariwiſe they were clearely diſpoſſeſt & throwen out of their own houſes, of their tēples, & from their natural places where they were borne, to thend only, that in liew of many good & louing lordes which they were wont to haue before, they ſhould now be compelled to ſerue one only head, & a ſtrange lord. Euen as Meneſtheus was very hot about this practiſe, the war of the Tyndarides fell out at that inſtant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For theſe Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Caſtor & Pollux, came downe with a great armie, againſt the citie of ATHENS: & ſome ſuſpect ſore that Meneſtheus was cauſe of their comming thither. Howbeit at the firſt entrie they did no hurt at all in the country, but only demannded reſtitution of their ſiſter. To whom the citizens made aunſwer, that they knew not where ſhe was left: & then the brethren began to make ſpoile, & offer warre in deed. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who hauing knowledge (I cannot tell by what meane) that ſhe was ſecretly hidden in the citie of APHIDNES, reuealed it vnto them. By reaſon whereof the Tyndarides did alwaies honour him very much, ſo long as he liued, & afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing oft burnt & deſtroyed the whole countrie of ATTICA throughout, they would yet neuer touch the Academy of ATHENS for Academus ſake. Yet Dicearchus ſayth, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two Arcadians, Echedemus, and Marathus, and how of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which ſithence hath beene called Academia: and after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, becauſe he willingly offered him ſelfe to be ſacrificed before the battell, as obeying the order & commaundement of a prophecie. So they went and pitched their campe before the citie of APHIDNES, and hauing wonne the battell, and taken the citie by aſſault, they raced the place. They ſay that Alycus, the ſonne of Sciron was ſlaine at this field, who was in the hoaſt of the Tyndarides, & that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alycus, in the which his bodie was buried. Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theſeus being there, the citie of APHIDNES, & his mother alſo were taken. But when it was wonne they of ATHENS began to quake for feare, & Meneſtheus counſelled them to receiue the Tyndarides into the citie, and to make them good chere, ſo they would make no wars but vpon Theſeus, which was the firſt that had done them the wrong & iniury: & that to all other els they ſhould ſhew fauour & good will. And ſo it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to do as they liſted, they demaunded nothing els but that they might be receiued into their corporatiõ, & not to be reckoned for ſtrangers, no more thẽ Hercules was: the which was granted the Tyndarides, & Aphidnus did adopt them for his children, as Pylius had adopted Hercules. Moreouer they did honour thẽ as if they had bene goddes, calling them Anaces. Either becauſe they ceaſed the wars, or for that they ordered themſelues ſo well, that their whole armie being lodged within the citie, there was not any hurt or diſpleaſure done to any perſon: but as it became thoſe that haue the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preſerue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greke word Anucos doth ſignifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the kings Anactes. There are others alſo who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, becauſe of their ſtarres which appeared in the aire. For the Attican tongue ſaith, Anacas, & Anecathen: where the cõmon people ſay Ano, and Anothen, that is to ſay, aboue. Neuertheles Æthra, Theſeus mother, was caried priſoner to LACEDÆMON, and from thence to TROIA with Hellen, as ſome ſay: & as Homer himſelfe doth witneſſe in his verſes, where he ſpeaketh of the women that followed Hellen.

Theſeus deliuered out of priſon by Hercules meanes.

Yet there are other who aſwel reiect theſe two verſes, & maintaine they are not Homers: as alſo they reproue all that is reported of Munychus. To wit, that Laocide being priuily cõceiued of him by Demophõ, he was brought vp ſecretly by Æthra within TROIA. But Heſter the hiſtorien in his thirteenth of his hiſtories of ATTICA, maketh a recitall far cõtrary to other, ſaying: that ſome hold opiniõ, that Paris Alexander was ſlaine in battel by Achilles, & Patroclus in the cõtrie of THESSALY, neere to the riuer of Sperchius, & that his brother Hector tooke the citie of TROEZEN, from whence he brought away AEthra: in which there is no manner of apparance or likelihood. But AEdoneus king of the MOLOSSIANS, feaſting Hercules one day as he paſſed through his realme, deſcended by chaunce into talke of Theſeus & of Pirithous, how they came to ſteale away his daughter ſecretly: & after told how they were alſo puniſhed. Hercules was marueilous ſory to vnderſtand that one of them was now dead, & the other in daunger to die, & thought with himſelf that to make his mone to AEdoneus, it would not helpe the matter: he beſought him only that he would deliuer Theſeus for his ſake. And he granted him. Thus Theſeus being deliuered of his captiuitie, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: and at his returne he did dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the citie had before cauſed to be built in his owne honour. And where firſt of all they were called Theſea, he did now ſurname thẽ all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Now when he was arriued at ATHENS, he would immediately haue cõmanded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found him ſelfe troubled much with ſedition, becauſe thoſe who had hated him of a long time, had added alſo to their old canckred hate, a diſdain & contẽpt to fear him any more. And the cõmõ people now were become ſo ſtubborn, that where before they would haue done all that they were cõmanded, & haue ſpokẽ nothing to the contrary: now they looked to be borne with, & flattered. Whereupon Theſeus thought at the firſt to haue vſed force, but he was forced by the faction & contẽtion of his enemies to let all alone, & in the end, deſpairing he ſhould euer bring his matters to paſſe to his deſire, he ſecretly ſent away his children vnto the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the ſonne of Chalcodus. And himſelf, after he had made many wiſhes & curſes againſt the Athenians, in the village of GARGETTVS, in a place which for that cauſe to this day is called Arateriod: (that is to ſay, the place of curſings) he did take the ſeas, & wẽt into the Ile of SCIROS, where he had goods, & thought alſo to haue found friends. Lycomedes raigned at that time, and was king of the Ile, vnto whom Theſeus made requeſt for ſome land, as intending to dwell there: albeit ſome ſay that he required him to giue him aide againſt the Atheniãs. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to entertain ſo great a perſonage, or that he did it to gratifie Meneſtheus: caried him vp to the high rockes, fayning as though he would from thence haue ſhewed him all his countrey round about. But when he had him there, he threw him downe headlong from the top of the rocks to the bottome, & put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he fell downe of him ſelf by an vnfortunate chaunce, walking one day after ſupper as he was wont to doe. There was no man at that time that did follow or purſue his death, but Meneſtheus quietly remained king of ATHENS: and the children of Theſeus, as priuate ſouldiers followed Elphinor in the warres of TROIA. But after the death of Meneſtheus, who died in the iourney to TROY, Theſeus ſonnes returned vnto ATHENS, where they recouered their ſtate. Sithence there were many occaſiõs which moued the Athenians to reuerence & honor him as a demy God. For in the battell of Marathon, many thought they ſaw his ſhadow and image in armes, fighting againſt the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yeare wherein Phædon was gouernor of ATHENS) the Nun Pithia anſwered the Atheniãs, who had ſent to the oracle of Apollo: that they ſhould bring backe the bones of Theſeus, & putting thẽ in ſome honorable place, they ſhould preſerue and honor them deuoutly. But it was a hard matter to find his graue: and if they had found it, yet had it beene a harder thing to haue brought his bones away, for the malice of thoſe barbarous people which inhabited that Ile: which were ſo wild and fierce, that none could trade or liue with thẽ. Notwithſtãding Cimon hauing taken the Iland (as we haue written in his life) & ſeeking his graue: perceiuing by good hap an eagle pecking with her beake, & ſcraping with her clawes in a place of ſome prety height. Straight it came into his mind (as by diuine inſpiration) to ſearch and digge the place: where was found the tombe of a great body, with the head of a ſpear which was of braſſe, & a ſword with it. Al which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon in the admirall gally. The Atheniãs receiued them with great ioy, with proceſſions & goodly ſacrifices, as if Theſeus him ſelfe had bene a liue, & had returned into the city againe. At this day all theſe relicks lye yet in the middeſt of the city, neare to the place where the young men doe vſe all their exerciſes of body. There is free liberty of acceſſe for all ſlaues & poore men, (that are afflicted & purſued, by any mightier then themſelues) to pray & ſacrifice in remembrance of Theſeus: who while he liued was protectour of the oppreſſed, & did curteouſly receiue their requeſts & petitions that prayed to haue aide of him. The greateſt and moſt ſolemne ſacrifice they doe vnto him, is on the eight day of October, in which he returned from CRETA, with the other young children of ATHENS. Howbeit they do not leaue to honor him euery eight day of all other moneths, either becauſe he arriued frõ TROEZEN at ATHENS the eight day of Iune, as Diodorus the Coſmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meeteſt for him, becauſe the bruite ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They do ſacrifice alſo to Neptune, the eight day of euery moneth, becauſe the number of eight is the firſt cube made of euen number, & the double of the firſt ſquare: which doth repreſent a ſtedfaſtnes immoueable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cauſe we ſurname Aſphalius, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation doth ſignifie: the ſafe keeper, and the ſtayer of the earth.

THE LIFE OF Romulus.

Diuers opinions about the name of Rome.

THE Hiſtoriographers doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cauſe the great name of the citie of ROME (the glory whereof is blowen abroad through all the world) was firſt giuen vnto it. For ſome thinke that the Pelaſgians, after they had ouercome the greateſt part of the world, and had inhabited and ſubdued many nations, in the end did ſtay themſelues in that place where it was new bulded: and for their great ſtrength and power in armes, they gaue the name of ROME vnto the city, as ſignifying power in the Greeke tong. Other ſay, that after the taking and deſtruction of TROIA, there were certaine TROIANS which ſauing them ſelues from the ſword, tooke ſuch veſſels as they found at aduenture in the hauen, and were by windes put to the THVSCANE ſhore, where they anckred neare vnto the riuer of Tyber. There their wiues being ſo ſore ſea ſicke, that poſsibly they could not any more endure the boiſtrous ſurges of the ſeas: it happened one of them among the reſt (the nobleſt and wiſeſt of the company) called ROMA, to counſaile the other women of her companions to ſet their ſhips a fire, which they did accordingly. Wherewith their huſbands at the firſt were marueilouſly offended. But afterwards, being compelled of neceſsity to plant them ſelues neare vnto the city of PALLANTIVM, they were appeaſed when they ſaw things proſper better then they hoped for, finding the ſoyle there fertile, and the people their neighbours ciuill and gentle in entertayning them. Wherefore amongeſt other honours they did to require this lady Roma, they called their city after her name, as from whom came the originall cauſe of the building and foundation thereof. They ſay that from thence came this cuſtome continuing yet to this day at ROME, that the women ſaluting their kinſefolkes and huſbands doe kiſſe them in the mouth, for ſo did theſe TROIAN Ladyes to pleaſe their huſbands, and to winne them againe, after they had loſt their fauours, and procured their diſpleaſures with burning of their ſhippes. Other ſay that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or elſe of Telephus the ſonne of Hercules, and of the wife of Æneas: other ſay of Aſcanius, the ſonne of Æneas, who named the city after her name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the ſonne of Vlyſſes and of Circe) that firſt founded ROME: other wil ſay that it was Romus the ſonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither frō TROIA. Other write that it was one Romis a tyranne of the LATINES, who draue the THVSCANS out of thoſe parts: which departing out of Theſſaly went firſt of all into Lydia, and afterwards from Lydia into Italie. And furthermore, they who thinke that Romulus (as in deede it carieth beſt likelyhood) was he that gaue the name to the city, doe not agree about his aunceſters. For ſome of them write, that he was the ſonne of AEneas and of Dexithea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into Italie of a litle childe with his brother Remus: and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowne, all other ſhippes were caſt away, ſauing the ſhippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good happe came to a ſtay vppon a very plaine euen ground on the bancke, and becauſe the children beyond all hope were ſaued by this meanes, therefore the place was afterwards called Roma. Other ſay that Roma the daughter of the firſt Troian lady was maried vnto Latinus the ſonne of Telemachus, by whom ſhe had Romulus. Other write, that it was AEmilia, the daughter of AEneas and of Lauinia, which was gotten with childe by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is ſaide that there was ſometime a king of Alba named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whoſe houſe through the permiſſion of the goddes, appeared ſuch a like viſion: that there roſe vp in the harth of his chimney the forme and faſhion of a mans priuy member, which continued there many dayes. And they ſay, that at that time there was in Thuſcane an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius ſuch an aunſwer: that he ſhould cauſe his daughter yet vnmaried to haue carnall company with the ſtraunge thing, for ſhe ſhould beare a ſonne, that ſhould be famous for his valiancie, for ſtrength of body, and his happie ſucceſſe, wherein he ſhould exceede all men of his time. Tarchetius told this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this ſtraunge thing: but ſhe diſdaining to doe it, ſent one of her waiting women to vndertake the entertainement. But Tarchetius was ſo mad at this, that he cauſed them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddeſſe Veſta appeared to him in his ſleepe in the night, and charged him he ſhould not doe it. Whereupon he did commaund them to make him a peece of cloth in the priſon, with promiſe that they ſhould be maried when they had finiſhed it. Theſe poore maides toyled at it all the liue long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commaundement) that did vndoe all they had done the day before. In the meane time, this wayting woman that was got with childe by this ſtrange thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twins: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with expreſſe commaundement he ſhould caſt them away. This Teratius caried them vnto the bancke of the riuer: thither came a ſhee Wolfe and gaue them ſucke, and certaine birdes that brought litle crummes and put them in their mouthes, vntill a ſwine-heard perceyuing them, and wondring at the ſight, did boldly goe to the children, and tooke them away with him. Theſe infants being thus preſerued after they were come to mans ſtate, did ſet vppon Tarchetius and ſlew him. One Promathion an Italian writer, deliuereth this ſtorie thus. But the report that carrieth beſt credite of all, and is allowed of by many writers: commeth from Diocles Peparethian, (whom Fabius Pictor followeth (in many thinges) who was the firſt that put forth this ſtorie among the Grecians, and ſpecially the chiefeſt pointes of it. Though this matter be ſomewhat diuerſely taken, yet in effect the ſtorie is thus. The right line and bloud of the kings of Alba deſcended from AEneas, by the ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, and the Kingdome fell in the ende betweene two brethren, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by lotte to make diuiſion betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the golde, ſyluer, readie money, goods, and iewels brought from Troia. Numitor by his lotte choſe the Realme for his portion: Amulius hauing all the golde and treaſure in his hands, did finde him ſelfe thereby the ſtronger, and ſo did eaſely take his Realme from him. And fearing leaſt his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thruſt him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddeſſe Veſta, there to paſſe her dayes in virginitie, and neuer to be maried: (ſome call her Rhea, other Syluia, and other Ilia) neuertheleſſe not long after ſhe was found with childe, againſt the rule and profeſſion of the Veſtall Nunnes. So nothing had ſaued her from preſent death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithſtāding ſhe was ſtraightly locked vp, that no body could ſee her, nor ſpeake with her, leaſt ſhe ſhould be brought to bedde without Amulius knowledge. In the end ſhe was deliuered of two faire boyes and maruellous great twinnes: which made Amulius more affraid then before. So he commaunded one of his men to take the two children, and to throw them away, and deſtroy them. Some ſay that this ſeruants name was Fauſtulus: other thinke it was he that brought them vp. But whoſoeuer he was, he that had the charge to throw them away put them in a trough, and went towards the riuer with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it riſen ſo high, and running ſo ſwiftly, that he durſt not come neare the waters ſide, and ſo they being in the trough, he laid them on the banke. In the meane time the riuer ſwelling ſtill, and ouerflowing the banke, in ſuch ſort that it came vnder the trough: did gently lift vp the trough, and caried it vnto a great plaine, called at this preſent Cermanum, and in the old time Germanum (as I take it) becauſe the Romaines called the brothers of father & mother, Germani. Now there was neare vnto this place a wilde figge tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romulus as the moſt part thought: or elſe becauſe the beaſts feeding there, were wont to come vnder the ſame in the extreame heate of the day, and there did Ruminate, that is, chew their cudde in the ſhadow: or perhappes becauſe that the two children did ſucke the teate of the Wolfe, which the auncient LATINES call RVMA, and they at this day doe yet call the goddeſſe on whom they cry out to giue their children ſucke, RVMILIA. And in their ſacrifices to her they vſe no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with hony. To theſe two children lying there in this ſort, they write, there came a ſhe Wolfe & gaue them ſucke, and a hitwaw alſo which did helpe to nouriſh and keepe them. Theſe two beaſts are thought to be conſecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINES do ſingularly honour and reuerence the hitwaw. This did much helpe to giue credit to the words of the mother, who affirmed ſhe was conceiued of thoſe two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit ſome thinke ſhe was deceyued in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce did rauiſhe her. Other hold opinion that the name of the nurſe which gaue the two children ſucke with her breaſts, gaue occaſion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reaſon of the double ſignification thereof. For the LATINES do call with one ſelfe name ſhee Wolfes Lupas, & women that giue their bodies to all cōmers: as this nurſe the wife of Fauſtulus (that brought theſe children home to her houſe) did vſe to doe. By her right name ſhe was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES do ſacrifice yet vnto this day: and the prieſt of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the ſhedding of wine and milke accuſtomed at burials, and the feaſt it ſelfe is called Laurentia. It is true that they honour alſo another Larentia for like occaſion. The clerke or ſexten of Hercules temple, not knowing one day how to driue away the time as it ſhould ſeeme: of a certaine liuelines and boldneſſe, did deſire the god Hercules to play at dice with him, with condition that if he did winne, Hercules ſhould be bound to ſend him ſome good fortune: and if it were his lucke to loſe, then he promiſed Hercules he would prouide him a very good ſupper, and would beſides bring him a faire gentlewoman to lie withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearſed, the ſexten firſt caſt the dice for Hercules, and afterwards for him ſelfe. It fell out that Hercules wanne, and the ſexten meaning good faith, and thinking it very meete to performe the bargaine that him ſelfe had made, prepared a good ſupper, and hyred this Laurentia the courtiſan, which was very faire, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus hauing feaſted her within the temple, and prepared a bed readie there, after ſupper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules ſhould haue come in deed and layen with her. And it is ſayd for troth, that Hercules came thither: and commanded her in the morning ſhe ſhould go into the market place & ſalute the firſt man ſhe met, & keepe him euer for her friend. Which thing ſhe performed, & the firſt man ſhe met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeares, & one that had gathered together maruellous wealth & riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer maried. He fel acquainted with this Laurentia, & loued her ſo dearely, that ſhortly after chauncing to die, he made her heire of all he had: whereof ſhe diſpoſed afterwards by her laſt will and teſtament, the beſt and greateſt part vnto the people of Rome. Moreouer it is reported alſo, that ſhe now being growen to be famous and of great honor (as thought to be the lemman of a god) did vaniſh away ſodainly in the ſelf ſame place, where the firſt Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrū: becauſe becauſe the riuer being ouerflowen, they were oftentimes compelled to paſſe by bote to go to the market place, and they called this manner of ferrying ouer, Velatura. Other ſay, that thoſe tomblers and common players, which ſhewed ſundry games and paſtimes to winne the fauor of the people, were wont to couer that paſſage ouer with canuas clothes and veyles, by which they goe from the market place to the liſtes or ſhew place where they runne their horſes, beginning their race euen at the place: and they call a veyle in their tongue, Velum. This is the cauſe why the ſecond Laurentia is honoured at Rome. Fauſtulus chiefe neat-heard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children and no body knew it, as ſome ſay: or as other report, (and likeſt to be true) with the priuity and knowledge of Numitor, Amulius brother, who ſecretly furniſhed them with money that brought vp the two young children. It is ſaid alſo they were both conueyed vnto the city of the GABIANS, where they were brought vp at ſchoole, and taught all other honeſt things, which they vſe to teach the ſonnes and children of good and noble men. Further they ſay they were named Remus and Romulus, becauſe they were foũd ſucking on the teates of a Wolfe. Now the beauty of their bodies did preſently ſhew, beholding onely but their ſtature and manner of their countenaunces, of what nature and linage they were: and as they grew in yeares, their manly courage increaſed marueilouſly, ſo as they became ſtout and hardy men, in ſo much as they were neuer troubled or aſtonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romulus had more wit & vnderſtanding then his brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deale with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limites of their paſtures: it was eaſily diſcerned in him, that he was borne to command, and not to obey. For this cauſe they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, and of thoſe which were their inferiors. As for the kings heardmen, they paſſed not much for them, ſaying that they were euen like them ſelues, and ſo ſeemed not to care a Pinne for their anger or diſpleaſure, but wholly gaue them ſelues to all gentlemanly exerciſes and trades, thinking to liue idlely and at eaſe without trauell, was neither comely nor cõuenient: but to exerciſe and harden their bodies with hunting, running, purſuing murderers and theeues, and to helpe thoſe which were oppreſſed with wrong and violence, ſhould be credite and commendation to them. By reaſon whereof, in very ſhort time they grew to great fame and renowne. And it fell out by chaunce there roſe ſome ſtrife and variance between the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in ſo much as thoſe that were Numitors, carried away by force ſome cattell of the others. Thother ſide would not beare that, but purſued faſt after, and beating them well fauoredly, they made them take their legges, and brought backe againe the greateſt part of the cattell they had caried away with them. Wherat Numitor ſtormed marueilouſly, but yet his men ſeemed to make but little account of it, and purpoſing reuenge, they gathered about them a good company of vacabounds (that had neither home nor reſting place) and certaine fugitiue bond men which they intiſed ill fauoredly, incouraging them to ſteale away from their maſters. Thus one day whileſt Romulus was buſie about ſome ſacrifice, (being a deuout man and religious, and well giuen to ſerue the goddes, and to learne to diuine and tell before hand what things ſhould happen and come to paſſe) it happened the heard men of Numitor to meete Remus very ſlenderly accompanied: ſo they fell vpon him ſodainely, blowes were dealt roundly on both ſides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the end proued the ſtronger part, and did take Remus by force, and carried him ſtraight before Numitor, alledging many complaintes and matters againſt him. Numitor durſt not puniſh him of his owne authority, becauſe he feared his brother Amulius, who was ſomewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earneſtly beſought him to doe him iuſtice, and not to ſuffer him being his owne brother, to receiue ſuch iniury of his men. There was not a man in the city of ALBA, but did greatly miſlike the iniury done to Numitor: and ſpake it openly, that he was no perſon to be offered ſuch a wrong. In ſo much as Amulius moued herewith, did deliuer Remus into his handes, to puniſhe him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his houſe, he began to conſider better of him, with admiration how goodly a young man he was, how in height and ſtrength of bodie he paſſed all the reſt of his people: and perceiuing in his face an aſſured conſtancy, and bold ſtedfaſt courage that yeelded not, nor was abaſhed for any daunger he ſaw toward him: and hearing alſo the report of his actes and manhood to be aunſwerable to that he ſaw: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion by ſome ſecret inſpiration of the goddes, which ordaine the depth of great matters) beganne partly by coniecture, and partly by chaunce to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his father and mother: ſpeaking to him in a more gentle wiſe, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to aunſwer, and be of better hope. Remus boldly anſwered him; Truely I will not hide the troth from thee, for thou ſeemeſt to me more worthy to be King, then thy brother Amulius. For thou enquireſt, and heareſt firſt before thou condemneſt: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill now, we thought we had beene the children of two of the Kings ſeruants, to wit of Fauſtulus and of Laurentia: I ſay we, becauſe my brother and I are two twinnes. But ſeeing we are now falſely accuſed vnto thee, aud by malicious ſurmiſed tales are wrongfully brought in daunger of our liues: we intend to diſcouer our ſelues, and to declare ſtraunge things vnto thee, whereof the preſent perill we ſtand now in, ſhall plainely prooue the troth. Men ſay that we haue beene begotten miraculouſly, foſtered and giuen ſucke more ſtraungely, and in our tender yeares were fed by birds and wild beaſts, to whom we were caſt out as a pray. For a Wolfe gaue vs ſucke with her teates, and an hitwaw (they ſay) brought vs little crummes, and put them in our mouthes, as we lay vppon the bancke by the riuer, where we were put in a trough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of copper, vppon the which are ſome letters engrauen halfe worne out, which peraduenture one day will ſerue for ſome tokens of knowledge (vnprofitable for our parents) when it ſhall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing theſe words, with the age the young man ſeemed to be of, and conſidering well his face: did not reiect the hope of his imagination that ſmiled on him, but handled the matter ſo, that he found means to ſpeake ſecretly with his daughter, notwithſtanding at that time ſhe was kept very ſtraightly. Fauſtulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was priſoner, and that the King had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor to do iuſtice, went to pray Romulus to helpe him, and told him then whoſe children they were: for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darke ſpeeches, and glawncing wiſe, and ſo much as ſufficed to put them in ſome hope. So Fauſtulus taking the trough with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great haſt, as marueilouſly affraide for the preſent daunger he thought Remus in. The Kings ſouldiers which warded at the gates of the city, beganne to gather ſome ſuſpition of Fauſtulus manner of cōmming: and he made him ſelfe to be the more ſuſpected, being queſtioned with about the cauſe of his repaire thither, that he ſaltred in his words: beſides, they eſpied his trough which he carried vnder his cloke. Now amongſt the warders, there was by chaunce one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be caſt away, and was preſent when they were left on the banke of the riuer to the mercy of fortune. This man knew the trough by and by, as well by the faſhion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who miſtruſted ſtraight that which was true in deed. So he did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Fauſtulus with him to haue him confeſſe the troth. Fauſtulus being in this perplexity, could not keepe all cloſe vpon examination, but did vtter out ſomewhat of the matter, and yet he told not all. For he plainely iuſtified the children were aliue: yet he ſaid they were farre from the city of ALBA, where they kept beaſtes in the fields. And as for the troughe, he was going to carry it to Ilia, becanſe ſhe had diuers times prayed him to let her ſee and feele it: to the end ſhe might be more aſſured of her hope, who promiſed her that one day ſhe ſhould ſee her children againe. So it chaunced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth vnto thoſe that are troubled, and doe any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to ſend one preſently (who in all other things was a very honeſt man, but a great friend of his brother Numitors) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aliue. This perſon being come to Numitors houſe, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witneſſe thereof, and of the good happe diſcouered vnto Numitor: whereupon he perſwaded him how to ſet vpon his brother, and to diſpatch the matter with ſpeede. So from that time forwards, he tooke their part. On the other ſide alſo the matter gaue them no leiſure to deferre their enterpriſe, although they had beene willing: for the whole caſe was ſomewhat blowne abroade. So Romulus then got ſtraight a power, and drew very neere the citie, & many of the citizens of ALBA went out to ioyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (ouer and beſides thoſe citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were diuided by hundreds, and euery hundred had his captaine who marched before his band, carying litle bundels of graſſe or of boughes tyed to the end of their poles. The LATINES call theſe bundels Manipulos, whereof it commeth that yet at this day in an armie of the Romaines, the ſouldiers which are all vnder one enſigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus ſturring vp thoſe that were within the citie, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the tyraunt Amulius fell in ſuch feare and agonie, that without prouiding any thing for his ſafetie, they came vpon him ſodainly in his palace, and ſlew him. Thus you heare how neere Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian do agree in reciting the ſtorie, who was the firſt in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the citie of ROME: howbeit there are that thinke they are all but fables and tales deuiſed of pleaſure. But me thinkes for all that, they are not altogether to be reiected or diſcredited, if we will conſider fortunes ſtrange effects vpon times, and of the greatneſſe alſo of the Romaine empire: which had neuer atchieued to her preſent poſſeſſed power and authoritie, if the gods had not from the beginning bene workers of the ſame, and if there had not alſo bene ſome ſtrange cauſe, and wonderfull foundation. Amulius being now ſlaine as before, and after that all things were appeaſed, and reduced to good order againe: Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the citie of ALBA, being no lords thereof, nor alſo would be lords of it, ſo long as their grandfather by the mothers ſide was aliue. Wherefore after they had reſtored him to his eſtate, and had done the honour and dutie they ought vnto their mother: they purpoſed to go and build a citie in thoſe places where they had beene firſt brought vp, for this was the honeſteſt culler they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced ſo to doe whether they would or not, for the great nnmber of baniſhed men, and fugitiue ſlaues which were gathered together by them for their ſtrength, who had bene vtterly loſt and caſt away, if they had bene once diſcharged by them. Therefore it was of neceſſity that they ſhould dwell by themſelues, ſeparated in ſome place, to keepe this number together and in ſome order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the citie of ALBA would not ſuffer ſuch baniſhed perſons and runnagates to be mingled amongeſt them, nor would receiue them into their citie to be free among them. All which appeareth ſufficiently: firſt, becauſe they tooke away women by force: and ſo not of inſolencie, but of neceſſitie, when they founde no man that would beſtow any of them. It is manifeſt alſo they did greatly honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their citie beganne a litle to be ſetled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitiues and afflicted perſons, which they called the temple of the god Aſylæus. Where there was ſanctuarie and ſafetie for all ſorts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the temple, for whom it was alledged they could not deliuer any bond mã to his maſter, nor detter to his creditor, nor murtherer to the iuſtice that was fled thither for ſuccour, becauſe the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expreſſely enioyned them to graunt ſanctuarie to all thoſe that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in ſhort ſpace their citie flouriſhed, and was repleniſhed, where at the firſt foundation of it, they ſay there was not aboue one thouſande houſes, as more at large hereafter ſhall be declared. When they came now to the building of their citie, Romulus and Remus the two brethren fell ſodainely at a ſtrife together about the place where the citie ſhould be builded. For Romulus built ROME, which is called foure ſquare, and would needes it ſhould remaine in the place which he had choſen. Remus his brother choſe another place very ſtrong of ſituation, vpon mount Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and now is called Rignarium. Notwithſtanding, in the end they agreed betweene themſelues, this controuerſie ſhould be decided by the flying of birds, which do giue a happie diuination of things to come. So being ſet in diuers places by themſelues to make obſeruation, ſome ſay that there appeared vnto Remus ſixe, and to Romulus twelue vulters. Other ſay that Remus truely ſaw ſixe, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he ſawe twiſe as many: but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelue in deede vnto Romulus, and this is the cauſe why the Romaines at this day in their diuinations and ſoothſayings of the flying of birds, doe maruellouſly obſerue the flying of the vulters. It is true which the hiſtoriographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth; that Hercules reioyced much when there appeared a vulter to him, being readie to begin any enterpriſe. For it is the ſoule of the world that doth leaſt hurt, and neuer marreth nor deſtroieth any thing that man doth ſowe, plante, or ſet: conſidering that ſhe feedeth on carion only, and doth neuer hurt nor kill any liuing thing. Alſo ſhe doth not pray vpon dead fowle, for the likeneſſe that is betweene them: where the eagles, the dukes and the ſakers, doe murther, kill, and eate thoſe which are of their owne kinde. And yet as Æſchylus ſayeth, Moreouer, other birdes are alwaies (as a man would ſay) before our eyes, and do dayly ſhewe them ſelues vnto vs: where the vulter is a very rare birde, and hardly to be ſeene, and men doe not eaſely finde their ayries. Which hath giuen ſome occaſion to holde a falſe opinion, that the vulters are paſſagers, and come into theſe partes out of ſtraunge countryes. The prognoſticators alſo thinke, that ſuch things which are not ordinarie, and but ſeldome ſeene, be not naturall, but miraculouſly ſent by the gods to prognoſticate ſomething. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had caſt a ditche, as it were for the wall about his citie, Remus did not onely ſcorne it, but hindered alſo his worke, and in the end for a mockerie lept ouer his wall. To conclude, he did ſo much, that at the laſt he was ſlaine there by Romulus owne handes as ſome ſaye: or as other holde opinion, by the hands of one of his men which was called Celer. In this fight they ſlew Fauſtulus, and Pliſtinus alſo his brother, who had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howſoeuer the matter fell out, this Celer abſented him ſelfe from ROME, and went into the countrie of THVSCANE. And they ſay, that men which are quicke, and ready vpon a ſodaine, tooke their names euer after vpon him, and were called Celeres. As amongeſt other, Quintus Metellus, after the death of his father, hauing in very fewe dayes made the people of ROME to ſee a combate of fenſers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the ſharpe, they ſurnamed him Celer, for that the ROMAINES maruelled how he could prepare his things in ſo ſhorte a time. Furthermore, Romulus hauing now buried his brother, and his other two bringers vp (called foſter fathers) in the place they call Remonia: beganne then to builde and laye the foundation of his citie, ſending for men out of THVSCANE, who did name and teache him particularly all the ceremonies he had to obſerue there, according to their lawes and ordinances as a great holy myſterie. And firſt of all they made a rounde ditche in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did caſt their chiefeſt and beſt things, which men vſe lawfully for good, and naturally as moſt neceſſarie. After that they did throwe alſo into it, a litle of the earth, from whence euery man came, and mingled theſe all together. This ditche in their ceremonies is called the worlde, in Latine Mundus, euen the ſelfe ſame name the Latines call the Vniuerſall. About this ditche they did trace the compaſſe of the citie they would builde, euen as one would draw a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the citie taketh a plough, to which he faſtened a culter or ploughe ſhare of braſſe, and ſo yoaked in the ploughe an oxe and a cowe, he himſelfe houlding the ploughe did make rounde about the compaſſe of the citie a deepe furrowe. Thoſe which followed him, had the charge to throwe the turues of earth inwarde into the citie, which the plough ſhare raiſed vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrowe thus caſt vp was the whole compaſſe of their walle, which they call in Latine Pomærium, by ſhortning of the ſyllables, for poſt murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they did take off the ploughe ſhare, and draw the ploughe, with leauing a certaine ſpace of earthe vnbroken vp: whereupon the ROMAINES thinke all the compaſſe of their walles holy and ſacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and ſanctified, they would haue had a conſcience through them to haue brought in, or caried out of the citie, any things neceſſarie for the life of man, that had not bene pure and cleane. Nowe they beleeue certainely, that this ceremonie of the foundation of their citie was made the one and twentie of Aprill: becauſe the ROMAINES do yet keepe that day holy day, and call it the feaſt the natiuitie of their countrie. On which day they did not in olde time ſacrifice any thing that had life, as eſteeming that day (which was the natiuitie of their citie) to be moſt meete to be kept cleane and pure from being polluted or defiled with any bloud. Notwithſtanding before ROME was builded, they had another feaſt called the ſheapeheards or heardmens holy day, which they did celebrate vpon the ſame daye, and called it Palilia. Nowe at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMAINES is cleane contrarie to the GRECIANS: yet for all this, they holde opinion for certaintie that the day on which Romulus founded his citie, was aſſuredly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada: that is to ſay, the thirtie day. On which there was ſeene an eclypſe of the moone, which they ſuppoſe was obſerued by the Poet Antimachus (borne in the citie of TEOS) in the thirteenth yeare of the ſixt Olympiade. Likewiſe in the time of Marcus Varro (as a man learned, and one that had redde as much of auncient ſtories as any ROMAINE) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great philoſopher and mathematician, who being giuen to the calculation of aſtronomie for the delight of ſpeculation only, wherein he was thought moſt excellent: it did fall out that Varro gaue him this queſtion, to ſearche out what hower and daye the natiuitie of Romulus was, who gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they doe in the reſolutions of certaine geometricall queſtions. For they ſay, that by the ſelfe ſame ſcience, one may tell before of things to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainely the hower of his natiuitie: and how one may tell alſo the hower of his natiuitie, when by accidents they know what hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius did the queſtion that Varro gaue him. And hauing throughly conſidered the aduentures, deedes, and geſtes of Romulus, howe long he liued, and how he dyed: all which being gathered and conferred together, he did boldly iudge for a certaintie, that he was conceiued in his mothers wombe, in the firſt yeare of the ſecond Olympiade, the three and twentie day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Chœac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which hower there was a whole eclypſe of the ſunne: And that he was borne into the world, the one and twentith of the moneth of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the riſing of the ſunne. And that ROME was begonne by him on the ninth day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Pharmuthi, and aunſwereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betweene two and three of the clocke in the morning. For they will ſay that a cittie hath his reuolution and his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man: and that they knew by the ſituation of the ſtarres, the day of her beginning and foundation. Theſe things and ſuch other like, peraduenture will pleaſe the readers better, for their ſtrangeneſſe and curioſitie, then offend or miſlike them for their falſehood. Now after that he had founded his citie, he firſt and formoſt did diuide in two companies, all thoſe that were of age to carie armour. In euery one of theſe companies there were three thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſemen: and they were called Legions, becauſe they were ſorted of the choſen men that were pyckt out amongeſt all the reſt for to fight. The remaine after theſe was called Populus, which ſignifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred counſellers of the beſt and honeſteſt men of the citie, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would ſay, the counſell of the auncients. So they were called Patricians, as ſome will ſaye, the counſaile of the fathers lawfull children, which few of the firſt inhabitants could ſhewe. It may be, ſome will ſay this name was giuen them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the ſanctuarie of their citie, which worde they vſe at this day in the ſelfe ſame ſignification: as one that followed Euander into ITALIE, was called Patron, becauſe he was pitifull, and relieued the poore and litle children, and ſo got himſelfe a name for his pitie and humanitie. But me thinkes it were more like the trothe to ſay, that Romulus did call them ſo, becauſe he thought the chiefeſt men ſhould haue a fatherly care of the meaner ſorte: conſidering alſo it was to teache the meaner ſorte that they ſhould not feare the authoritie of the greater, nor enuie at their honours they had, but rather in all their cauſes ſhould vſe their fauour and good will, by taking them as their fathers. For euen at this preſent, ſtraungers call thoſe of the Senate, lordes or captaines: but the naturall ROMAINES call them, Patres Conſcripti, which is a name of fatherhead and dignitie without enuie. It is true, that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but ſithence, becauſe they were many ioyned vnto the firſt, they haue bene named Patres Conſcripti, as a man ſhould ſay, fathers of recorde together: which is the honourableſt name he could haue deuiſed to make a difference betwixt the Senatours, and the people.

Furthermore, he made a difference betweene the cheefer citizens, and the baſer people, by calling the better ſorte Patroni, as much to ſaye, as defenders: and the meaner ſorte Clientes, as you would ſay, followers, or men protected. This did breede a maruellous great loue and good will among them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutuall curteſies and pleaſures: for the Patrons did helpe the clients to their right, defended their cauſes in iudgement, did giue vnto them counſaile, and did take all their matters in hand. The clients againe enterchaungeably humbled themſelues to their patrons, not onely in outwarde honour and reuerence towardes them, but otherwiſe did helpe them with money to marrie and aduaunce their daughters, or els to pay their debts and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no lawe nor magiſtrate that could compell the patron to be a witneſſe againſt his client: nor yet the client to witneſſe againſt his patron. So they increaſed, and continued, all other rights and offices of amitie and friendſhip together, ſauing afterwards they thought it a great ſhame and reproache for the better, and richer, to take reward of the meaner and poorer.

And thus of this matter we haue ſpoken ſufficiently. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the citie was layed, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauiſhment of women. There are ſome which lay it vpon Romulus, who being then of nature warlike, and geuen to prophecies and aunſwers of the goddes, foretolde that his citie ſhould become very great and mightie, ſo as he raiſed it by warres, and increaſed it by armes: and he ſought out this colour to do miſchiefe, and to make war vpon the SABYNES.

To proue this true, ſome ſay he cauſed certaine of their maides by force to be taken away, but not paſt thirtie in number, as one that rather ſought cauſe of warres, then did it for neede of mariages: which me thinkes was not likely to be true, but rather I iudge the contrarie. For ſeeing his citie was incontinently repleniſhed with people of all ſorts, whereof there were very fewe that had wiues, and that they were men gathered out of all countries, and the moſt parte of them poore and needie, ſo as their neighbours diſdained them much, and did not looke they would long dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maides and rauiſhing them, to haue an entrie into alliance with the SABYNES, and to entiſe them further to ioyne with them in mariage, if they did gentlely intreate theſe wiues they had gotten, enterpriſed this violent taking of their maides, and rauiſhing of them in ſuch a ſorte.

Conſus a god.
Neptune the god of horſemen.

Firſt he made it to be commonly bruted abroad in euery place, that he had founde the altar of a god hidden in the grounde, and he called the name of the god, Conſus: either becauſe he was a god of counſaile, wherupon the ROMAINES at this day in their tongue call Conſilium, which we call counſell: and the chiefe magiſtrates of their citie Conſules, as we ſay counſellers. Other ſaye it was the altar of the god Neptune, ſurnamed the patron of horſes. For this altar is yet at this day within the great liſtes of the citie, and euer couered and hidden, but when they vſe the running games of their horſe race. Other ſay becauſe counſell euer muſt be kept cloſe and ſecret, they had good reaſon to keepe the altar of this god Conſus hidden in the ground. Nowe other write when it was opened, Romulus made a ſacrifice of wonderfull ioye, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in diuers places, that at ſuch a day there ſhould be common playes in ROME, and a ſolemne feaſt kept of the god Conſus, where all that were diſpoſed to come ſhould be welcome. Great numbers of people repaired thither from all partes. He himſelfe was ſet in the chiefeſt ſeate of the ſhowe place, apparelled faire in purple, and accompanied with the chiefe of his citie about him. And there hauing purpoſed this rauiſhment you haue heard of, he had giuen the ſigne before: that the ſame ſhould beginne, when he ſhould riſe vp and folde a plaite of his gowne, and vnfolde the ſame againe. Hereupon his men ſtood attending with their ſwordes: who ſo ſoone as they perceiued the ſigne was giuen, with their ſwords drawne in hand, and with great ſhowtes and cryes, ranne violently on the maydes and daughters of the SABYNES to take them awaye and rauiſhe them, and ſuffered the men to runne away, without doing them any hurt or violence. So ſome ſay, there were but thirtie rauiſhed, after whoſe names were called the thirtie linages of the people of Rome. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that there were fiue hundred and ſeuen and twentie: and Iuba, ſixe hundred foure ſcore & three. In the which is ſingularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he him ſelfe did take then but onely one of the maydes, named Herſilia: that afterwards was the onely cauſe and mediation of peace betwixt the Sabynes and the Romaines. Which argueth plainely, that it was not to doe the Sabynes any hurt, nor to ſatiſfie any diſordinate luſt, that they had ſo forcibly vndertaken this rauiſhment: but to ioyne two peoples together, with the ſtraighteſt bondes that could be betweene men. This Herſilia as ſome ſay, was maried vnto one Hoſtilius, the nobleſt man at that time amongſt the Romaines: or as others write, vnto Romulus himſelf, which had two children by her. The firſt was a daughter, and her name was Prima, becauſe ſhe was the firſt: the other was a ſonne, whō he named Aollius, becauſe of the multitude of people hee had aſſembled together in his citie, and afterwards he was ſurnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodotus the Troezenian writeth, wherein notwithſtanding there be diuers that doe contrarie him. Among thoſe which rauiſhed then the daughters of the Sabynes, it is ſaide there were founde certaine meane men carying away, a marueilous paſſing faire one. Theſe met by chance on the waye, certaine of the chiefe of the citie, who would haue taken her by force from them, which they had done, but that they beganne to cry, they caried her vnto Talaſsius, who was a young man marueilouſly well beloued of euerie body. Which when the others vnderſtoode, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: in ſo much as there were ſome which ſodainely turned backe againe, and did accompanie them for Talaſsius ſake, crying out alowd, and often on his name. From whence the cuſtome came, which to this day the Romaines ſing at their mariages, Talaſsius, like as the Grecians ſing Hymenæus. For it is ſayde he was counted very happie that he met with this woman. But Sextius Sylla a Carthaginian borne, a man very wiſe, and well learned, tolde me once it was the cry and ſigne which Romulus gaue to his men, to beginne the rauiſhment: whereupon thoſe which caried them away, went crying this word Talaſsius, and that from thence the cuſtome hath continued, that they ſing it yet at their mariages. Neuertheleſſe the moſt part of authors, ſpecially Iuba, thinkes it is a warning to remember the new maried women of their worke, which is to ſpinne, which the Grecians cal Talaſsia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if it be true the Romaines vſed this terme of Talaſsia, as we of Grece do vſe: we might by coniecture yeeld another reaſon for it, which ſhould carrie a better likelihoode and proofe. For when the Sabynes after the battell, had made peace with the Romaines, they put in an article in fauour of the women in the treatie, that they ſhould not be bound to ſerue their husbandes in any other worke, but in ſpinning of wolle. Euer ſince this cuſtome hath growen, that thoſe which giue their daughters in mariage, and thoſe who leade the bride, and ſuch as are preſent at the wedding, ſpeake in ſport to the newe maried wife, laughing, Talaſsius: in token that they doe not leade the bride for any other worke or ſeruice, but to ſpinne wolle. Thereof this hath bene the vſe to this day, that the bride doth not of her ſelfe come ouer the threſhold of her husbandes doore, but ſhe is hoyſed pretily into the houſe: becauſe the Sabyne women at that time were ſo lift vp, and caried away by force. They ſay alſo, that the manner of making the ſhed of the new wedded wiues haire, with the Iron head of a Iaueling, came vp then likewiſe: this ſtorie being a manifeſt token that theſe firſt mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the ſwords point: as we haue written more at large in the booke, wherein we render and ſhew the cauſes of the Romaines faſhions and cuſtomes. This rauiſhment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the moneth then called Sextilis, and now named Auguſt: on which day they yet celebrate the feaſt they call Conſalia. Now the Sabynes were good men of warre, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within incloſed walles: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did feare nothing, and as thoſe who were deſcended from the Lacedæmonians. Neuertheles, they ſeeing themſelues bound and tyed to peace by pledges & hoſtages, that were very neere allyed vnto them, and fearing their daughters ſhould be ill intreated: ſent ambaſſadours to Romulus, by whom they made reaſonable offers and perſwaſions, that their daughters might be deliuered vnto them againe, without any force or violence, and then afterwardes, that he would cauſe them to be asked in mariage of their parents, as both reaſon and lawe would require. To the end that with good will and conſent of all parties, both peoples might contract amitie and alliance together. Whereunto Romulus made aunſwere, he could not reſtore the maydes which his people had taken away and maried: but moſt friendly he prayed the Sabynes to be contented with their alliance. This anſwere being returned, & not liked, whileſt the princes and communaltie of the Sabynes were occupied in conſultation, and about the arming of themſelues: Acron king of the Ceninenses (a man exceeding couragious and skilfull in the warres, and one that from the beginning miſtruſted the ouer bold & ſtout enterpriſes that Romulus was likely to attempt, cōſidering the late rauiſhment of the Sabynes daughters, and how he was alreadie greatly dreaded of his neighbours, and ſomewhat vntolerable, if he were not chaſticed and brought lower) firſt beganne to inuade him with a puiſſant armie, and to make hotte and violent warres vpon him. Romulus on the other ſide prepared alſo, and went foorth to meete him. When they were come ſo neere together that they might ſee one another, they ſent defiance to ech other, and prayed that they two might fight man to man amiddeſt their armies, and neither of theirs to ſturre a foote. Both of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his prayer vnto Iupiter, did promiſe, and made a vow: that if he did giue him the victorie to ouercome, he would offer vp to him the armour of his enemie, which he did. For firſt he ſlew Acron in the field, and afterwards gaue battell to his men, and ouerthrew thē alſo. Laſtly he tooke his citie, where he did no hurt nor yet diſpleaſure to any, ſauing that he did commaund them to pull downe their houſes, and deſtroy them, and to goe dwell with him at Rome: where they ſhould haue the ſelfe ſame rights & priuiledges which the firſt inhabitants did enioy. There was nothing more enlarged the citie of Rome, then this manner of pollicie, to ioyne alwayes vnto it thoſe ſhe had ouercome and vanquiſhed. Romulus now to diſcharge his vow, and in ſuch ſort that his offering might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleaſant to his citizens to behold: did cut downe a goodly ſtraight growen young oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lye. The ſame he trimmed and did ſet forth after the manner of victorie, hanging and tying all about it in fayre order, the armour and weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gowne to him, & putting vpon his long buſh of hayre, a garland of lawrell, layd the young oke vpon his right ſhoulder, and he firſt marched before towards his citie, and ſung a royall ſong of victorie, all his armie following him in armes vnto the citie in order of battell: where his citizens receiued him in all paſſing wiſe and triumph. This noble and ſtately entry euer ſince hath giuen them mindes in ſuch ſort, and in ſtatelier wiſe to make their triumph. The offering of this triumph was dedicated to Iupiter ſurnamed Feretrian: becauſe the Latine word Ferire, ſignifieth to hurt & kill: and the prayer Romulus had made, was, he might hurt & kill his enemie. Such ſpoyles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore ſayth Varro, that opes ſignifie riches. Howbeit me thinks it were more likely to ſay, that they were ſo named of this worde Opus, which betokeneth a deede, becauſe he muſt needes be the chiefe of the armie, that hath ſlaine with his owne hands the generall of his enemies, and that muſt offer the ſpoyles called Spolia opima, as you would ſay, his principall ſpoyles and deeds. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captaines only: of the which Romulus was the firſt, who ſlew Acron, king of the Ceninenses. Cornelius Coſſus was the ſecond, who killed Tolumnius, the generall of the Thuscans. Clodius Marcellus was the third, who ſlew Britomartus, king of the Gavles, with his owne hands. And for the two laſt, Coſſus & Marcellus, they made their entry into the citie, carying their triumphes vpon charets triumphant: but Romulus did not ſo. Therefore in this point Dionyſius the hiſtoriographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into Rome vpon a charret triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priſcus the ſonne of Demaratus, who firſt did ſet out triumphs in ſo ſtately & magnificent ſhow. Other hold opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the firſt that euer entred vpon triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his ſtatues are yet to be ſeene in Rome, carying his triumph a foote. After this ouerthrow & taking of the Ceninenses, the inhabitants of the cities of Fidena, Crvstvmerivm, and Antemna, roſe altogether againſt the ROMAINES whiles the other SABYNES alſo were a preparing themſelues. So they fought a battell, in which they tooke the ouerthrow: & left their cities to the ſpoyle of Romulus, their lands to be giuen where he thought good, & themſelues to be caried to ROME. Romulus then did giue their lands among his citizens, except thoſe lands which did belong to the fathers of the maidens that they had taken away & rauiſhed. For he was contented that the fathers of them ſhould keepe ſtill their lands. By & by the other SABYNES ſtomaking thereat, did chuſe them a generall called Tatius, & ſo went with a puiſſant armie toward the citie of ROME, whereunto to approch at that time it was very hard, the caſtle or keepe of their city being ſeated, where at this day the Capitoll ſtandeth, within which there was a great garriſon, whereof Tarpeius was captaine, & not his daughter Tarpeia, as ſome will ſay, who ſet out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the captaines daughter, for the deſire ſhe had to haue all the gold bracelets which they did weare about their armes, ſold the fort to the SABYNES, and asked for reward of her treaſon, all they did weare on their left armes. Tatius promiſed them vnto her: and ſhe opened them a gate in the night, by the which ſhe did let all the SABYNES into the caſtle. Antigonus then was not alone, who ſayd, he loued thoſe which did betray, & hated them that had betrayed: nor yet Cæſar Auguſtus, who told Rymitalces the THRACIAN, that he loued treaſon, but he hated traytors. And it is a common affection which we beare to wicked perſons, whileſt we ſtand in neede of them: not vnlike for all the worlde to thoſe which haue neede of the gall and poyſon of venemous beaſts. For when they finde it, they are glad, & take it to ſerue their turne: but after their turne is ſerued, & they haue that they ſought, they hate the crueltie of ſuch beaſts. So played Tatius at that time. For when he was gotten into the caſtle, he commanded the SABYNES (for performance of his promiſe he had made to Tarpeia) they ſhould not ſticke to giue her all they weare on their left armes, & to do as he did: who taking from his owne arme firſt, the bracelets which he ware, did caſt it to her, and his target after. And ſo did all the reſt in like ſort, in ſo much as being borne down to the ground by the weight of bracelets & targets, ſhe died as preſſed to death vnder her burden. Neuertheles Tarpeius ſelfe was atteinted, and condemned alſo of treaſon, by Romulus order, as Iuba ſaith, it is ſet forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write now otherwiſe of Tarpeia, ſaying ſhe was the daughter of Tatius, general of the SABYNES, & was forced by Romulus to lie with him, & how ſhe was puniſhed in this ſort by her owne father after her ſaid treaſon committed: thoſe I ſay, amongſt whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the Poet Simylus alſo doth dote moſt, who ſayth Tarpeia ſold the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom ſhe was in loue: as in theſe verſes doth appeare.

This mayden therefore being buried in the ſame place, the whole hill was called afterwards Tarpeius after her name, which continued vntill Tarquinius the King did dedicate all the place to Iupiter: for then they caried her bones into ſome other place, and ſo it loſt her name. Onles it be that rocke of the Capitoll, which at this preſent time they call Rupes Tarpeia, from the toppe whereof they were wont in old time to throwe downe headlong all wicked offenders.

When the Sabynes now had gotten this holde, Romulus being exceeding wrath, ſent them a defiance, and bad them battell if they durſt. Tatius ſtraight refuſed not, conſidering if by miſchaunce they were diſtreſſed, they had a ſure refuge to retire vnto. The place betweene the two armies where the fight ſhould be, was all round about enuironed with litle hilles. So as it was plaine, the fight could not be but ſharpe and daungerous, for the diſcõmodiouſnes of the place, where was neither ground for any to flie, nor yet any ſpace for any long chaſe, it was of ſo ſmall a compaſſe. Now it fortuned by chaunce, the riuer of Tyber had ouerflowen the bankes a few dayes before, and there remained in it a deeper mudde then men would haue iudged, becauſe the ground was ſo plaine, and was euen where the great market place of Rome ſtandeth at this day. They could diſcerne nothing thereof by the eye, becauſe the vpper part of it was cruſted, whereby it was the more readie for them to venter vpon, and the worſe to get out, for that it did ſinke vnderneath. So the Sabynes had gone vpon it, had not Curtius daunger bene, which by good fortune ſtayed them. He was one of the nobleſt and valianteſt men of the Sabynes, who being mounted vpon a courſer, went on a good way before the armie. This courſer entring vpon the cruſted mudde, & ſincking with all, began to plunge and ſtruggle in the myre: whereat Curtius proued a while with the ſpurre to ſturre him, and get him out, but in the end ſeeing it would not be, he left his backe, and ſaued him ſelfe. The ſame very place to this day is called after his name, Lacus Curtius. The Sabynes then ſcaping thus this daunger, beganne the battell. The fight did grow very cruell, and endured ſo a great while, the victorie leaning no more to the one ſide then to the other. There dyed in a ſmall ſpace a great number of men, amongeſt whom Hoſtilius was one, who as they ſay was the husband of Herſilia, and grandfather to Hoſtilius that was king of Romaines after Numa Pompilius. Afterwards there were (as we may thinke) many other encounters and battels betweene them: howbeit they make mention of the laſt aboue all the reſt, wherein Romulus had ſo ſore a blow on his head with a ſtone, that he was almoſt felled to the ground, in ſo much as he was driuen to retire a little out of the battel. Vpon which occaſion the Romaines gaue backe alſo, and drew towards mount Palatine, being driuen out of the plaine by force. Romulus beganne now to recouer of the blow he had receiued, and ſo returned to giue a new onſet, and cryed out all he might to his ſouldiers to tarie, and ſhew their face againe to their enemie. But for all his lowd crying, they left no flying ſtill for life; and there was not one that durſt returne againe. Whereupon Romulus lifting vp his handes ſtraight to heauen, did moſt feruently pray vnto Iupiter, that it would pleaſe him to ſtay the flying of his people, and not ſuffer the Romaines glorie thus to fall to their vtter deſtruction, but to repaire it by his fauour againe. He had no ſooner ended his prayer, but diuers of his men that fled, beganne to be aſhamed to flie before their King, and a ſodaine boldnes came vpon them, and their feare therewithall vaniſhed away. The place they firſt ſtayed in was, whereas now is the temple of Iupiter Stator, which is as much to ſay, as Iupiter the ſtayer. Afterwards gathering themſelues together againe, they repulſed the Sabynes euen to the place they call now Regia, and vnto the temple of the goddeſſe Veſta: where both the battels being prepared to giue a new charge, there did fall out before them, a ſtraunge and vncredible thing to ſee, which ſtayed them they fought not. For of the Sabyne women whom the Romaines had rauiſhed, ſome ranne of the one ſide, other of the other ſide of the battels, with lamentations, cryes, & ſhowts, ſtepping betweene their weapons, and among the ſlaine bodies on the ground, in ſuch ſort that they ſeemed out of their wits, and caried as it were with ſome ſpirites. In this manner they went to find out their fathers and their husbandes, ſome carying their ſucking babes in their armes, other hauing their hayre looſe about their eyes, and all of them calling, now vpon the Sabynes, now vpon the Romaines, with the genteleſt names that could be deuiſed: which did melt the hearts of both parties in ſuch ſort, that they gaue backe a little, and made them place betweene both the battels. Then were the cryes and lamentations of euery one plainely heard. There was not a man there but it pittied him, aſwell to ſee them in that pitifull caſe, as to heare the lamentable wordes they ſpake: adding to their moſt humble petitions and requeſtes that could be any way imagined, paſſing wiſe perſwaſions and reaſons to induce them to a peace. you,that we ſhould deſerue ſuch an heape of euils , as we haue already ſuffered, and yet you make vs beare? we were as you know violently(and againſt all law)rauiſhed by thoſe,whoſe now we remain. But our fathers,our brethren,our mothers and friends haue left vs with them ſo long , that proceſſe of time , and the ſtraighteſt bonds of the world, haue tyed vs now ſo faſt to them, whom mortally before we hated, that we are conſtrayned now to be flighted thus,to ſee them fight,yea and to lament & die with them,who before vniuſtly tooke vs from you. For then you came not to our reſcue when we were virgins vntouched,nor to recouer vs from them when they wickedly aſſaulted vs, poore ſoules : but now ye come to take the wiues from their husbands,& the mothers from their litle children. So as the helpe ye thinke to giue vs now doth grieue vs more, then the forſaking of vs was ſorrowfull to vs then. Such is the loue they haue borne vnto vs, and ſuch is the kindneſſe we beare againe to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other cauſe then for vs, yet were it reaſon ye ſhould let fall your armes for our ſakes (by whom you are made grandfathers and fathers in law, coſins and brothers in law)euen from thoſe againſt whom you now bend your force. But if all this war beganne for vs, we heartely beſeech you then that you will receiue vs with your ſonnes in law, and your ſonnes by them, and that you will reſtore vnto vs our fathers, our brethren , our kinſefolks and friends, without ſpoyling vs of our husbands,of our children,and of our ioyes, and thereby make vs woefull captiues and priſoners in our mindes. Theſe requeſts and perſwaſions by Herſilia,and other the SABINE women being heard, both the armies ſtaied, and held euery body his hand,and ſtraight the two generalles imparled together. During which parle they brought their husbãds and their children,to their fathers and their brethren.They brought meat and drinke for them that would eate. They dreſſed vp the woundes of them that were hurt. They caried them home with them to their houſes. They ſhewed them how they were miſtreſſes there with their husbands. They made them ſee how greatly they were accoumpted of and eſteemed;yea how with a wedlocke loue and reputation they were honored. So in the end peace was concluded betweene them, wherein it was articled,that the SABINE women which would remaine with their husbands ſhould tarrie ſtill,and be exempted from all work or ſeruice(as aboue recited)ſaue only ſpinning of woll. And that the SABINES & ROMAINES ſhould dwell together in the city,which ſhould be called ROMA,after Romulus name: & the inhabitants ſhould be called Quirites, after the name of the city of Tatius king of the SABINES,& that they ſhould raigne & gouern together by a common conſent. The place where this peace was concluded,is called yet to this day Comitium : becauſe that Coire, in the Latine tongue ſignifieth to aſſemble. So the city being augmented by the one halfe, they did chooſe of the SABINES another hũdred new PATRICIANS,vnto the firſt hũdred of the ROMAINES that were choſen before. Then were the Legions made of ſix thouſand footmen,and ſix hundred horſemẽ. After they deuided their inhabitãts into three Tribes, wherof thoſe that came of Romulus, were called Ramnenſes after his name: thoſe that came of Tatius were called Tatienſes after his name:and thoſe that were of the third ſtock,were called Lucerenſes,as from the Latine word Lucus,called with vs a groue in Engliſh,becauſe thither great number of people of all ſorts did gather, which afterwards were made citizens of ROME. The very word of Tribus (which ſignifieth bands, warres, or hundreds)doth witneſſe this beginning of ROME from wards, or hundreds.For hereupon the ROMAINES call thoſe at this day, their Tribunes, which are the chiefe heades of the people. But euery one of theſe principall wardes had afterwards ten other particular wards vnder them,which ſome thinke were called after the names of the thirtie SABINE women that were rauiſhed:but that ſeemeth falſe, becauſe many of them cary the names of the places they came frõ.Howbeit at that time many things were ſtabliſhed and ordained in honor of women : as to giue them place, the vpper hand in meeting them, the vpper hand in ſtreets:to ſpeake no fowle or diſhoneſt word before them, no man to vnray himſelf,or ſhew naked before them:that they ſhould not be called before criminall iudges ſitting vpõ homicides & murderers:that their children ſhould weare about their necks a kind of a Iuel,called Bulla,faſhioned in mãner like theſe water bubbles that riſe vpõ the water whẽ it beginneth to rain:& that their gowns ſhould be garded with purple. Now the two kings did not ſtraight confer together ſo ſoone as any occaſiõ of buſines was offered them,but either of them did firſt counſell alone with his hundred Senatours,and afterwards they did all aſſemble together.

The holy cornell tree.

Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the temple of Iuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this preſent,the ſtaires of the faire banke,then the deſcent of mount Palatine, as they go to the ſhow place or great liſtes, where they ſay was ſometime the holy cornell tree, whereof they make ſo great account. Romulus one day deſirous to proue his ſtrength, threw (as it is ſaide)a dart from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine. The ſtaffe whereof was of a cornell tree:and the Iron of it entred ſo deepe into the ground being a luſty fat ſoile, that no man could pull it out,although many proued it, & did the beſt they could.The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did ſo nouriſh the end of this ſtaffe, that it tooke root, and beganne to ſpread braunches: ſo that in time it became a faire great cornell tree, which the ſucceſſors of Romulus did incloſe with a wall,and did keepe and worſhip it as a very holy thing.If by chaunce any went to ſee it,and found it looked not freſh and greene,but like a tree withered and dried away for lacke of moiſture: he went away ſtraight as one affraide, crying to all he met(& they with him went crying ſtill) in euery place,water, water,as it had ben to haue quenched a fire. Then ranne they thither out of all quarters with veſſels of water, to water and moiſt the tree. In the time of Caius Cæſar, who cauſed the ſtaires about it to be repaired: they ſay the labourers rayſing the place, and digging about this cornell tree,did by negligence hurt the rootes of the ſame in ſuch ſort, as afterwardes it dried vp altogether.

The Sabines vſed the Romaines monethes.

Now the SABINES receiued the moneths after the manner of the ROMAINES,whereof we haue written ſufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vſed the SABINES ſhields: and both he and his people chaunged the faſhion of their armour and weapons they vſed. For the ROMAINES before did cary litle ſhields after the faſhion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy daies and ſacrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them, which either the one or the other people obſerued before, but they added thereunto ſome other new.

Feaſts, Matronalia, Carmentalia, Carmenta.

As that which they call Matronalia, which was inſtituted in honour of the women,becauſe by their meanes peace was cocluded. And that alſo of Carmentalia,in the honour of Carmenta,whom ſome ſuppoſe to be the goddeſſe of fate or deſtiny, becauſe ſhee hath rule & power ouer the natiuities of men,by reaſon whereof, the mothers call vpon her often, & reuerence her very much.Other ſay ſhe was the wife of Euander the Arcadian, who being a propheteſſe inſpired by the god Phœbus,gaue the oracles in verſe, whereupon ſhe was ſurnamed Carmenta,becauſe that Carmina in Latine ſignifie verſes:for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicoſtrata.Howbeit there are ſome which giue another manner of deriuation and interpretation of this word Carmenta,which is the liklier to be true:as if they would ſay, Carens mente: which ſignifieth wanting wit,for the very furie that taketh thē when they are inſpired with the propheticall ſpirite. For in Latine Carere betokeneth to lacke:and Mens, ſignifieth wit.

As for the feaſt of Palilia, we haue told of it before: but the feaſt of Lupercalia, conſidering the time of celebrating thereof,it ſeemeth it is ordeined for a purification.For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate daies of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging daies. The daies in the old time on which they did celebrate the ſame, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feaſt, is as much to ſay, as the feaſt of Wolues. Wherefore it ſeemeth to be a feaſt of great antiquity, and inſtituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Euander:albeit the name of Wolues is as common to the females,as the males,and ſo it might perhaps be called,by reaſon of the Wolfe that brought vp R*omulus*. For we ſee thoſe which runne vp and down the city that day,and they call Luperci,do beginne their courſe in the very place where they ſay R*omulus* was caſt out.Howbeit many things are done,whereof the originall cauſe were hard now to be coniectured. For goates about a certaine time of the yeare, are killed,then they bring two yong boies,noble mens ſons,whoſe foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloud of the goates that are ſacrificed. By and by they dry their forheads with woll dipped in milke. Then the young boyes muſt laugh immediatly after they haue dried their forheads. That done,they cut the goates ſkinnes,& make thongs of thē,which they take in their hands,and run with them all about the city ſtarke naked (ſauing they haue a cloth before their ſecrets)and ſo they ſtrike with theſe thonges all they meete in their way. The young wiues doe neuer ſhunne them at all,but are well cōtented to be ſtriken with them, beleeuing it helpeth them to be with childe, and alſo to be eaſily deliuered. There is another thing yet in this feaſt, that theſe LVPERCIANS which runne about the city, do alſo ſacrifice a dog. Concerning this feaſt, the Poet named Butas doth write ſomewhat in his elegies, where ſhewing the occaſion of the fond cuſtomes and ceremonies of the ROMAINES, he doth ſay that Romulus after that he had ſlaine Amulius, did runne ſtraight with great ioy to the very place where the Wolfe gaue him & his brother ſucke, in memory of which running, he ſaith this feaſt of Lupercalia was celebrated: and that the noble mens yonger ſons doe run through the city ſtriking and laying on them which they meete in their way with their goate thongs, in token that Remus and Romulus ranne from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawn ſwords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a blouddy knife, is in remembrance of the daunger they ſtoode in at that time to haue bene ſlaine. Laſt of all, the drying of their foreheads with wolle dipped in milke, is in memory of the milke they ſucked of the Wolues. But Caius Acilius writeth, that Remus and Romulus before ROME was built, did happen to loſe their beaſts on a day, and after they had made certaine prayers vnto Faunus for the finding of them, they ran here and there ſtarke naked as they went a ſeeking of them, for feare they ſhould haue bene troubled with ouermuch heat and ſweating. And this is the cauſe he ſaith, why the LVPERCIANS do at this day runne about naked. And if it be true, they make this ſacrifice for a purging, a man might ſay they might offer vp a dog for that purpoſe, like as the GRECIANS in their ſacrifices of purgation, do vſe to cary out all their dogs. And in many places they doe obſerue this ceremony, to driue out the dogs, which they call Periſcylaciſmes. Otherwiſe, if it be of a thankefulneſſe to the Wolfe that gaue Romulus ſuck, & ſaued him from periſhing, that the ROMAINES do ſolemnize this feaſt; it is not impertinent they ſhould ſacrifice a dog, becauſe he is an enemy to the Wolues. Vnleſſe a man wold ſay it was to puniſh this beaſt, which troubleth and letteth the LVPERCIANS when they runne. Some ſay alſo it was Romulus, who firſt inſtituted it a religion to keepe holy fire, & that firſt ordained holy virgins, which are called Veſtales: other do aſcribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithſtanding it is moſt certaine otherwiſe, that Romulus was a very deuout man, & greatly skilfull in telling of things to come by the flying of birds: for which cauſe he did ordinarily cary the augurs crooked ſtaffe, called in latin Lituus. It is a rod crooked at the end, wherewith the augurs or ſoothſaiers whẽ they ſit down to behold the flying of birds, do point out & mark the quarters of the heauen. They carefully kept it within the pallace: howbeit it was loſt in the time of wars with the GAVLES, when the city of ROME was taken. Afterwards when theſe barbarous people were chaſed and driuen out, it was found againe (as it is ſaid) all whole, within a great hill or heape of aſhes, hauing no manner of hurt, where all things elſe about it had beene conſumed & marred with the fire. He is ſaide to haue made certaine lawes, among which there is one that ſeemeth ſomewhat hard, which is: that the man is ſuffered to put away his wife, and in ſome caſe to giue her nothing: and like liberty is not giuen to the wife to put away her husband. As if ſhe may be proued to haue conſented to the poyſning of her children, or to haue counterfaited her husbauds keyes or to haue committed adultery. But if he put her away for any other cauſe, thẽ the one halfe of the goods is adiudged to the wife, and the other moity to the goddeſſe Ceres: and he that putteth away his wife after this ſort, is commãded further to ſacrifice to the goddes of the earth. This alſo was notable in Romulus, who hauing ordained no paine nor puniſhmẽt for parricides (that is, for thoſe that kill their parents) called yet all murther parricide, to ſhew how deteſtable that murther was, and as for parricides, he thought it vnpoſſible. And it ſemed a great while, he had reaſon to thinke ſo, that ſuch wickednes would neuer happen in the world. For in ſixe hundred yeares together it was not knowen that any man in ROME committed ſuch an offence: and the firſt parricide with them was Lucius Oſtius, after the warres of Hanniball. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the firſt yeare of the raigne of Tatius, ſome of his kinſemen and friends met by chaunce on the way certaine ambaſſadours, comming from the city of LAVRENTVM vnto ROME, whom they ſet vppon, and ment to haue robbed them. The ambaſſadours reſiſting them, and not willing to deliuer their money, they made no more a doe, but ſlew them. This haynous deede being thus commited, Romulus was of opinion they ſhould be executed openly in the high way for example. But Tatius deferred it ſtill from day to day, and did alwayes excuſe the matter vnto him, which was the only cauſe, they fell out one with the other. For in all things els, they caried them ſelues as honeſtly as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a common conſent and good accord. But the parents and kinſefolks of thoſe who were murdered, when they ſaw they could haue no iuſtice becauſe of Tatius: watched him one day as he ſacrificed with Romulus, in the city of Lauinium, and ſtabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather prayſed him for a good and righteous prince.

The death of Tatius in Lauinium.

Romulus cauſed the body of Tatius to be ſtraight taken vp, and buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place now called Armiluſtrium.

Armiluſtrium.

Further he neuer ſhewed any countenaunce to reuenge his death. There are ſome Hiſtoriographers that write, that thoſe of the city of Laurentum being afeard at this murder, did deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambaſſadours. He notwithſtanding did let them goe againe, ſaying: one murder was requited by another. This gaue ſome occaſion of ſpeach to thinke, he was glad he was ridde of his companion: yet the Sabines neither ſtirred nor rebelled for all this, but ſome of them were affraid of him for the great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honour they gaue him as a god, continuing ſtill in dutie & obedience towards him.

Diuers ſtrangers alſo had Romulus valiancie in great honour: as amongſt other, thoſe who then were called the auncient Latines, which ſent ambaſſadours to him to make league and amitie with him. He deuiſed to take the citie of FIDENA which was nere neighbour to ROME.

Romulus tooke the cittie of Fidnea.

Some ſay he tooke it vpon a ſodaine, hauing ſent before certain horſmen to breake downe the hookes and hinges with force, which the gates hang by: & himſelfe came after with the reſt of his armie, & ſtale vpon them, before the citie miſtruſted any thing. Other write that the FIDENATES firſt inuaded his countrie, & foraged vnto the very ſuburbes of ROME, where they did great harme: and how Romulus layed an ambuſh in their way as they returned home, and ſlew a great number of them. When he tooke their citie, he did not raſe it, but made a colony of it, (as a place to ſend the ouerincreaſe of ROME vnto) whither he ſent afterwards two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES to inhabite there: & it was on the thirtenth day of April, which the ROMAINS call the Ides of the ſame moneth.

Not long after there roſe ſuch a great plague in ROME, that men died ſodainly, & were not ſick: the earth brought forth no fruite: bruite beaſts deliuered no increaſe of their kind: there rained alſo drops of bloud in ROME, as they ſay. In ſo much as beſides the euils men felt in this extremitie, they fell in a marueilous feare of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiuing the like happened to the inhabitants of LAVRENTVM, then euery man iudged it was the very vengeance and heauie hand of the goddes, who plagued and puniſhed theſe two cities for the murder commited vpon Tatius, and the ambaſſadours that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both ſides were appehended and executed: and theſe plagues by and by ceaſed both in the one and the other city. Romulus beſides, did purifie the cities with certaine ſacrifices that he deuiſed, which they keepe ſtill at this day, at the gate called Ferentina. But before the plague ceaſed, the CAMERINES came to aſſault the ROMAINES, and had ouercome all the countrey, ſuppoſing they ſhould not be able to withſtand them, becauſe they had bene ſo ſore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithſtanding, Romulus ſet vpon them with his army, & wan the field of them, in which conflict there were ſlaine about ſixe thouſand men.

After the battell done, he tooke their city, & conueied to ROME the one halfe of the inhabitants that remained. After this, he ſent twiſe as many ROMAINES as there were naturall CAMERIANS left at CAMERINE, to dwell there among them. This was done the 1. day of Auguſt: ſo great was the multitude of the inhabitants of ROME that had encreaſed in 16. years frõ the firſt fõudation of the city. Among other ſpoils he got there, he carried away a charret of braſſe with four horſes, which he cauſed to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne ſtatue vpon it, and victory crowning him with a garland triũphãt. His power being growẽ thus great, his weake neighbours did ſubmit themſelues vnto him, being contented to liue in peace by him. His ſtronger neighbours were affraid of him, and enuied much his greatnes, and did take it no good policy to ſuffer him thus to riſe in the face of the world, and thought it meete ſpeedily to daunt his glory, and clip his wings. The firſt of the THVSCANES that bent their power againſt him, were the VEIANS, who had a great countrey, & dwelled in a ſtrong & mighty city. To picke a quarrell to him, they ſent to haue redeliuered to them the citie of FIDENA, which they ſaide belonged vnto thẽ. This was thought not only vnreaſonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, conſidering that al the while the FIDENATES were in war, & danger, the THVSCANS neuer came to their aide, but had ſuffered them to be ſlaine, and then came to demaunde their lands and tenements, when other had poſſeſſion of them. Therefore Romulus hauing giuen them an anſwere full of mockerie, and deriſion, they diuided their power into two armies, and ſent the one againſt them of FIDENA, & with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went againſt the citie of FIDENA, preuayled, and killed there two thouſand ROMAINES: the other was ouerthrowen and diſcomfited by Romulus, in which there died eight thouſande VEIANS. Afterwards, they met againe ſomewhat neere the citie of the FIDENATES, where they fought a battell: and all did confeſſe, the chiefeſt exployt was done by Romulus owne hands that day, who ſhewed all the skill and valiantnes that was to be looked for in a worthy captaine. It ſeemed that day, he farre exceeded the common ſort of men, in ſtrength of bodie & feats of armes. Neuertheles that which ſome ſay, is hardly to be credited: and to be plaine, is out of all compaſſe of beliefe and poſſibilitie. For they write, there were fourteene thouſand men ſlaine at that battell, & that more then halfe of them were ſlaine by Romulus owne hands: & the rather, for that euery man iudgeth it a vaine bragge and oſtentation which the MESSENIANS report of Ariſtomenes, who offered in ſacrifice to the goddes three hundred beaſtes of victorie, as for ſo many LACEDÆMONIANS himſelfe had ſlaine in the battell. Their armie being thus broken, Romulus ſuffered them to flie who by ſwiftneſſe could ſaue themſelues, and marched with all his power in good array towards their citie. The citizens then conſidering their late great loſſe and ouerthrowe, would not hazard the danger of withſtanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition and ſute for peace. All was granted them for a hundred yeres, ſaue they ſhould forgo their territorie called Septemagium, that was the ſeuenth part of their countrie: & yeeld to the ROMAINES all their ſalt houſes by the riuers ſide, and deliuer fiftie of their chiefeſt citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entrie and triumphe into ROME for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the ſame moneth, leading in his triumphe many priſoners taken in thoſe wars: and among other, the generall of the VEIANS, a very auncient man who fondly behaued himſelfe in his charge, and ſhewed by his doings, that his experience was farre ſhort for his yeares in the warres. And from thence it commeth, when they offer to the goddes to giue thankes for this victorie, that euen at this day, they bring to the capitoll through the market place, an olde man apparelled in a purple robe, & with a Iuell called Bulla about his neck, which the gentlemens young children weare about their neckes: & a herauld goeth hard by him, crying, who buieth who, the SARDIANIANS, bicauſe they hold opiniõ the THVSCANES are come of the SARDIANIANS, and the very citie of VEIES ſtandeth in the countrie of THVSCANE. This was the laſt warre that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almoſt to all thoſe, who by ſodaine proſperity, and fortunes ſpeciall fauour, are raiſed to high and great eſtate. For truſting to proſperity and good ſucceſſe of his actes, he beganne to grow more ſtraunge and ſtately, and to carry a ſowrer countenaunce then he was wont to doe before: leauing to be after his old manner, a curteous and gracious prince, and gaue him ſelfe in faſhions to be ſomwhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and ſtately port and maieſty that he caried. For he ware euer a coate of purple in graine, and vppon that, a long robe of purple colour: and gaue audience, ſitting in a wide chaire of eſtate, hauing euer about him young men called Celeres, as we would ſay, flights for their ſwiftnes & ſpeed in executing of his commandements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were tipſtaues in their hands, to make the people giue roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to bind faſt ſtreight, all the prince ſhould commaund. Now in old time the LATINES ſaid, Ligare was to bind: but at this preſent they ſay Alligare, from whence it commeth that the vſhers and ſergeants are called Lictores. Howbeit me thinkes it were more likely to ſay, they had put to a c, & that before they were called Litores, without a c. For they be the very ſame which the GRECIANS call Liturgos, and be in Engliſh, miniſters or officers: and at this day, Leitos, or Leos, in the GREEKE tong ſignifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numitor was dead at the citie of Alba, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to winne the fauour of the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Common weale, and euery yeare did chuſe a new magiſtrate to miniſter iuſtice to the Sabynes. This preſident taught the noble men of Rome to ſeeke and deſire to haue a free eſtate, where no ſubiect ſhould be at the commaundement of a King alone, and where euery man ſhould command & obey as ſhould be his courſe. Thoſe which were called Patricians in Rome, did medle with nothing, but had only an honorable name and robe, and were called to counſaile rather for a faſhion, then to haue their aduiſe or counſaile. For when they were aſſembled together, they did onely heare the Kings pleaſure and commaundement, but they might not ſpeake one word, and ſo departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the common wealth, ſauing they were the firſt that did know what was done. All other things therby did grieue them leſſe. But when of his owne meere authority, & as it were of himſelfe, he would as pleaſed him, beſtow the conquered lands of his enemies to his ſouldiers, and reſtore againe to the Veians their hoſtages as he did: therein plainely appeared, how great iniurie he did to the Senate. Whereupon the Senators were ſuſpected afterwards that they killed him, when within few dayes after it was ſayde, he vaniſhed away ſo ſtraungely, that no man euer knew what became of him. This was on the ſeuenth day of the moneth now called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no maner of certaintie els of his death that is knowen, ſaue onely of the day and the time when he vaniſhed, as we haue ſaid before. For on that day, the Romaines doe at this preſent many things, in remembrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his death was not knowne: ſeeing Scipio Africanus was found after ſupper dead in his houſe, and no man could tell, nor yet did know how he dyed. For ſome ſay that he fainted, and dyed ſodainly being of weake complexion. Other ſay he poiſoned himſelfe: other thinke his enemies did get ſecretly in the night into his houſe, and ſmoothered him in his bed. Yet they found his body laide on the ground, that euery body might at leiſure conſider, if they could finde or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vaniſhed away ſodainely, there was neither ſeene peece of his garments, nor yet was there found any part of his body. Therefore ſome haue thought that the whole Senatours fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peeces, euery one caried away a peece of him, folded cloſe in the ſkirt of his robe. Other thinke alſo, this vaniſhing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the preſence of the Senatours only: but they ſay that Romulus was at that time without the citie, neere the place called the goates marſhe, where he made an oration to the people, and that ſodainely the weather changed, and ouercaſt ſo terribly, as it is not to be tolde nor credited. For firſt, the ſunne was darkened as if it had bene very night: this darkeneſſe was not in a calme or ſtill, but there fell horrible thunders, boiſterous windes, and flaſhing lightnings on euery ſide, which made the people runne away, and ſcatter heere and there, but the Senatours kept ſtill cloſe together. Afterwardes when the lightning was paſt and gone, the day cleared vp, & the element waxed faire as before. Then the people gathered together againe, & ſought for the King: asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not ſuffer thē to enquire any further after him, but counſelled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in ſteade of a good King, he would be vnto them a mercifull & gracious god. The meaner ſort of people (for the moſt part of them) tooke it well, and were very glad to heare thereof & went their way worſhipping Romulus in their hearts, with good hope they ſhould proſper by him. Howbeit ſome ſeeking out the troth more egerly did cūber ſore, & troubled the Patricians accuſing them, that they abuſed the common people with vaine & fond perſwaſions, whileſt themſelues in the meane time had murdered the king with their own hāds. While things were thus in hurly burly, ſome ſay there was one Iulius Proculus, the nobleſt of al the Patricians, being eſteemed for a maruelous honeſt mā, & knowne to haue bene very familiar with Romulus, & came with him from the city of Alba: that ſtepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greateſt and holieſt othes a man might ſweare) that he had met Romulus on the way, farre greater and fayrer, then he had ſeene him euer before, and armed all in white armour, ſhining bright like fire: whereat being affraid in that ſort to ſee him, he asked him yet: O King, why haſt thou thus left and forſaken vs, that are ſo falſely

ſo falſely accuſed and charged to our vtter diſcredite and ſhame, by thy vaniſhing. To whom Romulus gaue this aunſwere. Proculus, it hath pleaſed the goddes from whom I came, that I ſhould remaine amongeſt men ſo long as I did: and now hauing built a citie, which in glorie and greatneſſe of empire ſhall be the chiefeſt of the worlde, that I ſhoulde returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therfore be of good comfort, and tell the ROMAINES, that they exerciſing proweſſe and temperancie, ſhalbe the mightieſt and greateſt people of the worlde. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they ſhall call me Quirinus. Theſe words ſeemed credible to the ROMAINES, aſwell for the honeſtie of the man that ſpake them, as for the ſolemne othes he made before thẽ all. Yet I wote not how, ſome celeſtiall motion, or diuine inſpiration helped it much: for no man ſaid a word againſt it. And ſo all ſuſpition and accuſation layde aſide, euery man began to call vpon Quirinus, to pray vnto him, and to worſhippe him. Truely this tale is much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Ariſteas the proconneſian, & of Cleomedes the Aſtypalæian. For they ſay, that Ariſteas died in a fullers worke houſe, & his friends comming to carie away his bodie, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: & at that inſtant there were ſome which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and ſpake with him, and how he kept his way towards the citie of CROTONA. It is ſaide alſo that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally ſtrong and great, and therewithall madde, and furious haſtie. For after many deſperate partes he had played, he came at the laſt on a day into a ſchoole houſe full of litle children, the roofe wherof was borne with one piller, which he did hit with ſo terrible a blowe of his fiſte, that he brake it in the middeſt, ſo as the whole roofe fell and daſhed the poore children in peeces. The people ranne ſtraight after him to take him. But he threw himſelfe forthwith into a cheſt, and pulled the lid vpon him. He held it ſo faſt downe, that many ſtriuing together all they could to open it, they were not able once to ſtirre it. Wherevpon they brake the cheſt all in peeces, but they found the man neither quicke nor dead. Whereat they were maruellouſly amazed, and ſent to Apollo Pythias, where the propheteſſe aunſwered them in this verſe:

Romulus called Quirinus, and honored as a God.

Ariſteas a Proconneſian taken out of mens ſight after he was dead.

Cleomedes the laſt of the demy goddes.

The reporte goeth alſo that Alcmenes corſe did vaniſh away, as they caried it to buriall, and how in ſtead thereof they found a ſtone laide in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other ſuch wonders, that are farre from any apparance of trothe: onely becauſe they would make men to be as goddes, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reproue and denie diuine power, it were a lewde and wicked part: euen ſo to compare earthe and heauen together, it were a meere follie. Therefore we muſt let ſuch fables goe, being moſt certaine that as Pindarus ſaith it is true.

Each liuing corps, muſt yeeld at laſt to death,
and euery life muſt leeſe his vitall breath:
The ſoule of man, that onely liues on hie,

The ſoule eternall.

For from heauen it came, and thither againe it doth returne, not with the body, but then ſooneſt, when the ſoule is furtheſt off and ſeparated from the body, and that ſhee is kept holy, and is no more defiled with the fleſh. It is that the philoſopher Heraclitus ment, when he ſaid. The dry light, is the beſt ſoule which flieth out of the body, as lightning doth out of the clowde: but that which is ioyned with the body being full of corporall paſſions, is a groſſe vapour, darke and maſſie, & cannot flame, riſe or ſhoote out like lightning. We muſt not beleeue therefore, that the bodies of noble and vertuous men, do goe vp together with their ſoules into heauen, againſt the order of nature. But this we are certainely to beleeue, that by the vertues of their ſoules (according to diuine nature and iuſtice) they doe of men become ſaincts, and of ſaincts halfe goddes, and of halfe goddes, entier and perfect goddes: after that they are perfectly (as it were by ſacrifices of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine & mortality, and not by any ciuill ordinance, but in troth & reaſon, they receiue a moſt happy and glorious end. Now touching Romulus ſurname, which afterwards was called Quirinus: ſome ſay that it ſignifieth as much as warlike: other thinke he was ſo called becauſe the ROMAINES them ſelues were called Quirites. Other write, that men in old time did call the poynt of a ſpeare, on the dart it ſelfe, Quiris: by reaſon whereof the image of Iuno ſurnamed Quiritides, was ſet vp with an iron ſpeare, and the ſpeare which was conſecrated in the Kings pallace, was called Mars. Furthermore it is an vſe amongſt men, to honour them with a ſpeare or dart, which haue ſhewed themſelues valiant in the warres: and that for this cauſe Romulus was ſurnamed Quirinus, as who would ſay, god of the ſpeares and wars. There was ſince built a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and ſo named of him. The day whereon he vaniſhed, is called the flying of the people, or otherwiſe the Nones of the goates. For on that day, they goe out of the citie to doe ſacrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the goates marſhe: and the ROMAINES call a goate, Capra. As they goe thus together, they call with lowd ſhowtes and cryes vpon diuers Romaines names, as Marcus, Cneus, and Gaius, in token of the flying that was then: and that they called one another backe againe, as they ranne away in great feare and diſorder. Howbeit other ſay, that it is not done to ſhewe the running away, but to ſhew their ſpeede and diligence, and referre it to the ſtorie. Now after the GAVLES that had takē ROME were expulſed by Camillus, the citie was ſo weakned, that they could ſcant recouer their force and ſtrength againe: wherfore many of the LATINES ioyning together, went with a great mightie armie, vnder the conduct of Liuius Poſthumius, to warre againſt the ROMAINES. This Poſthumius brought his campe as neere the citie of ROME as he could, and ſent to the ROMAINES by a trumpet to let them vnderſtand, how the LATINES were deſirous by new mariages, to reſtore their old ancient amitie and kindred that was neere hand decaied betweene them: and therfore if the ROMAINES would ſend them a conuenient number of their daughters and young widowes to marie with them, they ſhould haue peace, as they had before time with the SABYNES, vpon the like occaſion. The ROMAINES hereat were ſore troubled, thinking that to deliuer their women in ſuch ſorte was no better, then to yeeld and ſubmit them ſelues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a wayting maide called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gaue them counſell to doe neither the one nor the other, but to vſe a pollicie with them, by meanes whereof they ſhould ſcape the daunger of the warres, and ſhould alſo not be tyed nor bound by any pledges. The deuiſe was, they ſhould ſend to the LATINES her ſelfe, and a certaine number of their faireſt bonde maydes, trimmed vp like gentlewomen and the beſt citizens daughters, and that in the night ſhe would lifte them vp a burning torche in the ayre, at which ſigne they ſhould come armed, and ſet vpon their enemies as they lay a ſleepe. This was brought to paſſe: and the LATINES thought verely they had bene the ROMAINES daughters: Philotis failed not in the night to lift vp her ſigne, and to ſhewe them a burning torche in the toppe of a wilde figge tree: and did hang certaine couerlets and clothes behinde it, that the enemies might not ſee the light, and the ROMAINES cōtrariwiſe might diſcerne it the better. Thereupon ſo ſoone as the ROMAINES ſaw it, they ranne with all ſpeed, calling one another by their names, and iſſued out of the gates of the citty with great haſt: and ſo tooke their enemies vpon a ſodaine, and ſlew them. In memory of which victory, they doe yet ſolemnize the feaſt called the Nones of the goates, becauſe of the wilde figge tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they do feaſt the women without the city, vnder ſhadowes made of the boughs of figge trees. The wayting maides, they runne vp and downe, and play here and there together. Afterwards they ſeeme to fight, and throw ſtones one at another, as then they did when they holpe the ROMAINES in their fight. But few writers doe allow this tale, becauſe it is on the day time that they call ſo ech other by their names, and that they goe to the place which they call the goates marſhe, as vnto a ſacrifice. It ſeemeth this agreeth better with the firſt hiſtory whē they called one another by their names in the night, going againſt the LATINES: vnles peraduenture theſe two thinges after many yeares happened vpon one day. Furthermore, they ſay Romulus was taken out of the world, when he was foure and fifty yeares of age, and had raigned eight and thirty years by accoumpt.

THE COMPARISON OF ## Theſeus with Romulus

THus haue we declared all things of Theſeus and R*omulus* worthie memorie. But to compare the one with the other, it appeareth first that Theſeus of his owne voluntarie will, without compulſion of any (whẽ he might with ſafetie haue raigned in the citie of TROEZEN, and ſucceeded his grandfather in no ſmall kingdome) did deſire of him ſelfe, and rather ſought meanes to aſpire to great things: and teat R*omulus* on the other ſide, to deliuer him ſelfe from bondage and ſeruitude that lay ſore vpon him, and to eſcape the threatned puniſhment which ſtill did hang ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato ſayth) to ſhew him ſelfe hardie for feare: who ſeeing how extremely he was like to be handled, was of verie force conſtrained to ſeeke aduenture, and hazard the enterpriſe of attaining high & great things. Moreouer the chiefeſt act that euer he did was, when he ſlue one onely tyrant of the citie of ALBA called Amulius: where Theſeus in his iourney onely, as he trauelled, gaue his minde to greater enterpriſes, and ſlue Sciron, Scinnis, Procruſtes, and Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the world, he deliuered GRECE of all thoſe cruell tyrants, before any of thoſe knew him whõ he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might haue gone to ATHENS by ſea, & neuer needed to haue trauelled, or put him ſelfe in danger with theſe robbers, conſidering he neuer receiued hurt by anie of them: whereas R*omulus* could not be in ſafetie whileſt Amulius liued. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Theſeus vnprouoked by any priuate wrong or hurt receiued, did ſet vpon theſe deteſtable theeues and robbers: R*emus* and R*omulus* contrariwiſe, ſo long as the tyrant did them no harme, did ſuffer him to oppreſſe and wrong all other. And if they alledge theſe were noble deeds, and worthie memorie: that R*omulus* was hurt fighting againſt the SABINES, and that he ſlue king Acron with his owne hands, and that he had ouercome and ſubdued many of his enemies. Then for Theſeus on the other ſide may be obiected, the battell of the CENTAVRI, the warres of the AMAZONES, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: and how he ventured to go him ſelfe thither with the other yong boyes and wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering him ſelfe to be deuoured by a cruell beaſt, or elſe to be ſlaine and ſacrificed vpon the tombe of Androgeus, or to become bondſlaue and tyed in captiuitie to the vile ſeruice of cruell men and enemies, if by his courage and manhood he could not deliuer him ſelf. This was ſuch an act of magnanimitie, iuſtice and glorie, & briefly of ſo great vertue, that it is vnpoſſible truly to be ſet out. Surely me thinkes the philoſophers did not ill define loue, when they ſayd ſhe was a ſeruitour of the gods, to ſaue young folks, whom they thought meete to be preſerued. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the worke of ſome god, and a meane purpoſely prepared for Theſeus ſafetie. Therefore the woman is not to be reproched nor blamed for the loue ſhe bare Theſeus, but rather it is much to be wondred at, that euery man and woman in like wiſe did not loue him. And if of her ſelfe ſhe fell in loue with him, I ſay (and not without cauſe) ſhe afterwards deſerued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her owne nature loued valiantnes and honour, and entertained men of ſingular value. But both Theſeus & R*omulus* being naturally giuen to rule and raigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a King, but both of them did degenerate alike: the one chaunging himſelfe into a popular man, the other to a very tyrant. So that by ſundry humours, they both fell into one miſchiefe and errour. For a prince aboue all things muſt keepe his eſtate: which is no leſſe preſerued by doing nothng vncomely, as by doing al things honorably. But he that is more ſeuere or remiſſe thē he ſhould be, remaineth now no more a king or a prince, but becommeth a people-pleaſer, or a cruell tyrant: & ſo cauſeth his ſubiects to deſpiſe or hate him. Yet me thinkes the one is an errour of too much pittie and baſenes: and the other of too much pride and crueltie. But if we may not charge fortune with all miſchaunces happening vnto men, but that we ought to conſider in them the diuerſities of manners and paſſions, ſeeing anger is vnreaſonable, and wrath raſh and paſſionate: then can we not cleare the one, nor excuſe the other of extreme rage and paſſion, in the fact committed by the one againſt his brother, and by the other againſt his naturall ſonne. Howbeit the occaſion and beginning of anger doth much excuſe Theſeus, who mooued with the greateſt cauſe that might be, was put into ſuch choller and paſſion. But if R*omulus* variaunce with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counſell, or cauſe of the common weales: there is none ſo ſimple to thinke, that his wiſdome would ſo ſodainely haue ſet vpon him. Where as Theſeus in contrarie manner killed his ſonne, prouoked by thoſe paſſions that few men can auoide: to wit, loue, iealouſie, and falſe reporte of his wife. Moreouer R*omulus* anger went to the effect, whereof the iſſue fell out very lamentable: Theſeus anger ſtretched no further, then to roughe words, and olde folkes curſes in their heate. For it ſeemeth, curſed fortune, and nought els, was the cauſe of his ſonnes onely miſhap, as foreſpoken and wiſhed for ſomewhat by his father. Theſe be the ſpeciall things may be alledged for Theſeus. But for R*omulus* this was a notable thing in him. Firſt his beginning being very lowe and meane, and his brother and he taken for bondemen, and the children of hoggeheards, before they were themſelues all free, they ſet at libertie in manner all the LATINES, winning at one inſtant many titles of glorie and honour: as deſtroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of newe cities, and no ouerthrowers of the olde, where as Theſeus of many habitations and houſes made onely one, and did ouerthrowe and plucke downe diuers ſtates, bearing the names of auncient Kings, princes, and halfe goddes of ATTICA. All theſe alſo did R*omulus* afterwards, and compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to deſtroy their owne houſes, and to come and dwell with their conquerours. And in the beginning, he neuer chaunged nor increaſed any citie that was built before, but build him ſelfe a new city out of the ground, getting all together, land, countrey, kingdome, kindred and mariages, without loſing or killing any man: and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrey, lands, nor houſes, and deſired nothing els but to make a people amongſt them, and to become citizens of ſome city. Alſo R*omulus* bent not him ſelfe to follow theeues and robbers, but ſubdued by force of armes many mighty and puiſſant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer Kings and Princes which he had vanquiſhed in battell. And touching the murther of Remus, it is not certainely knowen of whoſe hands he died. The moſt part of authors do charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that R*omulus* deliuered his mother from apparant death, and reſtored his grandfather to the royall thone of AEneas, who before was dopoſed and brought from a King to ſeruile obedience, without any regard of honour or dignity: to whom he did many moe great pleaſures and ſeruices. Beſides he neuer offended him willingly, no not ſo much as ignorantly. Contrarily I thinke of Theſeus, who fayling by negligence to put out his white ſaile at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, how eloquent an oration ſoeuer could be made for his excuſe: yea though it were before the moſt fauorable iudges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN very well perceyuing that it was no hard thing to excuſe and defend ſo fowle a fault, doth faine that the good old man AEgeus hauing newes brought him that his ſonnes ſhippe was at hand, did ronne in ſo great haſte to his caſtell, to ſee his ſonne arriue a far off, that as hee ranne, his foote hit againſt ſome thing, and ouerthrewe him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man ſeeing him ronne ſo haſtely to the ſea ſide, did make haſte to attende and wayte vpon him. Furthermore, Theſeus faultes touching women and rauiſhmentes, of the twaine, had the leſſe ſhadowe and colour of honeſtie. Becauſe Theſeus did attempt it very often: for he ſtole away Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the Troezenian. Againe being ſtepped in yeares, and at later age, and paſt mariage: he ſtole awaye Helen in hir minoritie, being nothing neere to conſent to marrye. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and the AMAZONES (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birthe and linage of his owne countrie which were at ATHENS, and deſcended of the noble race and progenie of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) did giue men occaſion to ſuſpect that his womanniſhenes was rather to ſatiſfie luſt, then of any great loue. Romulus now in a contrarie manner, when his people had taken eight hundred, or thereaboutes, of the Sabine women to rauiſh them: kept but onely one for himſelfe that was called Herſilia, as they ſay, and deliuered the reſt to his beſt and moſt honeſt cittizens. Afterwardes by the honour, loue, and good entertainment that he cauſed them to haue and receiue of their husbands, he changed this violent force of rauiſhment, into a moſt perfect bond and league of amitie: which did ſo knit & ioyne in one theſe two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall loue which grew afterwards betwixt thoſe two peoples, and conſequently of the ioyning of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath giuen a good teſtimonie of the loue, reuerence, conſtancie, kindneſſe, and all matrimoniall offices that he eſtabliſhed by that meanes, betwixt man and wife. For in two hundred and thirtie yeares afterwards, there was neuer man that durſt forſake or put away his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the beſt learned men, and moſt curious obſeruers of antiquities do know his name, that was the firſt murderer of his father or mother: euen ſo all the ROMAINES knew what he was, which firſt durſt put away his wife. It was one called Spurius Caruilius, becauſe his wife was barren and had no children. The effects alſo do agree with the teſtimonie of the time. For the realme was common vnto the Kings of both nations, and through the alliance of theſe mariages that began firſt of rauiſhments, both nations liued peaceably, and in equalitie, vnder one ciuill pollicie, and well gouerned common weale. The ATHENIANS contrariwiſe, by Theſeus mariages, did get neither loue nor kinred of any one perſon, but rather they procured wars, enmities, & the ſlaughter of their citizens, with the loſſe in the end of the citie of APHIDNES: and yet verie hardly, and by the mercie of their enemies (whom they honoured as gods) they eſcaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS ſuffered afterwards, for the ſelfe act done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the laſt, that his mother was not onely in danger, but euen feelingly ſuffered like miſerie and captiuitie, which Hecuba did afterwards, when ſhe was forſaken of her ſonne: vnleſſe peraduenture thoſe things that they write of the impriſonment and captiuitie of Æthra, be found falſe, and but fables, as for the fame and memorie of Theſeus were behouefull, that both it, and many other things alſo, were of no more troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romulus diuinements, maketh great difference betweene him and Theſeus. For Romulus in his birth was preſerued by the maruellous fauour of the gods: Theſeus to the contrarie, was begotten againſt the gods will, as appeared plainely by the anſwer of the oracle to Ægeus, that he ſhould not meddle with any woman in ſtrange and foraine countrey.

THE LIFE OF Lycurgus.

A Man cannot ſpeake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he ſhal find great contrariety of him amongſt the hiſtoriographers. For, of his parentage and trauell out of his countrey, of his death and making of lawes, of his forme of gouernement, and order of executing the ſame, they haue written diuerſly. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worſt about the time he liued in. For ſome of them (and Ariſtotle is of that number) wil needes haue him to haue bene in the time of Iphytus, and that he did helpe him to ſtabliſh the ordinance that all warres ſhould ceaſe during the feaſt of the games olympicall: for a teſtimonie whereof, they alledge the copper coyte which was vſed to be throwen in thoſe games, and had found grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compting the dayes and time of the ſucceſſion of the kings of LACEDÆMON (as Eratoſtenes, and Apollodorus) ſay he was manie yeares before the firſt Olympiades. Timæus alſo thinketh there were two of this name, and in diuers times: howbeit the one hauing more eſtimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glorie of both their doings. Some ſay the eldeſt of the twaine, was not long after Homer: and ſome write they ſawe him. Xenophon ſheweth vs plainely he was of great antiquitie: ſaying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were neareſt of bloud by deſcent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon meant not thoſe Heraclides, which deſcended from Hercules ſelfe: for the laſt kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progenie, aſwell as the firſt. Therefore he meaneth thoſe Heraclides, which doubtleſſe were the firſt and neareſt before Hercules time. Neuertheles though the hiſtoriographers haue written diuerſly of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we finde written of him in auncient hiſtories, and is leaſt to be denied, and by beſt teſtimonies moſt to be proued. And firſt of all, the poet Simonides ſaith, his father was called Prytanis and not Eunomus: and the moſt part do write the pedegree otherwiſe, aſwell of Lycurgus ſelfe, as of Eunomus. For they ſay, that Patrocles the ſonne of Ariſtodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begat Prytanis, and Prytanis begat Eunomus, and Eunomus begat Polydectes of his firſt wife, and Lycurgus of the ſecond wife, called Dianaſſa: yet Euthychidas another writer, maketh Lycurgus the ſixt of deſcent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleuenth after Hercules. But of all his anceſters, the nobleſt was Sous, in whoſe time the citie of SPARTA ſubdued the ILOTES,

TES, made them ſlaues, and did enlarge and increaſe their dominion, with the landes and poſſeſſions they had got by conqueſt of the Arcadians. And it is ſayd that Sous himſelfe being on a time ſtraightly beſieged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard drye grounde, where no water could be founde: offered them thereupon to reſtore all their landes againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his companie did drinke of a fountaine that was there not far off. The CLITORIANS did graunt vnto it, and peace alſo was ſworne betweene them. Then he called all his ſouldiers before him, and tolde them if there were any one amongeſt them that would refraine from drinking he would reſigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his companie that could (or would) forbeare to drinke, they were ſo ſore a thirſt. So they al dranke hartely except himſelf, who being the laſt that came downe, did no more but a litle moyſte his mouth without, and ſo refreſhed himſelf, the enemies ſelues ſtanding by, and dranke not a droppe. By reaſon whereof, he refuſed afterwardes to reſtore their landes he had promiſed, alledging they had not all dronke. But that notwithſtanding, he was greately eſteemed for his actes, and yet his houſe was not named after his owne name: but after his ſonnes name Eurytion, they of his houſe were called Eurytionides. The reaſon was, becauſe his ſonne Eurytion to pleaſe the people, did firſt let fall and giue ouer, the ſole and abſolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwardes maruellous diſorder and diſſolution, which continued a greate time in the citie of SPARTA. For the people finding themſelues at libertie, became verye bolde and diſobedient: and ſome of the Kinges that ſucceeded, were hated euen to death, becauſe they would perforce vſe their auncient authoritie ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and goodwilles of the people, or becauſe they ſawe they were not ſtrong enough to rule them, did giue them ſelues to diſſemble. And this did ſo much increaſe the peoples loſe and rebellious mindes, that Lycurgus owne father being King, was ſlayne among them. For one daye, as he was parting a fraye betweene two that were fighting, he had ſuch a wounde with a kitchin knife, that he died: and left his Realme to his eldeſt ſonne Polydectes, who died alſo ſoon after, and without heyre of his body as was ſuppoſed. Inſomuch as euery man thought Lycurgus ſhould be King: and ſo he tooke it vpon him, vntil it was vnderſtood that his brothers wife was young with child. Which thing ſo ſoone as he perceiued, he publiſhed openly, that the Realme belonged to the childe that ſhould be borne, if it were a ſonne. After this he gouerned the Realme, but as the Kinges lieutenante and regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS call the regents of their Kinges that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurgus brothers widdowe did ſend, and let him ſecretly vnderſtand, that if he would promiſe to marrye her when he ſhould be King, that ſhe woulde come before hir time, and either miſcarye or deſtroye that ſhe went with. Lycurgus deteſtably abhorring this brutiſh and ſauage vnnaturalneſſe of the woman, did not reiect her offer made him, but ſeemed rather to be very glad, then to diſlike of it. Neuertheleſſe he ſent her worde againe, ſhee ſhould not neede to try maſteryes, with drinkes and medicines to make her come before her time: for in ſo doing, ſhe might bring her ſelfe in daunger, and be caſt awaye for euer. Howbeit he aduiſed her to goe her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he woulde finde meanes enough to make away the childe that ſhould be borne. And ſo with ſuch perſwaſions he drewe on this woman to her full time of deliuerie. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued ſhe was neere her time, he ſent certaine to keepe her, and to be preſent at her laboure, commaunding them that if ſhe were brought a bed of a daughter they ſhould leaue her with the woman: and if it were a ſonne they ſhould forthwith bring it to him, in what place ſoeuer he was, and what buſineſſe ſoeuer he had in hand. It chaunced that ſhe came euen about ſupper time, and was deliuered of a ſonne. As he was ſitting at the table with the other magiſtrates of the citie, his ſeruantes entred the hall, and preſented to him the litle babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes, and ſayed openly to them that were preſent: beholde my lordes of SPARTA, heere is a King borne vnto vs. And ſpeaking theſe wordes, he layed him downe in the Kinges place, and named him Charilaus, as much to ſay as the ioye of the people. Thus hee ſawe all the lookers on reioycinge much, and might heare them praiſe and extoll his ſinceritie, iuſtice, and vertue. By this meanes he raigned onely es King, but eight moneths. from thenceforth

Charilaus, king of the Lacedæmonians, Herod. lib 1. Dionyſius Halic. lib.2 hee was taken and eſteemed ſo iuſt and ſincere a man among the citizens, that there were moe that willingly obeied him for his vertue, thẽ for that he was the kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his handes. Notwithſtanding there were ſome that bare him diſpleaſure and malice, who ſought to hinder & diſgrace his credit, and cheifly the freinds and kinred of the Kinges mother: whoſe power and honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus authoritie, in ſo much, as a brother of hirs called Leonidas, entring boldly into great wordes with him on a day, did not ſticke to ſay to his face. I know for a certaintie one of theſe dayes thou wilt be king: meaning thereby to bring him in ſuſpition with the citizens. Which thing though Lycurgus neuer ment, yet of a ſubtile and craftie wit, Leonidas thought by giuing out ſuch words, that if the young King happened to die in his minoritie naturally, it would be miſtruſted that Lycurgus had ſecretly made him away. The Kinges mother alſo gaue out ſuch like ſpeaches, which in the end did ſo trouble him, with the feare he had, what euẽt might fall out thereof: that he determined to depart his countrie, and by his abſence to auoyde the ſuſpition that therein might grow vpon him any way. So he trauelled abroade in the worlde as a ſtranger, vntill his nephew had begotten a ſonne who was to ſucceed him in his kingdome. He hauing with this determinatiõ taken his iorney, went firſt of all into CRETA, where he diligently obſerued and conſidered the manner of their liuing, the order of the gouernment of their Cõmon weale, and euer kept company with the beſt, and euer was conferring with the moſt learned. There he founde very good lawes in his iudgment, which he noted of purpoſe to carie home to his countrie, to ſerue when time ſhould come. He found there other lawes alſo, but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that aboue the reſt was reputed wiſe and ſkilfull in matters of ſtate & gouernment, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus did ſo much by intreatie, and for familiar frendſhippe that he perſwaded him to go with him vnto SPARTA. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and name: but in effect he ſang all that the beſt and ſufficienteſt gouernours of the worlde could deuiſe. For all his ſonges were goodly ditties, wherein hee did exhort and perſwade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace & concord one with the other. His wordes were ſet out with ſuch tunes, countenance & accents, that were ſo full of ſweetnes, harmony, and pearcing: that inwardly it melted mens hartes, and drew the hearers of a loue to like the moſt honeſt things, and to leaue all hatred, enmitie, ſedition, and diuiſion, which at that time raigned ſore among them. So as it may be ſaid, he it was that prepared the way for Lycurgus, whereby he afterwards reformed & brought the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto reaſon. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into ASIA, with intent (as it is ſayd) to compare the mãner of life and pollicie of thoſe of CRETA (being then very ſtraight and ſeuere) with the ſuperfluities and vanities of IONIA: and thereupon to conſider the difference betweene their two manners & gouernments, as the phyſitian doth, who to know the whole & healthful the better, doth vſe to compare them with the ſicke & diſeaſed. It is very likely it was there, where he firſt ſaw Homers works, in the hands of the heires & ſucceſſours of Cliophylus & finding in the ſame, aſwell many rules of pollicie, as the greate pleaſure of poets faining, he diligently coppied it out, and made a volume thereof to carie into GRECE. It is true there was much fame abroad of Homers poeſies among the GRECIANS, howbeit there were few of them brought together, but were ſcattred here & there in diuers mẽs hands, in pamphlets & peeces vnſowed & without any order: but the firſt that brought thẽ moſt to light among men, was Lycurgus. The ÆGYPTIANS ſay, that he was in their countrey alſo, and that hauing found there one notable ordinance among other, that their ſouldiers and men of warre were ſeparated from the reſt of the people, he brought the practiſe of it into SPARTA: where ſetting the marchants, artificers & labourers euerie one a part by themſelues, he did eſtabliſh a noble Common wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN hiſtoriographers, and ſome others alſo of GRECE do write. He was alſo in AFRICKE, and in SPAINE, & as farre as INDIA, to conferre with the wiſe men there, that were called the philoſophers of INDIA. I knowe no man that hath written it, ſauing Ariſtocrates, that was Hipparchus ſonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS wiſhed for him often when he was gone, and ſent diuers and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maieſtie of a prince, wherby they did excell the common people.

people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus,: that he was a man borne to rule, to cōmaund, and to giue order, as hauing in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to drawe men willingly to obeye him. Moreouer the Kings thēſelues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, becauſe they hoped that his preſence would ſomwhat bridle, & reſtraine the people from their inſolencie & diſobediēce towards them. Wherupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no ſooner arriued, but he began to deuiſe how to alter the whole gouernment of the common weale, & throughout to chaunge the whole courſe and order of the ſtate: thinking that to make only certaine particular lawes were to no purpoſe, but much like, as one ſhould giue ſome eaſie medicine, to purge an ouerthrowen bodye with all humors and diſeaſes. Therfore he thought firſt that all groſſe and ſuperfluous humors, were meete to be diſſolued and purged, and then afterwardes to giue them a new forme and order of gouernment. When he had thus determined with himſelf, before he would take in hād to do any thing, he went to the citie of DELPHES: where after he had ſacrificed to Apollo, he cōſulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: ô beloued of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craued grace of Apollo to eſtabliſh good lawes in his countrie, it was anſwered him: that Apollo graunted his petition, and that he ſhould ordaine the beſt and perfecteſt manner of a Common wealth, that euer had or ſhould be in the worlde. This anſwer did comfort him very much, and ſo he began to breake his purpoſe to certaine of the chief of the citie, and ſecretly to pray and exhort them to helpe him, going firſt to thoſe he knew to be his friends and after by litle & litle he wan others to him, who ioyned with him in his enterpriſe. So when he ſaw the time fit for the matter, he cauſed thirtie of the chiefeſt men of the cittie in a morning to come into the market place wel appoynted & furniſhed, to ſuppreſſe thoſe that would attempt to hinder their purpoſe. Hermippus the hiſtoriographer rehearſeth twentie of the chiefeſt: but he that aboue all others did moſt aſſiſt him in his doings, & was the greateſt ayde vnto the ſtabliſhing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadas. The King Charilaus hearing of this aſſēbly, did feare there had bene ſome conſpiracie or inſurrection againſt his perſon, & for his ſafety he fled into the temple of Iuno, called Chalceæcos, as much to ſay, as Iunos braſen tēple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth, he waxed bolde & came out of the temple againe, & he himſelf fauored the enterpriſe, being a prince of a noble minde, howbeit very ſoft by nature, as witneſſeth Archelaus(that was thē the other king of LACEDÆMON) by telling how Charilaus anſwered one that praiſed him to his face, in ſaying he was a good man. And how ſhould I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be euil to the euil? In this change of the ſtate, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefeſt alteration was, his law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regal power & equal authoritie with the Kings in matters of weight and importance & was (as Plato ſayeth) to be the healthful counterpeaſe of the whole body of the Cōmon weale. The other ſtate before was euer wauering, ſometime inclining to tirannie, when the Kings were too mightie: & ſometime to cōfuſion, when the people would vſurp authority. Lycurgus therfore placed betwene the kings & the people, a coūſel of Senatours, which was as a ſtrong beame, that held both theſe extreames in an euen ballance, and gaue ſure footing and ground to either part, to make ſtrong the ſtate of the cōmmō weale. For the eight & twenty Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) tooke ſometime the Kings part, when it was needfull to pull downe the furie of the people: and contrarily, they held ſometimes with the people againſt the Kings, to bridle their tyrannical gouernment. Ariſtotle ſaith, he ordeined the number of Senatours to be but eight and twentie, becauſe two of thirtie that ioyned with him as afore, did for feare forſake him at his enterpriſe. Howbeit Sphærus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purpoſed to haue more then eight and twentie to be the Senate. And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, conſidering it is compounded of the number of ſeuen, multiplied by foure: and is the firſt perfect number next to ſixe, being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he choſe this number rather then anie other, becauſe he meant the whole bodie of the counſell ſhould be but thirtie perſons, adding to that number, the two Kings. Lycurgus tooke ſo great care to eſtabliſh well this counſell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apolloes temple in

DELPHES. This oracle is called vnto this day Retra, as who would ſay, the ſtatute oracle: whereof the anſwer was. Whē thou haſt built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou ſhalt eſtabliſh a Senate of thirtie counſellers, with the two kinges: & ſhalt aſſemble the people at times conuenient, in the place betweene the bridge and the riuer Cnacion. There the Senatours ſhall propound all matters, and breake vp after their aſſemblies: and it ſhal not be lawfull for the people to ſpeake one worde. In thoſe dayes the people were euer aſſembled betweene two riuers, for there was no hall to aſſemble a counſaill at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no builded place meete for men to giue good counſell in, or to determine cauſes, but rather a hindrance: becauſe in ſuch places men be drawen to muſe on vaine thinges, and their mindes be caried away with beholdinge the images, tables, and pictures, comonly ſet vp for ornament in ſuch open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and ſportes be made, they thinke more of them, then of any counſail. Againe, if it be in a greate hall, then of the fayer embowed or vawted roofes, or of the fretiſed ſeelinges curiouſly wrought, and ſumptuouſly ſet forth, and tend not ſtill their buſines they come for. When the people were aſſembled in counſaill, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counſell to be determined, neither might any of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thing: but the people had onely authoritie to giue their aſſent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senatours, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two Kings Polydorus and Theopompus, becauſe the people did many times croſſe and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding ſomething to it, they did adde theſe wordes to the oracle aforeſayed. That if the people would not aſſent to any ordinance of the Senate, then ſhould it be lawfull for the Kinges and Senate to breake vp the counſell, and to fruſtrate all thinges done in the ſame: the wiſe aduiſe of the Senate being encountered thus, and their meaning to the beſt, ſo peruerted to the worſe. Theſe two Kings perſwaded the people, that at the very firſt, this addition came with the oracle of Apollo: as the poet Tyrtæus maketh mention in the place, where he ſayeth:

From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought of Pythia: into their country ſoyle.
The Kinges (euen they to whome of right there ought

And next to them, the people ſhall fulfill aſmuch as ſeemes, to pleaſe their princes will.

Lycurgus now hauing thus tempered the forme of his common weale, it ſeemed notwithſtanding to thoſe that came after him, that this ſmall number of thirtie perſons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, & of too great authoritie. Wherfore to bridle thē in a litle, they gaue them (as Plato ſayeth) a bitte in their mouths, & that was the authoritie of the Ephores, which ſignifie as much as controllers: and were erected about a hundred and thirtie yeres after the death of Lycurgus. The firſt which was choſe of theſe, was Elatus, & it was in the time of King Theopompus, whoſe wife on a day in her anger ſayed: how through his negligence he would leaue leſſe to his ſucceſſours, then he had receiued of his predeceſſours. To whom he anſwered againe, not leſſe but more, for that it ſhall continue longer, and with a more ſuertie. For, in loſing thus their too abſolute power, that wrought them great enuie & hatred amōg their cittizens, they did eſcape the danger & miſchief that their neighbours the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS did feele: who would not giue ouer the ſoueraigne authority which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wiſdome & foreſight manifeſtly knowen: who ſo will deeply conſider the ſeditions & ill gouernments of the ARGIVES, & MESSENIANS (their neere neighbours and kinſmen) aſwell from the people, as from the Kings. Who from the beginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: & in deuiding of their lands a far better order then theirs. This notwithſtanding, they did not proſper long: but through the pride of their

Kings,and the diſobedience of their people,they entred into ciuill warres one againſt another, ſhewing by their diſorders and miſfortunes the ſpeciall grace the gods did beare to SPARTA, to giue them ſuch a reformer, as did ſo wiſely temper the ſtate of their common weale, as we will ſhew hereafter. The ſecond lawe that Lycurgus made,and the boldeſt and hardeſt he euer tooke in hand, was the making of a new diuiſion of their lands. For he ſaw ſo great a diſorder & vnequality among the inhabitants,aſwell of the countrie, as of the citie LACEDÆMON, by reaſon ſome (and the greateſt number of them) were ſo poore,that they had not a handfull of ground, and other ſome being leaſt in number were very riche,that had all: he thought with himſelfe to baniſh out of the citie all inſolencie, enuie,couetouſneſſe,& deliciouſneſſe,and alſo all riches and pouertie,which he tooke the greateſt,and the moſt continuall plagues of a citie, or common weale. For this purpoſe, he imagined there was none ſo ready and neceſſarie a meane, as to perſuade his citizens to ſuffer all the lands, poſſeſsions, and inheritance of their countrie,to runne in common together: and that they ſhould make a new diuiſion equally in partition amongſt themſelues, to liue from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, ſo that no one were richer then another, & none ſhould ſeeke to go before each other, any other way then in vertue onely: thinking there ſhould be no difference or vnequalitie among inhabitants of one citie,but the reproches of diſhoneſtie,and the praiſes of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, did out of hand make a lawe of the diuiſion of their lands. For firſt he did deuide all the countrie of LACONIA, into thirtie thouſand equall parts, the which he did ſet out for thoſe that inhabited about SPARTA: and of thoſe lands that ioyned next to the citie of SPARTA,that was the chiefe metropolitan citie of LACONIA, he made other nine thouſand parts,which he deuided to the naturall citizens of SPARTA, who be thoſe that are properly called Spartans. Howbeit ſome will ſay,he made but ſixe thouſand parts,& that king Polydorus afterwards did adde to other three thouſand parts. Other ſay alſo, that Lycurgus of theſe nine thouſand parts made but the halfe onely,and Polydorus the reſt. Euery one of theſe parts was ſuch,as might yeeld vnto the owner yeerely,three ſcore and ten buſhels of barley for a man,and twelue buſhels for the woman,and of wine and other liquide fruites, much like in proportion: which quantitie Lycurgus iudged to be ſufficient, to keepe the body of a man in health,and to make him ſtrong and luſtie,without any further allowance. They ſay after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had bin reaped not long before,and ſaw the number of ſheaues lying in euery ſhocke together, and no one ſhocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing,& told them that were with him, me thinks all LACONIA is as it were an inheritance of many bretheren, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue deuided alſo moueables, & to haue made a cōmon partition betwene them,to thend he would haue vtterly taken away all vnequalitie. But finding the citizens tooke it very impatiently, that openly that which they had, ſhould be taken away; he went about to do it more ſecretly,and in a cunninger wiſe to take away that couetouſneſſe. For firſt of all he did forbid all coine of golde and ſiluer to be currant: and then he did ſet out certaine coines of iron which he commaunded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and quantitie was but little worthe. So as to lay vp thereof the value of ten Minas,it would haue occupied a whole celler in a houſe,beſides it would haue needed a yoke of oxen to carie it any where. Now golde and ſiluer being thus baniſhed out of the countrie, many lewde parts and faultes muſt needs ceaſe thereby. For who would robbe, ſteale, picke, take away, hyde, procure,or whorde vp any thing,that he had no great occaſion to deſire,nor any profit to poſſeſſe, nor would be any pleaſure to vſe or imploy. For, the iron they occupied for their coyne, they caſt vinegar vpon it while it was red hoate out of the fire,to kill the ſtrength and working of it to any other vſe. for thereby it was ſo eger & brickle,that it would bide no hammer,nor could be made,beaten,or forged to any other faſhion. By this means he baniſhed alſo, all ſuperfluous and vnprofitable ſciences,which he knew he ſhould not need to do by any proclamation: becauſe they would fall away (or the moſt part of them) euen of themſelues, when the baſeneſſe of the money they ſhould take for their worke,ſhould vndo them. For their iron moneys were not currant els where in the cities of GRECE, but euery body made a ieſte of it there. By this occaſion,the LACEDÆMONIANS could buie no forrein wares nor marchandiſes,neither came there any ſhip into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rethorician did repaire into their countrie to teach them eloquence, and the cunning caſt of lying: nor yet came there to them any wiſard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keepe any brothell houſe, nor yet goldſmithe or ieweller, to make or ſell any toyes or trifles of gold or ſiluer to ſet forth women: conſidering all theſe things are vſed to be made to get money, and to hourd vp that they had not. After this ſorte, delicatenes that wanted many things that entertained it, began by litle and litle to vaniſh away, and laſtly, to fall off from themſelues: when the moſt riche men had no more occaſion then the pooreſt, and riches hauing no meane to ſhew her ſelfe openly in the worlde, was faine to remaine ſhut at home idely, as not able to doe her maſter any ſeruice. Thereupon moueables and houſehold ſtuffe (which a man cannot be without, and muſt be dayly occupied) as bedſteads, tables, chaires, and ſuch like neceſſaries for houſe, were excellently well made: and men did greatly praiſe the faſhion of the LACONIAN cup which they called Cothon, and ſpecially for a ſouldier in the warres, as Critias was wont to ſay. For it was made after ſuch a faſhion, that the colour of it did let the eye to diſcerne the fowle & vnwholſome water, which men are driuen oft times to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times againſt ones ſtomack to ſee it: and if by chaunce there was any filth or mudde in the bottome, it would cleaue and ſtick faſt vpon the ribbes of the bellie, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that dranke it. The reformer of their ſtate was the cauſe of all this: becauſe their artificers tending now to ſuperfluous works, were occupied about the making of their moſt neceſſarie things. Further, now to driue away all ſuperfluitie and deliciouſnes, and to roote out vtterly deſire to get and gather: he made another third law for eating and drinking, and againſt feaſts and banckets. Firſt he willed and commaunded the citizens, that they ſhould eate together all of one meate, and chieflie of thoſe he had permitted by his ordinance. Then he did expreſſely forbid them to eate alone, or apart, or ſecretly by themſelues, vpon riche tables and ſumptuous beds, abuſing the labour of excellent workemen, and the deuiſes of lickeriſh cookes to cramme themſelues in corners, as they doe fatte vp beaſts and poultrie, which doth not onely breed ill conditions in the minde, but doth marre the complexions of men, and the good ſtates of their bodie, when they giue themſelues ouer to ſuch ſenſualitie and gluttonie. Whereof it followeth in the ende that men muſt needs ſleepe much, to helpe to digeſt the exceſſe of meates they haue taken, and then muſt they goe to the hoate houſes to bathe them ſelues, and ſpend long time about the ordinarie attendance of their ſickely bodies. This was a maruellous thing for him to bring to paſſe, but much more, to make riches not to be ſtolen, and leaſt of all to be coueted, as Theophraſtus ſaid of him: which by this meanes of making them eate together with all ſobrietie at their ordinarie dyet, was brought to paſſe. For there was no more meane to the riche, then to the poore, to vſe to play, or ſhew riches, ſithe both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: ſo as that which is commonly ſpoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blinde, was truely verified onely in the citie of SPARTA, aboue all other places of the world. For there riches was laide on the ground like a corſe without a ſoule, that mooueth no whit at all: conſidering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home ſecretly in his houſe, before he came to their open halles, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meales, being already fed and full fraught. For euery mans eye was vpon thoſe ſpecially which did not eate and drinke with a good ſtomach amongſt them: and it was the vſe to reproche them as gluttons, and daintie mouthed men, which refuſed to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they ſay, that grieued moſt the riche aboue all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were moſt mad and angrie with him: in ſo much, as on a day, they all ſetting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to runne out of the market place, and getting ground of them, he recouered the liberties of a church, before any could ouertake him: ſauing one young man called Alcander, who otherwiſe had no ill nature in him, but that he was ſomewhat quick of his hand, and cholericke with all. Who following Lycurgus neerer then any other, did giue him a blowe ouerthwart the face with a ſtaffe, and ſtrake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer baſhed or made worde at the matter, but did lifte vp his head to thoſe that followed him, and

ſhewed them his face all a gore bloud, and his eye put out cleane: whereof they were all ſo ſore aſhamed, that there was not a man that durſt once open his mouth againſt him, but to the contrarie, they ſeemed to pitie him, and did deliuer Alcander into his handes that had done the deed, to puniſh him as him ſelfe pleaſed. And ſo they all brought him to his houſe, and ſhewed they were right hartely ſorie for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, ſaue that he made Alcander to goe with him into his houſe, where he neuer hurte him, nor gaue him fowle worde: but commaunded him onely to waite vpon him, and made his other ordinary ſeruants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now began to ſpie his owne faulte, did moſt willingly attend vpon him, and neuer ſpake worde to the contrarie. When he had ſerued him a certaine time, being very nere continually about him, he began to feele and taſte of his naturall liberalitie, and ſaw of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moued to do all he did: he perceiued what was the ſeueritie of his ordinarie life, and what his conſtancie was to endure labour without wearineſſe. Alcander then began to loue and honour Lycurgus from his heart, and tolde his parents and friends, howe he was no ſuch ſeuere man as he ſeemed, but was of ſo kinde and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his puniſhment alſo, which he ſhould haue receiued: for of a fierce, raſhe, and a lewde conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very graue and wiſe man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he ſurnamed Optiletide, becauſe the DORIANS which dwell in thoſe parts of PELOPONNESVS, doe call the eyes, optiles. There are other writers (as Dioſcorides for one) which ſay Lycurgus had a blowe with a ſtaffe, but he had not his eye ſtriken out with it: and how contrariwiſe, he founded this temple to Minerua, to giue her thankes for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that euer ſince the SPARTANS haue bene reſtrained to carie ſtaues in any aſſemblie of counſell. But to returne to their common repaſtes, which the CRETANS called Andria, and the LACEDÆMONIANS Phiditia, either becauſe they were places wherein they learned to liue ſoberly and ſtraightly (for in the GREKE tongue Phido, is to ſaue and ſpare) or elſe becauſe their amitie and friendſhip grewe there towards one another, as if they would haue called them Philitia, feaſts of loue, by changing d. into L: It may be alſo they added the firſt letter as ſuperfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, becauſe they did eate and drinke there. They ſat in their halles by fifteene in a companie, litle more or leſſe, and at the beginning of euery moneth, euery one brought a buſhell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fiue pound of cheeſe, and two pound and a halfe of figges for a man, beſides ſome little portion of their money to buie certaine freſh cates. And ouer and aboue all this, euery man when he did ſacrifice in his houſe, was bound to ſend the beſt and chiefeſt things of his ſacrifice to the halles to be eaten. Likewiſe if any man went on hunting, and killed any veniſon: it was an order, he ſhould ſend a peece of the fleſh thither. Hauing theſe two lawfull cauſes, they might eate and drinke by themſelues at home, either when they ſacrificed any beaſt to the goddes, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwiſe they were bounde of neceſſitie to meete in their halles at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very ſtraightly a great time: in ſo much as king Agis on a daye, returning from the warres, where he had ouerthrowne the ATHENIANS, and being deſirous to ſuppe at home priuately with the Queene his wiſe, he ſent to the halles for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certaine officers aſsiſting the Kings in the warres, did denie him. The next daye Agis left of for ſpight, to doe the accuſtomed ſacrifice they were wonte to celebrate in the ende of euery warre: whereupon they ſet a fine on his head, and condemned him to paye it. The young children alſo went to theſe repaſts, euen as they ſhould goe to ſchooles to learne grauitie and temperance, where they heard wiſe and graue diſcourſes touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of maſters that were as hirelings. There they learned pretily to playe vpon wordes, and pleaſauntly to ſporte one with another, without any broade ſpeeches, or vncomely ieſtes, and at others handes to beare the ſame againe, without choller or anger. For this property haue the LACEDÆMONIANS aboue all other, to take and giue a mocke without any offence: neuertheles, if any mans nature could not beare it, he needed but pray the partie to forbeare his ieſting, and ſo he lefte it ſtraight.

And it was euer an ordinarie among them, that the eldeſt of the companie tolde the reſt that were come into the hall to meale, with ſhewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a worde here out of this doore. Euen ſo he that would be receiued to meale there in their companie, muſt firſt of neceſſitie be allowed and receiued in this ſort, by all the reſt. Euery one of them tooke a litle ball of branne or dowe to waſhe their hands with, and without euer a word ſpeaking, they threw it into a baſen, which the ſeruant that waited on them at the table did carie vpon his head: he that was contented the other ſhould be receiued in companie, did caſt in his balle as he did receiue it, but if he miſliked him, then he preſſed it flat betweene his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of branne thus preſſed flat, was as much as a beane bored thorough, and was to them a ſigne of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this ſorte, the ſuter was reiected: for they would not haue any enter into their companie, that was not liked of all the reſt. He that thus was reiected, they ſay he was diſcadded: for the baſin wherein the litle balles were caried, was called Caddos. The beſt diſh they ſerued at theſe meales, was that they call their blacke brothe: ſo that when they had that, the olde men did eate no fleſh, but left it all to the young men, and they by them ſelues did eate the brothe. There was a king of PONTVS, that being deſirous to taſte of this blacke broth, did buie of purpoſe a LACEDÆMONIAN cooke: but after he had once taſted therof, he was very angry ſtraight. The cooke then ſaid vnto him: and it pleaſe your grace, ere one ſhall finde this brothe good, he muſt be waſhed firſt in the riuer of Eurotas. After they had eate and drunke thus ſoberly together, euery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where els with light, becauſe they ſhould accuſtome themſelues boldly to goe vp and downe the darke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is ſpecially to be noted, that Lycurgus would in no wiſe haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expreſſely ſet downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes ſhould be written. For he thought that which ſhould chiefly make a citie happie, and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and manners, as to haue continuance for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre ſtronger knot to tie men with, then any other compulſarie lawe. Which when men by vſe and cuſtome through good education doe take in their childhood, it maketh euery man to be a lawe to him ſelfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and ſometime are changed into one ſort, and ſometime in another, as occaſion ſerueth: he thought it beſt not to conſtraine them to doe it by writing, nor to eſtabliſh cuſtomes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and diſcretion of men which had bene brought vp in the ſame, bothe to take away, and to adde therein, as the caſe and time ſhould require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefeſt point of a good lawe maker or reformer of the common weale was, to cauſe men to be well brought vp and inſtructed. One of his ordinances therefore was expreſſely, that not one of his lawes ſhould be written. Another of his deuiſes was, againſt ſuperfluous charges and expences: which to auoide, he made a lawe that all roofes of houſes ſhould be made onely with the axe, and all gates and dores with the ſawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he ſaid, ſpeaking of his table: Such a borde neuer receiueth any treaſon. Euen ſo thought Lycurgus, that ſuch a builte houſe would neuer receiue curioſitie or daintineſſe. For no man is ſo madly diſpoſed or ſimple witted, as to bring into ſo poore and meane houſes, bedſteads with ſiluer feete, imbrodered couerlets, or counterpointes of purple ſilke, neither yet plate of golde nor of ſiluer, nor ſuch other like coſtly furniture and fineneſſe, as thoſe things require to waite vpon them: becauſe the beds muſt be aunſwerable to the meaneſſe of the houſe, the furnitures of the beddes muſt be ſutelike to the ſame, and all other houſeholde ſtuffe, dyet, meate, and drinke agreeable to the reſt. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the firſt King of that name, ſaied once: who ſupping on a time in the citie of CORINTH, and ſeeing the roofe of the hall where he ſate, ſumptuouſly embowed and carued, he asked ſtraight if the trees did growe carued ſo in that countrie. The third lawe was, he did forbid them to make warre often with one enemie, leaſt the enemie forced to take often armes in hand, might in the ende growe experter and valianter then they.

they. For this cauſe king Ageſilaus was greatly blamed, who was a long time after. For by making often warres with the countrie of Boeotia, he made the Thebans in the end as expert and valiant ſouldiers, as the Lacedæmonians. Whereupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one daye, ſayde vnto him: The Thebans haue nobly rewarded thee for their learning, ſith thou haſt made them expert ſouldiers vnwilling to learne the diſcipline of warre.

Theſe be the lawes Lycurgus ſelfe called Retra, and ſignifie as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had diſcouered to him. Nowe the education of children, hee eſteemed the chiefeſt and greateſt matter, that a reformer of lawes ſhould eſtabliſh. Therefore beginning a farre off, he firſt conſidered the ſtate of mariage, and the generation of children. For Ariſtotle ſayeth, that Lycurgus did attempt to reforme women, and did ſoone giue it ouer againe: becauſe he could doe no good therein, by reaſon of the great libertie they had taken by the abſence of their husbandes in the warres, compelled often ſo to be abroad, and that they did leaue them miſtreſſes of their houſe, and at their returne did honour them ſo much, and make of them ſo beyonde meaſure, with calling them ladyes and miſtreſſes. Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, aſwell as he had of mens: and ſo reaſon did require.

The exerciſes and diſcipline of maydes.

Firſt of all, he willed that the maydens ſhould harden their bodies with exerciſe of running, wreſtling, throwe the barre, and caſting the dart, to the ende that the frute wherewith they might be afterwardes conceiued, taking nouriſhment of a ſtrong and luſtie bodie, ſhould ſhoote out and ſpread the better: and that they by gathering ſtrength thus by exerciſes, ſhould more eaſely away with the paynes of child bearing. And to take away from them their womaniſh daintineſſe, and fineneſſe, he brought vppe a cuſtome, for younge maydes and boyes to goe as it were a preceſſion, and to daunce naked at ſolemne feaſtes and ſacrifices, and to ſing certaine ſonges of their owne making, in the preſence and ſight of younge men. To whom by the way they gaue manie times pretie mockes of purpoſe, as pleaſantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and ſometimes alſo in their ſong for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they prayſed them which had deſerued it. By this meanes, they did ſet young mens hearts a fire, to ſtriue to winne moſt prayſe and honour. For who ſo was prayſed of them for a valiant man, or whoſe worthy actes were ſung by them, he thereby was incouraged to doe the better another time: and the pretie girdes and quippes they gaue to others, was of no leſſe force, then the ſharpeſt wordes and admonitions that otherwiſe could be giuen them. This tooke place the rather, becauſe it was done in the preſence of the kings, the Senatours, and all the reſt of the citizens which came thither to ſee theſe ſportes. And though the maydes did ſhewe themſelues thus naked openly, yet was there no diſhoneſtie ſeene nor offered, but all this ſport was full of play and toyes, without any youthfull part or wantonneſſe: and rather caried a ſhew of demureneſſe, and a deſire to haue their beſt made bodies ſeene and ſpied. Moreouer, it ſomewhat lifted vp their hearts, and made them noblier minded, by giuing them to vnderſtand, that it was no leſſe comely for them, in their kinde and exerciſes to carie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exerciſes to carie the price. Hereof it came, that the women of Lacedæmon were ſo bolde to ſay, and thinke of themſelues that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one day aunſwered: being in talke with a ſtraunge woman that ſayde to her. There be no women in the world that commaund their husbandes, but you wiues of Lacedæmon. Whereto the Queene ſtraight replyed: ſo be there no women but we, which bring foorth men.

The ſaying of a Laconian woman.

Furthermore, theſe playes, ſports, and daunces, the maydes did naked before young men, were prouocations to drawe and allure the young men to mary: not as perſwaded by geometricall reaſons, as ſayth Plato, but brought to it by liking, and of very loue. Thoſe which would not marrie, he made infamous by law. For it was not lawfull for ſuch to be preſent, where theſe open games and paſtimes were ſhewed naked.

Men that wold not marie, Lycurgus reputed infamous by lawe.

Furthermore, the officers of the citie compelled ſuch as woulde not marie, euen in the hardeſt time of the winter, to enuirone the place of theſe ſportes, and to goe vp and downe ſtarcke naked, and to ſing a certaine ſong made for the purpoſe againſt them, which was: that iuſtly were they puniſhed, becauſe that lawe they diſobeyed. Moreouer, when ſuch were olde, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old maried men vſually receiued. Therefore there was no man that miſliked, or reprooued that, which was ſpoken to Dercillidas: albeit otherwiſe he was a noble captaine. For, comming into a preſence, there was a young man which would not vouchſafe to riſe and do him reuerence, nor to giue him place for to ſit downe: and worthily, quoth he, becauſe thou haſt not gotten a ſonne, who may doe ſo much for me in time to come. Thoſe which were deſirous to marie any, were driuen to take them away by force, whom they would marie, not little young wenches I meane, which were not of age to be maried: but luſtie and ſtrong maydes of age to beare children. And when one of them was ſtolne away in this ſort, ſhe that was priuie thereto, and meane to make the mariage, came and ſhaued the hayres of her head that was maried: then ſhe put her into mans apparell, and gaue her all thinges ſute like to the ſame, and layde her vpon a mattereſſe all alone, without light or candle. After this was done, the bridegrome, being neither drunke nor finelier apparelled then he was wont to be, but hauing ſupped ſoberly at his ordinarie, came home ſecretly to the houſe where the bride was: and there vntyed his wiues girdle, tooke her in his armes, layde her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwardes fayre and ſoftly ſtole away to the place, where he was wont to ſleepe with other young men. And ſo from thenceforth, he continued alwayes to doe the like, being all the day time with his companions, and ſleeping moſt of the night, vnleſſe hee ſometime ſtale to ſee his wife, being affrayd, and aſhamed euer to be ſeene, by any of the houſe where ſhe was. And hereunto his young wife did helpe for her part, to ſpie meanes and occaſions howe they might meete together, and not be ſeene. This manner endured a great while and vntill ſome of them had children, before they boldly met together, and ſawe each other on the day time. This ſecret meeting in this ſort did ſerue to good purpoſes, not onely becauſe it was ſome meane of continencie, and ſhamefaſtneſſe, but alſo it kept their bodies in ſtrength and better ſtate, to bring foorth children. It continued alſo in both parties, a ſtill burning loue, and a new deſire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor wearie, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as much as they luſt: but they euer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping ſtill a longing deſire to deuiſe howe to meete againe. Nowe when hee had ſtabliſhed ſuch a continencie, and ſo kinde a framed honeſtie in mariage, he tooke no leſſe care to driue away all fooliſh iealouſie therein, thinking it very good reaſon to beware there ſhould be no violence, nor confuſion in mariage: and yet as reaſon would, they ſhould ſuffer thoſe which were woorthie to get children as it were in common, laughing at the madde follie of them which reuenge ſuch thinges with warre and bloudſhed, as though in that caſe men in no wiſe ſhoulde haue no fellowſhippe together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being ſtepped in yeares, and hauing a young wife, if ſeeing a faire young man that liked him, and knowen with all to bee of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with childe, and afterwardes would auow it for his, as if him ſelfe had gotten it. It was lawfull alſo for an honeſt man that loued another mans wife, for that he ſawe her wiſe, ſhamefaſt, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreat her husband to ſuffer him to lie with her, and that he might alſo plow in that luſty ground, and caſt abroad the ſeede of well fauoured children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloud and parentage, with the moſt honourable and honeſteſt perſons. For firſt of all, Lycurgus did not like that children ſhould be priuate to any men, but that they ſhould be common to the common weale: by which reaſon he would alſo, that ſuch as ſhould become citizens, ſhould not be begotten of euery man, but of the moſt honeſteſt men onely. So Lycurgus thought alſo there were many fooliſh vaine toyes and fanſies, in the lawes and orders of ther Nations, touching mariage: ſeeing they cauſed their bitches and mares to bee limed and couered with the fayreſt dogges and goodlieſt ſtalons that might be gotten, praying or paying the maſters and owners of the ſame: and kept their wiues notwithſtanding ſhut vp ſafe vnder locke and key, for feare leaſt other then them ſelues might get them with child, although they were ſickly, feeble brayned, and extreame olde. As if it were not firſt of all, and chiefely a diſcommoditie to the fathers and mothers, and likewiſe to thoſe that bring them vp, to haue vnperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of drye and withered men: and then to the contrarie, what pleaſure and benefite is it to thoſe that haue fayre and good children, borne, as gotten of like ſeede and men. Theſe thinges were done then by naturall and ciuill reaſon, neuertheleſſe they ſay women were ſo farre off then from intreatie, as euer they were before: ſo as in old time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adulterie ment. For proofe whereof, the anſwere made by Geradas (one of the firſt auncient SPARTANS) vnto a ſtranger, may be alledged: that asked him, what puniſhment they had for adulterers. My friend, quoth he, there be none here. But if there were? replied the ſtranger againe. Marie ſayd he, then he muſt pay as great a bull, as ſtanding vpon the toppe of the mountaine Taygetus, may drinke in the riuer of Eurotas. Yea marie: but how is it poſſible (quoth the ſtranger) to finde ſuch a bull? Geradas laughing, anſwered him againe. And how were it poſſible alſo to finde an adulterer in SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birth of euery boy, the father was no more maſter of him, to cocker and bring him vp after his will: but he himſelfe caried him to a certaine place called Leſché, where the eldeſt men of his kinred being ſet, did view the childe. And if they found him fayre, and well proportioned of all his limmes, and ſtrong: they gaue order he ſhould be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thouſand partes of inheritance for his education. Contrariwiſe, if they found him deformed, miſhapen, or leane, or pale, they ſent him to be throwen in a deepe pit of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, and as a man would ſay, the common houſe of office: holding opinion it was neyther good for the childe, nor yet for the common weale, that it ſhould liue, conſidering from his birth he was not well made, nor giuen to be ſtrong, healthfull, nor luſtie of bodie all his life long. For this cauſe therefore, the nurſe after their birth did not waſh them with water ſimply (as they doe euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they prooue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they ſuppoſe, that children which are giuen to haue the falling ſickneſſe, or otherwiſe to be full of rewmes and ſickneſſes, cannot abide waſhing with wine, but rather dry and pine away: as contrarily the other which are healthfull, become thereby the ſtronger and the luſtier. The nurces alſo of SPARTA vſe a certaine manner to bring vp their children, without ſwadling, or binding them vp in clothes with ſwadling bandes, or hauing on their heads any croſſe clothes: ſo as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better ſhaped and goodlier of bodie. Beſides that, they acquainted their children to all kinde of meates, and brought them vp without much tendance, ſo as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be left alone in the darke, neither were they cryers, wrallers, or vnhappy children, which be all tokens of baſe and cowardly natures. So that there were ſtraungers, that of purpoſe bought nources out of LACONIA, to bring vp their children: as they ſay Amycla was one of them, which nourced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwardes a bondman called Zopyrus, to be his maſter and gouernour: who had no better propertie in him, then other common ſlaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernement of the children of SPARTA, into the hands of hyred maſters or ſlaues bought with money: neyther was it lawfull for the father him ſelfe to bring vp his owne childe after his owne maner and liking. For ſo ſoone as they came to ſeuen yeares of age, hee tooke and diuided them by companies, to make them to be brought vp together, and to accuſtome them to play, to learne, and to ſtudie one with another. Then he choſe out of euery companie one, whom he thought to haue the beſt wit, and had moſt courage in him to fight: to whom he gaue the charge and ouerſight of his owne companie. The reſt had their eyes waiting alwayes on him, they did obey his commaundementes willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections hee gaue them, they did ſuch taskes and workes as he appointed them: ſo that all their ſtudie was moſt to learne to obey. Furthermore, the olde gray headed men were preſent manie times to ſee them playe, and for the moſt part they gaue them occaſions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better knowe and diſcerne the naturall diſpoſition of euery one of them, and whether they gaue any ſignes or tokens in time to come, to become cowardes or valiant men. Touching learning, they had as much as ſerued their turne: for the reſt of their time they ſpent in learning howe to obey, to away with paine, to endure labour, to ouercome ſtill in fight. According to their

groweth and yeares, they did chaunge the exerciſes of their bodies: they did ſhaue their heads, they went barelegged, they were conſtrayned to play naked together the moſt part of their time. After they were paſt twelue yeres of age, they ware no longer coates: and they gaue them yearely but one ſeely gowne. This was the cauſe they were alwayes ſo naſty & ſluttiſh, & they neuer vſed to bath or noynt themſelues, ſauing only at certaine dayes in the yeare, when they were ſuffered to taſte of this refreſhing. They lay and ſlept together vpon beds of ſtrawe, which they themſelues did make, of the toppes of reedes or canes that grewe in the riuer of Eurotas: which they were forced to goe gather and breake them ſelues with their handes, without any toole or iron at all. In the winter, they did mingle thiſtle down with theſe, which is called Lycophonas, becauſe that ſtuffe ſeemeth ſomewhat warme of it ſelfe. About this time, the fauourers & likers of this pretie youth, which were commonly the luſtieſt and beſt diſpoſed youthes of the citie, beganne to be ofter in their companie: and then the olde men tooke the better regard vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exerciſes, & where their vſe was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one ſhould mocke another. This did their old men, not by way of paſtime onely, but with ſuch care and hearty loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, maſters, & gouernours, while they were boyes; in ſo much as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not alwayes ſome to admoniſh, reproue, or correct them, if they did a fault. Notwithſtanding all this, there was euer one of the honeſteſt men of the citie, who had expreſſely the charge and gouernance of theſe boyes. He did diuide them in companies, and afterwards gaue the ouerſight of them, to ſuch a one of the boyes as was diſcreeteſt, the manlieſt, the moſt hardie, and of the beſt courage amongſt them. They called the children that were paſt infancie two yeres, Irenes: and the greateſt boyes Melirenes: as who would ſay, readie to go out of boyerie. This boye who was made ouerſeer of them, was commonly twentie yeres of age. He was their captaine when they fought, and did commaunde them as his ſeruantes when they were in the houſe: and willed them which were ſtrongeſt, and the moſt growen, to carie woode when they ſhould prepare dinner or ſupper, and thoſe which were leaſt and weakeſt, to goe gather herbes, which they muſt ſteale or lack them. So they went out to ſteale ſome in gardens, ſome at the markets, other in the halles where the feaſts were kept, and men did eate together, into the which they conueyed them ſelues as cloſely and cunningly as they could deuiſe: for if they were taken with the manner, they were ſcourged terribly, becauſe they were ſo groſſe & negligent, and not fine and cunning in their facultie. They ſtole alſo all other kind of meate, whatſoeuer they could get or lay hands on. They pried and ſought all occaſions how to take and ſteale meate handſomely, both when men were aſleepe, or els that they were careleſſe, or did not giue good heede vnto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundly, and was puniſhed with faſting beſides: for they had but a ſlender pittance, becauſe neceſſitie ſhould driue them to venter boldly, and wit ſhould finde out all the deuiſes to ſteale finely. This was the chiefeſt cauſe, why they gaue them ſo ſmall a diet. The ſeconde cauſe was, that their bodies might grow vp higher in height. For the vitall ſpirites not being occupied to concoct and digeſt much meate, nor yet kept downe, or ſpread abroad by the quantitie or ouerburden thereof, doe enlarge themſelues into length, and ſhoote vp for their lightnes: and for this reaſon they thought the bodie did growe in height and length, hauing nothing to let, or hinder the riſing of the ſame. It ſeemeth, that the ſelfe ſame cauſe made them fayrer alſo. For the bodies that are leane and ſlender, doe better and more eaſely yeelde to nature, which bringeth a better proportion and forme to euery member: and contrariewiſe it ſeemeth theſe groſſe, corpulent, and ouerfedde bodies doe encounter nature, and be not ſo nimble and pliant to her, by reaſon of their heauy ſubſtance. As we ſee it by experience, the children which women bring a little before their time, & be ſomwhat caſt before they ſhould haue bene borne, be ſmaller and fayrer alſo, and more pure commonly then other that goe their time: becauſe the matter whereof the bodie is formed, being more ſupple and pliant, is the eaſilier weilded by nature, which giueth them their ſhape and forme. Touching the naturall cauſe of this effect, let vs giue place to other to diſpute it that will, without our further deciding of the ſame. But to returne to the matter of the LACEDÆMONIANS children.

Irenes. Melirenes.

Straight dyet cauſeth growth and height.

They did robbe with ſo great care, and feare to be diſcouered, that they tell of one, which hauing ſtollen a little foxe, did hide him vnder his cloke, and ſuffered him with his teeth and clawes to teare out all his belly, and neuer cried, for feare he ſhould haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he ſtoode. This is not vncredible, by that we ſee young boyes doe abide at this day: for we haue ſeene diuerſe, which haue bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, ſurnamed Orthia. Now this vnder maiſter, who had the charge of euery company of theſe boies, vſed after ſupper (ſitting yet at the table) to bid one of them ſing a ſong: to another he put forth a queſtion, who was to be well aduiſed of his aunſwer, as for example: Who is the honeſteſt man in the city? or how thinkeſt thou by that ſuch a-one did? By this exerciſe they were inured from boyes ſtate, to iudge of thinges well or ill done, and to vnderſtand the life and gouernment of their citizens. For which of them did not aunſwere quickely and directly to theſe queſtions, who is a good man, who is an honeſt citizen, and who not: they thought it was a ſigne of a dull wit, and careleſſe nature, not giuen to any vertue, for deſire of honour and eſtimation. Furthermore this vnder maſter was euer to waite for his aunſwer, and to ſee it ſhould be briefe and well knit vp in wordes: otherwiſe his puniſhment that aunſwered croſſely, or to little purpoſe, was that his maſter bit him by the thumbe. This he did many times in the preſence of the old men and magiſtrates of the city, that they might ſee whether he puniſhed them with reaſon or not, and according to their deſeruing. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone away, then was he him ſelfe rebuked and puniſhed, if he had corrected them too ſore, or contrarily had fauoured them too much. Moreouer they did aſcribe the good or ill opinion conceiued of the children, vnto euery of their fauourers, and louers, which did affect and entertaine them: in as much as they ſay, a young boy vppon a time fighting with another, and a cry ſcaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yeeld, his fauourer and louer was ſtraight condemned by the officers of the citty to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the moſt honeſt and vertuouſeſt women loued the young maides thus alſo: yet was there no iealouſie nor ſuſpition that grew hereof, but rather to the contrary, there grew a maruellous mutuall loue and kindneſſe betweene them, which liued in one ſelfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, did deuiſe how to make the childe they loued in common, the wiſeſt, the gentleſt, and the beſt conditioned aboue all other. They taught theſe children to ſpeake in ſuch ſort, that their ſpeach had euer in it a pleaſaunt grace, and in few words cõprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great maſſe and weight of iron money, ſhould be but little worth, and of a ſmall value, as we haue tolde you before: and contrarily, that ſpeach in few wordes, without any affectation, ſhould hold much deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long ſilence, ſhould be briefe and pithy in their aunſwers. For as the ſeede of incontinent men which are too buſie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bring forth frute: euen ſo immoderate ſpeach, full of wordes and buſie tattle, bringeth forth as little ſenſe. Hereof it commeth, that the aunſwers of the LACONIANS were ſo ſhort and witty. As they ſay, king Agis aunſwered on a day an ATHENIAN, who ieſting at the ſwords the LACEDÆMONIANS did weare, ſaid they were ſo ſhort, that theſe tumblers and iuglers did ſwallow them downe in the ſight of all the world: and yet ſaied Agis we hurt our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS mãner of ſpeaking: which is not to ſpeake much, but when they ſpeake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderſtand them. I thinke alſo, that Lycurgus ſelfe, was ſhort and quicke in his talke. For ſo a man may coniecture by his aunſwers which are writtten: as that which he made to one who earneſtly praied him to ſtabliſh a popular ſtate in LACEDÆMON, that the baſeſt might haue as great authority as the higheſt. Beginne (quoth he) to doe it firſt in thine own houſe. And as that alſo which he aunſwered another who asked him, why he had appointed ſo ſmall things, & ſo litle of value to be offered to the gods? Becauſe (quoth he) we ſhould neuer ceaſe to honour them. And as that which he ſpake another time, touching fightes and frayes, which was: that he did neuer forbid his citizens any of them, but thoſe wherein they vſe to giue their hand, as you would ſay to yeelde. Men finde alſo ſuch like anſwers, in ſome of his letters written to his citizens, as when they asked him. How can we defend our ſelues againſt our enemies? He aunſwered: If ye be poore, and one doe couet no more then another. And in another letter that was ſent, where he diſcourſeth, whether it were requiſite to incloſe the city with walles: he ſayeth, can that city be without walles, which is enuironned with men, though it be vncompaſſed with ſtone? Neuertheleſſe it is hard to reſolue, whether thoſe letters, and other ſuch like that are ſhewed, be to be beleeued, or diſcredited to be his. But that long ſpeach was much diſliked, and reproued among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifeſtly to be ſeene by the words, which ſome amongſt them haue heretofore aunſwered. As king Leonidas ſaid one day, to one that diſcourſed with him many good things, but out of ſeaſon: friend, thou ſpeakeſt many good wordes, but to litle purpoſe. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncle made ſo few lawes: becauſe ſaid he, to men of few wordes, few lawes will ſerue. And Archidamidas ſayed thus to ſome which reproued Hecatæus the Orator, for that being bidden to ſupper at one of their feaſts, he ſpake not a word all ſupper time. He who can ſpeake wel, knoweth alſo when to ſpeake. And where I haue tolde before, that in their feat and quicke aunſwers, commonly there was ſome prety grace, it may be well ſeene and knowen by theſe that follow. Demaratus aunſwered a buſie fellow who troubled him too much with vaine importunate queſtions, asking him ſtill: who was the honeſteſt man of LACEDÆMON? euen he that is leaſt like thy ſelfe. And Agis ſayd to ſome which highly prayſed the ELIANS for their vpright iudgement, and iuſt dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in fiue years ſpace the ELIANS one day do good iuſtice? And Theopompus likewiſe to a ſtranger, who as deſirous to ſhew his affection he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how euery body called him Philolacon (as to ſay) a louer of LACEDÆMON. It were more honeſty for thee (ſaid he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her citizens. And Pliſtonax the ſonne of Pauſanias, when an Orator of ATHENS ſaid the LACEDÆMONIANS were vnlearned, and ignorant: thou ſaieſt true quoth he, for we only of all the GRECIANS haue learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that demanded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enow ſaid he, to driue away the wicked. We may coniecture alſo their manner of ſpeaking, by their words in mirth, which they ſpake ſometimes playing wiſe: for they did neuer vſe to ſpeake vain words at randone, but it had alwaies ſome ſecret meaning in it, which required anothers good obſeruation that would find it. As he which was deſired to goe heare the nightingall counterfeited naturally: I haue (ſaid he) heard the nightingall it ſelfe. And another which hauing red this inſcription vpon a tumbe.

They well deſerued death, ſaid he, that did but quench tyranny: they ſhould haue quite conſumed it with fire. And one younger boy to another, promiſing to giue him ſuch hardy cockes of the game, as ſhould die in the place where they fought. O giue me not thoſe (ſaid he) which will die, but thoſe which with fighting will kill others. Another ſeeing men ſitting in coches and litters as they went: god forbid (ſaid he) that I ſhould euer ſit in a chaire, where I could not riſe to my elders. Such were their aunſwers and encounters. So that ſome had reaſon which ſayed heretofore, to ſpeake LACONIAN like, was to be Philoſopher like: as you would ſay, more to exerciſe the minde, then the body. Beſides all this, they did ſtudy to ſing well, and to make goodly ditties and ſongs. Then they ſpake moſt properly and featly. There was in their ſongs alſo a certaine motion, I wote not what, which ſtirred vp the hearers hearts, and did kindle deſire in them to do notable feats. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter graue and morall, contayning for the moſt part the praiſe of thoſe, which were ſlaine in battell for the defence of their countrey, as being happy men: & a ſhame to thoſe that liue, which for fainte hearts refuſed ſo to die, to lead a miſerable and vnfortunate life. Or elſe they ſang how they were the patternes for time to come, or the right glory of the world, and the true repreſentation of vertuous men: as the ſong would beſt become their their ages which did ſing. It ſhall not be impertinent for the better vnderſtanding hereof, to bring you here an example. For in their open feaſts, there were alwayes three daunces, according to the difference of the three ages. The daunce of the old men, thus beganne firſt for to ſing.

VVe haue bene young and ſtrong, yet valiant heretofore, till crooked age did hold vs backe, and bad vs do no more,

The young men followed after, ſinging:

VVe yet are young, bold, ſtrong, and ready to maintaine that quarell ſtill, againſt all men that doe on earth remaine.

The third was of children that came after and ſaide:

And we doe hope as well, to paſſe you all at laſt,
and that the world ſhall witneſſe be, ere many yeares be paſt.

To conclude, who nearely will conſider the works & makings of the LACON poets (wherof ſome are yet extant) and will marke alſo the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the ſound and meaſure whereof they marched in array, going to charge the enemy: he ſhall finde, that Terpander and Pindarus, had reaſon to ioyne hardines with muſicke. For Terpander ſpeaking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſayeth in a place:

This is that land where deedes of chiualrie,
did floriſh moſt, in many a martiall feate: VVhere muſicke made, her choiſe of harmony,
aud iuſtice kept her ſtately royall ſeate.

And Pindarus ſpeaking of them alſo ſaieth:

Pyndarus of the Lacedæmonians.

There: graue aduiſe, is found in aged braines:
there: gallant youths, are luſty lads in deede.
VVhich can both ſing, and daunce, in courtlike traines: yet daunt their foes, with many a doughty deede.

By which teſtimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and deſcribeth them to haue loued muſicke, and the warres together. For as another LACON Poet ſayeth:

It fitteth well, and is a ſeemely thing,
for ſuch as ſpend their time in feates of warre:
To haue the skill, ſweete ſonnets for to ſing,
and touch the harpe withouten iangling iarre.

For this cauſe therefore in all their warres, when they ſhould giue battell, the King did firſt ſacrifice to the Muſes, to put his ſouldiers in mind (as it ſhould ſeeme) of the diſcipline & wiſdome of the Muſes that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his ſouldiers were in the moſt extreme daunger, the Muſes ſhould preſent them ſelues before the ſouldiers eyes, to pricke them forwards to doe ſome noble actes of worthy memory. In their time of warre, they did tollerate their young men a litle of their hard & old accuſtomed life, & ſuffered them then to trim their haires, to haue braue armour, to weare gay apparell, and tooke as great delight therin, to ſee them gallant & luſty, as to behold yong neying & ſnorting horſes, deſirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did vſe to weare long haires: yet were they neuer ſo carefull to combe and bruſh their heads, as when they ſhould to the battell. For when they did noint them ſelues with ſweet oiles, and did ſhed their haire, remembring Lycurgus ſaying: who was wont to tell them, that hairs to them which were faire, did make them more faire, and to them that were fowle, they made them more vgly & dredfull. The exerciſes alſo of their bodies, were more eaſy and gentle, and not ſo hard and ſtraight in their warres, as they were in a peace: and generally, their whole mãner of life was not then ſo ſtraightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they only were the men of the world, to whom warres were made a reſt from labour, which men ordinarily do endure, to make them the fitter for the warres. Afterwardes when their army was ſet in battell ray, euen in the face of the enemy, the King did ſtraight ſacrifice a goate vnto the goddes, & forthwith commaunded all his ſouldiers to put their garlands of flowers on their heads, & willed that the pipes ſhould ſound the ſong of Caſtor, at the noiſe and tune whereof, he him ſelfe beganne firſt to marche forward. So that it was a maruellous pleaſure, & likewiſe a dreadful ſight, to ſee the whole battell march together in order, at the ſound of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confound their ranckes, nor to be diſmaide nor amazed themſelues, but to go on quietly and ioyfully at the ſound of theſe pipes, to hazard them ſelues euen to death. For it is likely, that ſuch courages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercom with much fury: but rather they haue an aſſured conſtancy & valiantnes in good hope, as thoſe which are backed with the aſſiſting fauour of the goddes. The King marching in this order, had alwaies ſome about him, which had before time wonne the priſes in games and iuſtes. And they ſay there was one of theſe on a time, that was offered a great ſomme of money at the games Olympical, not to preſent him ſelfe at them: but he refuſed it, liking better with great paine to winne the priſe, then for much money to loſe his honour. Whereupon one ſayd vnto him, Laconian: & what haſt thou gotten now, to cary away the priſe with ſo much ſwet? The Laconian anſwered him laughing: I ſhall fight in the battell, ſaith he, before the King. When they had once broken into their enemies, they did ſtill fiercely and fiercelier ſet vpon them, and did neuer ceaſe, vntill their enemies gaue way and fled: and then they chaſed and followed them ſtill, vntill ſuch time as their ouerthrowe and flight had aſſured them of the victory. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, iudging it to be no manhood, neither the part of a noble minde, or of ſo worthy a nation as the Grecians were, to kill and hew in peeces, men ſo ſcattered and out of order, hauing forſaken all the hope of victory. This fell out not only honourable, but alſo very profitable for them. For they which were in battell againſt them, knowing they killed none but ſuch as reſiſted ſtoutly, and how they did let other goe which fled before them: they found it was more their benefite to flie, then to tary and abide the ſtrokes. Hippias the ſophiſter ſaith, that Lycurgus him ſelfe was a very good captaine, and a great ſouldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fields: and Philrſtephanus aſcribeth to him the deuiſe to put horſemen in troupes and companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fifty men at armes was a troupe, whoſe manner was to put them ſelues in ſquadrons. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwiſe, that Lycurgus was neuer at the wars, and that he made all his lawes and gouernment in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermiſſion of wars during the plaies Olympicall, which they ſay he deuiſed, doth ſhew in apparaunce that he was a gentle natured man, and one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithſtanding (amongeſt whom Hermippus was one) ſay, he was not with Iphitus at the firſt beginning when he ordeined the playes Olympicall, but that by chaunce he happened to come thither, paſſing by in his iourney onely, and that he ſtaid there to ſee the games: where he thought he heard the voice of a man behind him, ſaying, he maruelled much why he did not perſwade his citizens alſo to be partners of this new deuiſe: and turning backe to ſee who it was that ſpake to him, he ſaw no body. Wherupon he tooke a conceite that it was a ſpeach from the gods: and went therefore preſently to ſeeke out Iphitus, with whom he made all the ſtatutes and orders of the feaſt, which afterwards were farre more famous, better ordered & more ſtately then before. But to returne againe to the Lacedæmonians: their diſcipline and order of life continued ſtill, after they were full growen men. For it was not lawfull for any man to liue as he liſted, but they were within their city, as if they had bene in a campe, where euery man knoweth what allowance he hath to liue withall, & what buſines he hath els to do in his calling. To be ſhort, they were all of this mind, that they were not born to ſerue themſelues, but to ſerue their countrey. Therefore if they were cōmanded nothing els, they went continually to ſee what the children did, and to teach them ſomewhat which might profite the common weale, or elſe they went to learne of thoſe which were their elders. For one of the beſt and happieſt things which Lycurgus euer brought into his city, was the great reſt and leyſure which he made his citizens to haue, onely forbidding them that they ſhould not profeſſe any vile or baſe occupation: and they needed not alſo to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goods were nothing profitable nor eſteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bond men by the warres, did till their groundes, and yeelded them a certaine reuenue euery yere. And as touching this matter, they tell of a Lacedæmonian, who being on a day at Athens where the law was pleaded, did vnderſtand that a citizen there was condemned for Idlenes, and how he went home to his houſe very ſorowfully, accõpanied with his friends which were ſory for him, & greatly lamented his ill hap. The LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed thoſe which were about him, to ſhew him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman. I haue alledged this, to ſhew how he thought it a vile & ſeruil thing to exerciſe any handy craft, or to work any thing by hand to get money. For ſutes in lawe, a man may be well aſſured they were baniſhed with the golde & ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, conſidering now there was no more auarice nor couetouſnes there, nor yet pouertie nor lacke, but equalitie with aboundance, & quiet life with ſobrietie. All other times but when they had warres, they followed dauncing, feaſts, playes, bankets, hunting, or other exerciſes of body, and meetings to paſſe the time away. For the young men vntill they came to thirtie yeres of age, neuer went into the market to buie any prouiſion or things for the houſe, but did their fathers or their friends buſineſſe: nay it was a ſhame for the oldeſt men, to haunt the market too often. As to the contrary, it was honorable for them to be preſent at the ſhew place the moſt part of the day, where they diuerſely exerciſed their bodies, and likewiſe to be at the places of aſſembly, there to ſpend time with talking together, and diſcourſing honeſtly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffike, or money. For all their talke (for the moſt part) was about the praiſing of ſome honeſt thing, or ſportingwiſe to reproue ſome diſhoneſtie, which alwayes caried with it ſome gentle leſſon or monition by the way. For Lycurgus was not ſuch a ſower man, as they neuer ſaw him laughe: but as Soſibius writeth, it was he that firſt ſacrificed to the litle god of laughter, which is at LACEDÆMON, becauſe he would mingle their feaſts and aſſemblies with mirthe, as a pleaſant ſawce to eaſe the trouble of their ſtrickt and hard life. To be briefe, he did accuſtome his citizens ſo, that they neither would nor could liue alone, but were in maner as men incorporated one with another, and were alwaies in company together, as the bees be about their maiſter bee: ſtill in a continuall loue to ſerue their countrie, to winne honor, & to aduaunce the commonweale. Which affection of theirs is plaine and eaſly ſeene to be imprinted in them by certaine of their anſwers, as in that which Pædaretus ſaid on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his houſe mery and iocond as might be, ſaid: It did him good to ſee there were three hundred found better in the citie than himſelfe. Piſiſtratidas alſo being ſent ambaſſadour with certaine other to the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, the PERSIAN lordes asked him, if they came of their owne deſire, or whether they were ſent from the whole ſtate: if we obtaine, ſaid he, it is from the ſtate: if we be denied, then we come of our ſelues. And Argileonida the mother of Braſidas, asked ſome that went to viſite her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their iorney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her ſonne died like a man, and a worthie SPARTAN. And they ſtraight did commend him highly, ſaying: there was not left in all LACEDÆMON ſuch a valiant man. She replied vnto them. Say not ſo, my friends, I pray you: for Braſidas was indeed a valiant man, but the country of LACONIA hath many moe yet valianter then he was. Now touching their Senate: Lycurgus was the firſt that erected it among them. The firſt that were thereof, were Lycurgus chiefe aiders and aſſiſters of that erection, as we haue declared before: but afterwards he ordained, that when any of thoſe firſt ſhould happen to die, they ſhould chooſe in his place the moſt honeſt reported man in the citie, ſo he were three ſcore yeere olde and aboue. This was the nobleſt glorie that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and priſe, not that he was ſwifteſt among the ſwift, nor ſtrongeſt amongſt the ſtrong, but that he among the honeſt was honeſteſt. He had the rewarde of his vertue, as for libertie to ſpeake, ſoueraigne authoritie to gouerne, and princely power ouer the commonweale, the honour, the life, and the goods of the whole citizens: howbeit the election was made after this ſort. The people firſt aſſembled in the market place, where there were ſome appointed and ſhut vp thereabout in a houſe, from whence they could neither ſee, nor be ſeene of thoſe that were aſſembled, but only they might heare the noiſe which they made there. For the people by their crie and ſhowte, did declare whom they did chooſe, and whom they did refuſe of the competitours, as they vſed to ſhew their liking by the like crie in other things. The competitours were not brought in, and preſented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, paſſed through the middeſt of the aſſembly of the people, and ſaid neuer a worde.

The people ſtraight that liked, made a crie or ſhowte alowde. The men appointed which were locked vp, had bookes or tables in which they wrote and noted the greatneſſe of the crie, and showt the people made, as euery competitour paſſed by, not knowing nor ſeeing who he was. Theſe hidden men did onely ſet downe in their bookes, the firſt, the ſecond, the third, and ſo many more, as by ſhowtes and cries they perceiued did paſſe thus through the aſſemblie. They noted alſo in their ſaid bookes, which of theſe had the greateſt crie and ſhowte of people at their paſſing thorough: and him they came and declared to be Senatour choſen.

Then he wearing a garland of flowers on his head, went to all the temples of the goddes in the citie to giue thankes, hauing a great traine of young men following, and prayſing of his vertues. There went alſo with him a maruellous company of women ſinging ſonges of his praiſe, and how bleſſed he was, that he had liued ſo vertuouſly. Then euery one of his kinne prepared a bancket for him at home at their houſes, and as he entred the houſe, they ſaide vnto him: The citie honoureth thee with this bancket. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinarie place of their eating, where he did in all things as he was accuſtomed, ſauing he was ſerued nowe at his table with a double allowance, whereof he reſerued the one. After ſupper, all his kinſewomen ſtood in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: ſo he called her whom he loued beſt, and gaue her his allowance he had ſaued, and ſaid to her: This was giuen me in token I was this day rewarded for my vertue: and euen ſo I giue it thee for a like token of rewarde for thy vertue. Then was ſhe brought home by all the women there to her houſe, euen in like ſorte as he was by the men.

Touching burials, Lycurgus made a wiſe order: For firſt of all, to cut off all ſuperſtition of burying places, he commaunded they ſhould burie their dead within the citie, and that their graues ſhould be round about their temples, that young perſons might haue them alwaies in their eyes, and not be affraide to ſee a dead body, as if to touche a coarſe, or to paſſe by their graues, it ſhould defile a man. Then did he forbid them to burie any thing with the coarſe, and willed they ſhould only lappe it vp in a redde clothe, with oliue leaues. It was not lawfull to graue the name of any dead body vpon his graue, but onely of ſuch a man as died in the warres, or of ſome holy woman profeſſed into their temples.

Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very ſhorte. For it laſted not but a eleuen dayes, and on the twelft day, they muſt doe ſacrifice to Proſerpina, and ſo leaue off their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or vnworking in his citizens: for to all neceſſarie things which men can not lacke, Lycurgus ioyned euer a certaine emulation of men. As to deſire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furniſhed his citie with many good precepts and examples, among which his citizens being ſtill borne and bred vp, and hauing the ſame in euery place before their eyes where they went, they came to paſſe in time to be framed after the very patterne and moulde of vertue it ſelfe.

None allowed to trauell into other countries without licence.

For this cauſe he did not ſuffer any to trauell out of the countrie, or to goe abroade as he would, without ſpeciall licence, for feare leaſt thoſe which trauelled abroad for their pleaſure, ſhould bring home ſtrange faſhions and manners, and a corrupt diſordered life, which by litle and litle might get away, and bring an alteration and change of the whole ſtate.

Furthermore, he kept out of SPARTA all ſtrangers, except thoſe which had neceſſarie buſineſſe there, or were come thither for ſome profit to the countrie: not that he was affraide they ſhould learne ſomething whereby to loue vertue, or that they ſhould deſire to follow his faſhion and manner of gouernement as Thucydides was: but rather fearing they ſhould teach his citizens ſome naughtie manners, or ſome ill fauoured vice. For it muſt needs be, that ſtrangers bring euer ſtraunge and new deuiſes with them: which new deuiſes bring with them alſo new opinions: and new opinions beget new affections and mindes, that many times are repugnant to the lawe, and to the forme of the common weale eſtabliſhed before, as diſcordes doe many times in an harmonie of muſicke, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he iudged it a thing moſt neceſſarie, to keepe his citie free and ſafe from counterfaiting of any ſtrangers maners or faſhions, that were commonly as perſons infected with ſome contagious ſickneſſe. Now in all we haue ſpoken before, euen to this place, there is no maner of token or ſhew of iniuſtice, or lacke of equitie, wherewith ſome ſeeme to burden Lycurgus in his lawes: by ſaying they were well made, to make men warlike and valiant, but not to be iuſt or righteous.

But concerning the law they call Cryptia, as much to ſay, as their ſecret: if it were of Ly- curgus inſtitution, as Ariſtotle ſaieth, it might haue caried Plato into the like opinion that Lycurgus had of his common weale. This was the lawe: The gouernours which had the charge and ouerſight of the young men, at certaine appointed times, did chooſe out thoſe they thought to haue the beſt diſcretion, and ſent them abroade into the countrie, ſome one waye, ſome another way, who caried with them daggers, and ſome prouiſion to feede them. Theſe young men being thus diſperſed abroade in the countrie, did hide themſelues all the day cloſe in ſecret places, and there they lay and tooke their reſt: afterwards when night was come, they went to ſeeke out the high wayes, and killed the firſt of the ILOTES that they met. Sometimes euen in the broad day, they went into the countrie to kill the ſtrongeſt and ſtowteſt of them: as Thucydides telleth in his hiſtorie of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, where he ſaith. That a certaine conuenient number of the ILOTES were crowned, by a publicke proclamation of the SPARTANS: and being infranchiſed, for their good ſeruices they had done the common weale, they were carried to all the temples of the goddes for an honour. Within a while after, no man knew what was become of them, being about two thouſand in number: ſo that neuer man heard tell neither then nor ſince, how they came to their deaths. Howbeit Ariſtotle aboue all others ſaith, that the Ephores, ſo ſoone as they were placed in their offices, made warres with the ILOTES, becauſe they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardly. For they forced them ſometimes to drinke wine without water out of meaſure, till they had made them ſtarke drunke. Then they brought them all into their common halles where they did eate, to make their children to beholde them, and to ſee what beaſtlineſſe it was for a man to be drunke. Likewiſe they made them ſing ſongs, and daunce daunces, vnfit for honeſt men, and ſuch as were full of deriſion and mockerie, and did forbid them expreſſely to ſing any honeſt ſongs. So it is reported, that in the iourney the THEBANS made to LACONIA, many of the ILOTES were taken priſoners thereat, and when they were commaunded to ſing the verſes of Terpander, or of Alcman, or of Spendon the Laconian, they would not doe it: ſaying, they durſt not ſing them for their maiſters. Wherefore he that firſt ſaid in the countrie of LACEDÆMONIA, he that is free is more free, and he that is bonde, is more bonde then in other places: knew very well the diuerſitie betweene the libertie and bondage there, and the libertie and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the LACEDÆMONIANS began to vſe theſe great outrages and cruelties, long time after the death of Lycurgus, and ſpecially ſince the great earthquake that happened at SPARTA, at which time the ILOTES roſe againſt them with the MESSENIANS, and did great miſchiefe through the countrie, and put the citie to the greateſt diſtreſſe and danger that euer it had. For I cannot be perſuaded, that euer Lycurgus inuented, or inſtituted, ſo wicked & miſchieuous an acte, as that kinde of ordinance was: becauſe I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and iuſtice we ſee he vſed in all his other doings, and was witneſſed beſides by open oracle from the goddes, for a iuſt and wiſe man. Furthermore, they ſay of him, that when he ſaw the chiefeſt points of his gouernement had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his commonweale went on, and was ſtrong enough to maintaine and keepe it ſelfe a foote, like as Plato ſaieth, that God reioyced greatly after he had made the worlde, and ſaw the ſame turne and moone his firſt moouing: euen ſo Lycurgus taking ſingular pleaſure and delight in his minde, to ſee his notable lawes put in vre, & ſo well eſtabliſhed and liked of by experience, ſought yet to make them immortall, as neere as he could poſſible, by any forecaſt of man, that no after time whatſoeuer, might chaunge or put them downe. To bring this to paſſe, he cauſed all the people to aſſemble, and tolde them he thought his ciuill pollicie and ſtate of commonweale was already ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, for vertuous and happy life: yet there was one matter behinde of greater importance then all the reſt, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntill he had firſt asked counſell of the oracle of Apollo. And therefore in the meane time they ſhould keepe and obſerue his lawes and ordinances inuiolablie, without changing, remoouing, or ſtaying any matter therein, vntill he were returned from the citie of DELPHES, and then they ſhould doe that other thing behinde, if the God then ſo counſelled him. They all promiſed him to doe it, and prayed him to make haſt to go on his iourney. But before he departed, he made the kings and ſenatours ſweare firſt, and conſequently all the people after, that they would keepe his lawes and ordinances without changing or altering any thing, vntill he did return againe. This done, he went to the citie of Delphes, where ſo ſoone as he arriued, he ſacrificed in the temple to Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man an happy life. Apollo made him anſwer, his lawes were very good, and that his citie keeping them, ſhould be the moſt renowmed of the world. Lycurgus cauſed this oracle to be written, which he ſent to Sparta. After he ſacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leaue of his friends, and of his ſonne, he determined to die, becauſe his citizens ſhould neuer be releaſed of the othe they had made betweene his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath ſtrength enough to liue longer: and yet was olde enough alſo to die if he would. Wherefore finding himſelfe happie to haue obteined his deſire, he willingly pined himſelfe to death, by abſtinence, and lack of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great perſonages ſhould bring benefit euer to the common weale, and that the end of their life ſhould be no more idle, or vnprofitable, then the reſt of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their moſt meritorious actes, to haue their death extolled for worthineſſe. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and crowne of his felicitie, after he had made and ordained ſo many good and notable lawes, for the honour and benefit of his countrie: and ſhould be as a ſeale of confirmation of his lawe, and the continuall preſeruitour of this citie, conſidering all his citizens had ſworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceiued of his hope, for his citie was the chiefeſt of the world, in glorie and honour of gouernment, by the ſpace of fiue hundred yeeres. For ſo long his citie kept his lawes without any change or alteration by any of the Kings ſucceſſours, vntill King Agis, the ſonne of Archidamus began to raigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor diſcontinue any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more ſtraight and ſtrickt order: although it ſeemed at the firſt that the Ephores were ordained, for the maintenance and defence of the libertie of the people, whereas in deed they did alſo ſtrengthen the authoritie of the Kings and Senate. Nowe in the raigne of king Agis, golde and ſiluer began firſt to creepe in againe to the citie of Sparta, by meanes of Lyſander. With money there came in ſtraight couetouſneſſe, and greedines to get and gather. And although Lyſander was not deſirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money: yet he brought riches and couetouſneſſe into the countrie, and filled the ſame with all fineneſſe, by bringing in great ſtore of golde and ſiluer from the warres, directly againſt the lawes and ordinances of Lycurgus. The which ſo long as they were in force and vſe, it appeared that the gouernment of Sparta ſeemed not to be a pollicy or commonweale, but rather a certaine holy place and order of religion. And euen as the Poets faine, that Hercules went through the world with his clubbe, and Lions skin, puniſhing cruell robbers, and vnnaturall tyrants: ſo in like caſe with a litle ſcroule of parchement, and a poore cape, did the Spartans commaund and giue lawes to all the reſt of Grece, euen with their good liking and conſent. And they chaſed the tyrants away, which vſurped tyrannicall power ouer any of their cities, and did decide all controuerſies, and oftentimes pacified their ſeditions, without ſending out one ſouldier, but onely a ſimple poore ambaſſadour. At whoſe commaundement, the people preſently aſſembled like the bees, which gather together about their King, ſo ſoone as they ſpie him: they did then ſo greatly reuerence the good gouernment & iuſtice of the Spartans. Therefore I can but wonder much at thoſe which ſay, the citie of Lacedæmon could obey well, but not commaund: and for proofe they alledge words of king Theopompus, who aunſwered one which ſaid, that Sparta was maintained, becauſe the Kings could commaund well. Nay the rather (ſaid he) becauſe the citizens can obey well. For men commonly diſdaine to obey thoſe, which are not wiſe in commaunding. So that the faithfull obedience of the ſubiects, dependeth much vpon the ſufficient commandement of the wiſe prince. For he that directeth well, muſt needs be well obeyed. For like as the arte of a good rider, is to make his horſe gentle, and ready at commaundement: euen ſo the chiefeſt point belonging to a prince, is to teach his ſubiects to obey. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians procured, that not onely other people did willingly obey them, but alſo deſired to be ruled, and commanded by them. For they asked them, neither ſhippes nor money, nor yet did ſend them any number of men of warre to compell them, but onely they ſent one citizen of SPARTA to gouerne them, to whom all the other people ſubmitted themſelues, and were holpen by him in their neceſſitie, as fearing and reuerencing him. In this wiſe the SICILIANS were holpen by Gyſippus, the CHALCIDIANS by Braſidas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lyſander, Callicratidas, and by Ageſilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of princes, peoples, and Kings, vnto whom they were ſent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the citie of SPARTA, as vpon the moſt prefect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common weale after. To this effect tended the mery word ſpoken in ieſt by Stratonicus: Who ſaid he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their ſacrifices, and the ELIANS to tend their games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDÆMONIANS ſhould be well whipped. That was merily ſpoken, and in a ieſting manner. But Antiſthenes (the philoſopher and one of Socrates ſcholers) ſeeing the THEBANS growen very hawty & glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS in the iorney of LEVCTRES: me thinketh ſaid he, theſe THEBANS here do like the ſchoole boyes, which bragge and reioyce when they haue a little beaten their maſter. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to haue his citie to commaunde many. But he thought the felicitie of a citie, as of a priuate man, conſiſted chiefly in the exerciſe of vertue, and in the vnitie of the inhabitantes thereof. He framed his common wealth to this ende, that his citizens ſhould be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintaine and keepe themſelues long in ſafetie. The ſelfe ſame intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in ſetting forth their bookes, which they wrote of the gouernment of common weales: and ſo had likewiſe many other great and learned men which haue written of the ſame matter. Howbeit they onely left behind them, wordes, and written books: but Lucurgus contrariwiſe, left no written books nor pamphlets, but ſtabliſhed and left behind him, a royall forme of gouernment, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainely ſee, a whole citie liue together, and gouerne it ſelfe philoſophically, according to the true rules and preceptes of perfect wiſedome: which imagined that true wiſdome was a thing hanging in the aire, and could not viſibly be ſeene in the world. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glorie all thoſe, which euer tooke vpon them to write or ſtabliſh the gouernement of a common weale. And therefore ſayth Ariſtotle, that after his death they did him leſſe honour in LACEDÆMONIA, then he had deſerued: albeit they did him all the honour they poſſibly could deuiſe. And yet they built a temple for him, and made ſolemne ſacrifice to him euery yeare, as vnto a god. More, they ſay, that when the aſhes of his bodie were brought to SPARTA, there fell ſtraight lightning vpon his tombe where they were put which they had not often ſeene to happen, to other men of name after their deceaſe, ſauing only to the poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neere the citie of ARETHVSA. The which is ſome manifeſt argument, for ſuch as loue the Poet, to lay againſt thoſe which ſomewhat deprauc him, ſeeing this ſigne came to him after his death, which had happened before to a moſt well beloued man of the goddes. Some ſay Lycurgus died in the citie of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis ſayth, he dyed in ELIDA. Timæus and Ariſtoxenus write, he ended his dayes in CRETA. And Ariſtoxenus ſayth further, that thoſe of the Ile of CRETA doe ſhewe his graue in the place which they call Pergamia, by the broad high wayes ſide. He left one onely begotten ſonne named Antiorus, who died without iſſue, ſo that his houſe and name fayled with him. But his neere kinſmen and familiar friendes, did ſet vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the dayes wherein they aſſembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Ariſtocrates (the ſonne of Hipparchus) who ſayth, that hee being dead in CRETA, his friends burned his bodie, and afterwardes threw his aſhes into the ſea, according as he had prayed and requeſted them. For he feared, that if any part of him ſhould at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitants would haue ſayd he was returned againe, and thereby would haue thought themſelues diſcharged of their oth, and might haue lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the diſcourſe and end of Lycurgus life.

Numa Pompilius.

In what time Numa was. Cicero de Or. 2. & Tuſcul. 4. Liu. Halic. li. 2.

THE Hiſtoriographers differ maruelouſly of the time, in which Numa Pompilius raigned king, albeit ſome wil deriue from him many noble houſes deſcẽded in ROME. For one Clodius, who wrote the booke intituled the table of time, affirmeth that the ancient regiſters of the citie of ROME were loſt when it was taken & ſacked by the GAVLES: and that thoſe which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men deſirous to gratifie ſome, which haue thruſt in ancient houſes and families of the firſt ROMAINES, that concerne nothing them whom they ment to repreſent. On the other ſide, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familiar friend and ſcholler of Pythagoras the philoſopher, yet ſome ſay he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. And yet mainteining that it is poſſible enough, that he was ſo well borne, and had ſuch perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer needed any maſter: & though he had neded, they had rather attribute the honour of the inſtructing of this king vnto ſome other forren perſon, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other ſay, that Pythagoras the philoſopher was long time after the raigne of Numa, & well nigh fiue ages after him. Howbeit other ſay, there was another Pythagoras borne in SPARTA (who hauing wonne the pryſe of running at the games Olympicall, in the ſixtenth Olympiade, & the third yeare of Numaes raigne) did come into ITALY, where he kept much about Numa, & did aſſiſt and helpe him in the gouerning & ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many cuſtomes yet of the LACONIANS, mingled with the ROMAINES, which this ſecond Pythagoras was ſayd to haue taught him. Neuertheleſſe it is not confeſſed that Numa was borne of the SABYNES, which they ſay are deſcended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. So it falleth out very hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for ſuch as will followe the rolle or table of thoſe, which from Olympiades to Olympiades haue wonne the pryſes of games Olympicall: conſidering the rolle or table that they haue at this preſent, was very lately publiſhed by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reaſon or argument of neceſſitie, why it ſhould be taken for an vndoubted trothe, which he in that ſort hath gathered. Yet we will not leaue to put in writing thoſe things worthy thy of memory which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meeteſt. It was now ſince ROME was built, ſeuen and thirtie yeares (for ſo long time raigned Romulus) whē Romulus the fifth of the month of Iuly (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a ſolemne ſacrifice without the citie, neere to a certaine place cōmonly called, the goat marſh. As all the whole Senate, with the moſt part of the people were preſent at this ſacrifice, ſodainely there roſe in the ayre a very great tempeſt, and a maruellous darke thicke cloud, which fell on the earth with ſuch boyſterous windes, ſtormes, lightnings, and thunder: that the poore cōmon people being affrayd of ſo ſore a tempeſt, diſperſed themſelues ſodainly, running here and there for ſuccour, and therewithall king Romulus vaniſhed away in ſuch ſort, that he was neuer after ſeene aliue nor dead. This brought the Senators & noble men whom they called Patricians, into great ſuſpition. And there ranne a foule tale among the common people, how they had long time borne very impatiently to be ſubiects to a King, becauſe themſelues would haue had and taken vpon them ſome ſoueraign authoritie, and that for this cauſe they had killed king Romulus. Adding ſomewhat more vnto it, how a litle before he had vſed them more roughly, and cōmanded them more ſtraightly then he was wont or accuſtomed. Neuertheleſſe they found the meanes to quench all theſe brutes & murmurings, by doing diuine honour and ſacrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but paſſed to a better life. To confirme this, one of the nobleſt men among them called Proclus came in, and by oth, affirmed before all the people, that he ſaw Romulus aſcending vp into heauen, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voyce ſay: from thenceforth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeaſed, there ſprange vp another trouble, to know whom they ſhould chooſe in his place. For the ſtrangers which were come then frō other places to dwel in ROME, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne ROMAINES: in ſo much, as the common people did not only wauer, and ſtagger vp and downe in opinion, but the Senators alſo (that were many and of diuers nations) did enter into a ſuſpition one of another. Theſe things notwithſtanding they all agreed in this, that of neceſſitie they muſt chooſe a King: howbeit in the reſt they differed much, not only whō they ſhould chooſe, but alſo of what nation he ſhould be. For thoſe which were the firſt founders & builders of the citie of ROME with Romulus could in no wiſe abide, nor ſuffer that the SABYNES (to whom they had diuided part of their landes, and a moytie of their citie) ſhould attempt and preſume to commaund them, whom they did receiue and aſſociate into their companie and fellowſhip. The SABYNES alledged on the other ſide for them, a good reaſon, and ſuch as caried great probabilitie. Which was, that neuer ſince the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing diſobeyed nor diſquieted king Romulus, but had ſuffered him to raigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being nowe deceaſed, reaſon would that the new King ſhould be choſen of their nation. And that albeit the ROMAINES had receiued them into their citie, they could not ſay therfore, that in time of this aſſociation, they were leſſe to be reckoned of in any thing, than them ſelues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increaſed their might and power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deſerued the honour and title of a citie. Theſe were the cauſes of their contention. But to preuent that of this contention there might grow no confuſion in the citie, if it ſhould remaine without an head to commaund: the Senators which were a hundred and fiftie in number, gaue counſell that euery one of them by turnes, one after another, ſhould carie the royall ſtate of the king, and all the ſhowes and ornaments of his maieſtie, and ſhould doe the ordinarie ſacrifices of the king, and diſpatch all cauſes ſixe houres in the day, and ſixe houres in the night, as the king before had vſed. Thus they thought it beſt to deuide the rule, that one might haue aſmuch power as the other, aſwell in reſpect of thē ſelues, as alſo for regarde of the people. For they imagined, that the chaunging and remouing thus of this regall dignitie, and paſſing it from man to man, would cleane take away enuie among them, and make euery of them to rule temperately, and vprightly ſee, that in one, and the ſelfe ſame day and night, euery of them ſhould be a King and priuate perſon alſo. The ROMAINES call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would ſay, rule for the time. Now albeit their gouernement was very modeſt and ciuill, yet they could not for all that keepe themſelues from falling into the ſuſpition, and ſlaunder of the people: who gaue it out ſtraight, that this was a fine deuiſe of theirs, to chaunge by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a few noble mens handes, to the ende that the whole authoritie and gouernement of all publique cauſes, ſhould remaine ſtill in them ſelues, becauſe it grieued them to be ſubiect to a King. And in the ende, the two partes of the citie came to this agreement: that the one part ſhould chooſe one of the bodie of the other, to be the King. This courſe they liked very well, aſwell for the pacification of preſent ſturre and diſſention amongeſt them ſelues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and ſturring vp a likeneſſe of goodwill in the King that thus indifferently ſhould be choſen: whereby he ſhould loue the one part for that they had choſen him, and likewiſe the other part for that he was of their Nation. The SABYNES were the firſt, which referred the election to the ROMAINES choyſe: and the ROMAINES thought it better to chooſe one of the Nation of the SABYNES, then to haue a ROMAINE choſen by the SABYNES. After they had conſulted, they determined amongſt them ſelues: and did chooſe Numa Pompilius one of the bodie of the SABYNES to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at ROME, howbeit hee was a man ſo famous for his vertue, that the SABYNES ſo ſoone as they named him, did receiue him more willingly, then they who had choſen him. After they had thus publiſhed their election, the firſt and chiefeſt perſons of the one and the other ſide, were choſen out to goe vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in one of the chiefeſt and beſt cities which the SABYNES had, called Cures, whereuppon the ROMAINES, and their fellowes the SABYNES were called afterwards Quirites, and he was the ſonne of Pomponius a noble man, the youngeſt of foure brethren: being by the ſecret working of the goddes, borne on the very day, on the which ROME was firſt founded by Romulus, which was the one and twentieth day of Aprill. This man being naturally giuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increaſe the ſame, by ſtudie, and all kind of good diſcipline: and by the exerciſe thereof, and of true patience, and right philoſophie, he did maruellouſly adorne himſelfe and his manners. For hee did not onely cleare his ſoule, and minde, of all paſſions and vices commonly vſed in the world: but he conquered in himſelfe all heates, violence, & couetouſneſſe. And would neither ſeeke nor vſurpe, that which was an other mans, a thing at that time honored among the moſt barbarous people: but thought that to be the true, and right victorie in man, firſt to conquer and commaund himſelfe by iudgement and reaſon, and then to ſubdue all couetouſnes and greedines. Hauing therefore this opinion, he would in no wiſe haue in his houſe any ſuperfluitie or fineneſſe. He became to euery man that would employ him (aſwell ſtraunger as his owne countrie man) a wiſe counſaillour, and an vpright iudge. He beſtowed his leaſure, not to follow his owne delight, or to gather goods together: but to ſerue the goddes, & to behold their celeſtiall nature and power, as much as mans reaſon and vnderſtanding could comprehend. Therby he got ſo great a name and reputation, that Tatius (which was king of ROME with Romulus) hauing but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his ſonne in law. Howbeit this mariage put him in no ſuch iolitie, that he would dwel at ROME with his father in law, but rather kept at home at his owne houſe in the countrie of the SABYNES, there to ſerue and cheriſh his olde father with his wiſe Tatia: who for her part alſo liked better, to liue quietly with her husband being a priuate man, then to go to ROME where ſhe might haue liued in much honour and glory, by meanes of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13. yeares after ſhe was maried. After her death, Numa leauing to dwell in the citie, was better contented to liue in the country alone, and ſolitarie, & gaue himſelfe to walke much in the fields and woods conſecrated to the gods, as one deſirous to leade alone life, farre from the companie of men. Whereupon was raiſed (in my opinion) that which is ſpoken of him, and of the goddeſſe Egeria. That it was not for any ſtrangeneſſe, or melancholines of nature, that Numa withdrew himſelf from the conuerſation and company of men, but becauſe he had found another more honorable and holy ſocietie of the Nymph, and goddeſſe Egeria, who had done him, as they ſay, that honour, as to make him her husbande: with whom as his beloued darling it is ſaide he enioyed happie dayes, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inſpired with the loue and knowledge of all celeſtiall things. Surely, theſe deuiſes are much like vnto certaine old fables of the Phrygians, which they hauing learned from the father to the ſonne, do loue to tell of one Atis: of the Bithynians,

Numa conuerſant with the goddeſſe Egeria of one Herodotus: of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion: and of many other ſuch like men, who in their liues were taken for ſaints, and beloued of the goddes. Notwithſtanding, it is likely, that the goddes loue neither birdes, nor horſe, but men, and haue ſometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and doe not diſdaine ſometime the conuerſation of ſuch as be holy, religious, and deuout. But to beleeue the goddes haue carnall knowledge, and doe delight in the outward beauty of creatures, that ſeemeth to carie a very hard beliefe. Yet the wiſe EGYPTIANS thinke it probable enough and likely, that the ſpirit of the goddes hath giuen originall of generation to women, and doe beget fruit of their bodies: howbeit they hold that a man can haue no corporall company with any diuine nature. Wherein they doe not conſider, that euery thing that ioyneth together, doth deliuer againe a like ſubſtaunce, to that wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithſtanding, it is meete we ſhould beleeue the gods beare good will to men, and that of it doth ſpring their loue, whereby men ſay the gods loue thoſe whoſe manners they purifie and inſpire with vertue. And they doe not offend, which faine that Phorbas, Hyacinthus and Admetus, were ſometimes the louers of Apollo, and alſo Hippolytus the SICYONIAN: of whom they report, that euer when he paſſed ouer the arme of the ſea which lieth betweene the citties of SICYONA, and of CIRRHA, the god which knew he came, reioyſed, and cauſed Pythia the propheteſſe to pronounce theſe heroycall verſes.

Gods familiar with men.

I know full well, my deare Hippolytus. returnes by ſea, my minde diuineth thus.

Who are beloued of the goddes.

It is ſayd alſo that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verſes, and that the goddes honored the poets Heſiodus, and Archilocus, after their death by the Muſes. They ſay moreouer, that AEſculapius lay with Sophocles in his life time, and at this day they doe yet ſhow many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honorably buried. Now if they graunt, that ſuch things may be true: how can we refuſe to beleeue, that ſome goddes haue bene familiar with Zaleuſus, Minos, Zoroaſtres, Lycurgus, Numa, and ſuch other like perſonages, which haue gouerned kingdoms, and ſtabliſhed common weales? and it is not vnlike that the goddes in deede did company with them, to inſpire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw neare vnto theſe Poets and plaiers of the harpe, that made and played many dolefull and ioyfull ditties, at the leaſt for their ſport and pleaſure onely, if euer they came neare them. Neuertheleſſe if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large as Bacchylides ſayd, to thinke and ſay as he luſt. For my ſelfe I doe finde, that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other ſuch perſons, not to be without likelyhood and probability: who hauing to gouerne rude, churliſh, and ſtiffe necked people, and purpoſing to bring in ſtraunge nouelties into the gouernments of their countreis, did faine wiſely to haue conference with the gods, conſidering this fayning fell to be profitable and beneficiall to thoſe them ſelues, whom they made to beleeue the ſame. But to returne to our hiſtory. Numa was forty yeares old, when the ambaſſadours of ROME were ſent to preſent the kingdome vnto him, and to intreat him to accept thereof. Proclus, and Veleſus, were the ambaſſadours that were ſent. One of the which the people looked ſhould haue bene choſen for King, becauſe thoſe of Romulus ſide, did fauour much Proclus: and thoſe of Tatius part fauoured Veleſus. Now they vſed no long ſpeach vnto him, becauſe they thought he would haue bene glad of ſuch a great good fortune. But contrarily it was in deede a very hard thing, and required great perſwaſions, and much intreaty, to moue a man which had alwaies liued quietly, and at eaſe, to accept the regiment of a citty, which as a man would ſay, had bene raiſed vp and growen by warres, and martiall deedes. Wherefore he aunſwered them in the preſence of his father, and one other of his kinſemen called Martius in this ſort. Change and alteration of mans life is euer dangerous: but for him that lacketh nothing neceſſary, nor hath cauſe to cõplain of his preſent ſtate, it is a great folly to leaue his old acquainted trade of life, and to enter into another new and vnknowen, if there were no other but this only reſpect: that he leaueth a certainety, to venter vppon vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the dãgers & perils of this kingdom which they offer me, are not altogether vncertain, if we will looke back what happened vnto Romulus. Who was not vnſuſpected to haue laid wait, to haue had Tatius his fellow & cõpanion murdered: & now after Romulus death, the Senators ſelues are miſtruſted to haue killed him on the other ſide by treaſon. And yet they ſay it, and ſing it euery where: that Romulus was the ſonne of a God, that at his birth he was miraculouſly preſerued, and afterwardes he was as incredibly brought vp. Whereas for my owne part, I doe confeſſe, I was begotten by a mortall man, and was foſtered, brought vp, and taught by men as you know: and theſe few qualities which they praiſe and commend in me, are conditions far vnmeete for a man that is to raigne. I euer loued a ſolitarie life, quiet and ſtudy, and did exempt my ſelfe from worldly cauſes. All my life time I haue ſought and loued peace aboue all thinges, and neuer had to doe with any warres. My conuerſation hath bene to company with men, which meete only to ſerue and honor the goddes, or to laugh and be mery one with another, or els to ſpend their time in their priuate affaires, or otherwiſe ſometime to attend their paſtures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my ROMAINE lords) hath left you many warres begonne, which peraduenture you could be contented to ſpare: yet now to maintaine the ſame, your city had neede of a martiall King, actiue, and ſtrong of body. Your people moreouer, through long cuſtome, and the great increaſe they are giuen vnto by feates of armes, deſire nought elſe perhappes but warres: and it is plainely ſeene, they ſeeke ſtill to grow, and commaund their neighbours. So that if there were no other conſideration in it, yet were it a meere mockerie for me, to goe to teach a city at this preſent to ſerue the goddes, to loue iuſtice, to hate warres, and to flie violence: when it rather hath neede of a conquering captaine, then of a peaceable King. Theſe and ſuch other like reaſons and perſwaſions Numa alledged, to diſcharge himſelfe of the Kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit the ambaſſadours of the ROMAINES moſt humbly beſought and praied him with all inſtance poſſible, that he would not be the cauſe of another new ſtur, and commotion among them, ſeeing both parts in the citty haue giuen their conſent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreouer, when the ambaſſadours had left him vpon this ſute, his father, and Martius his kinſeman, beganne alſo priuately to perſwade him, that he ſhould not refuſe ſo good and godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his preſent ſtate, and deſired to be no richer then he was, nor coueted no princely honour nor glory, becauſe he ſought only moſt famous vertue: yet hee muſt needes thinke, that to rule well, was to doe the goddes good ſeruice, whoſe will it was to employ the iuſtice they knew in him, and not to ſuffer it to be idle. Refuſe not therefore (qꝥ they) this royall dignity, which to a graue and wiſe man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable works & fruits. There you may doe noble ſeruice to the goddes, to humble the hearts of theſe martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious: for they readely turne, and eaſely conforme them ſelues vnto the nature of their prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a ſtraunger: they haue conſecrated a memory to Romulus with diuine honours, which they make vnto him at this day. And it may be, that the people ſeeing them ſelues conquerers, will be full enough of warres: and the ROMAINES being now full of ſpoiles and triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle prince, and one that loueth iuſtice, that they may thenceforth liue in peace, vnder good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwiſe, that their hearts be ſtill full of heate and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their deſire to make warres ſome other way, when a man hath the bridle in his owne handes to doe it, and to be a meane in the meane time to ioyne the countrey, and all the nations of the SABINES in perpetuall loue and amity, with ſo mighty and floriſhing a citty? beſides all theſe perſwaſions and reaſons, there were many ſignes alſo (as they ſay) which promiſed him good lucke, together with the earneſt affection and liking of his owne countrey citizens. Who, ſo ſoone as they vnderſtood the comming & commiſſion of the ambaſſadours of ROME, they importunately deſired him to goe thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdome: that he might more ſtraightly vnite and incorporate them together with the ROMAINES. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done ſacrifice to the goddes, he ſet forwards on his iourney towardes ROME: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with a wonderfull deſire to ſee him. The women at his entry, went bleſſing of him, and ſinging of his praiſes. They did ſacrifice for him, in all the temples of the goddes. There was neither man nor woman but ſeemed to be as ioyfull and glad: as if a new Realme, and not a new King, had beene come to the citty of ROME. Thus was he brought with this open ioy,

and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and ſo by one conſent he was choſen King, with all the voyces of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himſelfe commaunded they ſhould be ſtaid a while, ſaying: He muſt firſt be confirmed King by the gods. Then he tooke the wiſe men & prieſts, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which that time was yet called mount Tarpeian. And there, the chiefeſt of the ſoothſayers called Augures, turned him towardes the ſouth, hauing his face couered with a vaile, and ſtood behinde him, laying his right hand vpon his head, and praying to the gods that it would pleaſe them to declare their willes by flying of birdes, or ſome other token concerning this election: and ſo the ſoothſayer caſt his eyes all about, as farre as he could poſſibly diſcerne. During all this time there was a maruellous ſilence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were aſſembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the iſſue of this diuinatiō would be: vntill there appeared vnto them on the right hand, good and lucky birdes, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his regall robes, came downe from mount Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receiued him with wonderfull ſhoutes of ioy, as a man the moſt holy, and beſt beloued of the goddes that they could haue choſen. So hauing taken the royall ſeate of the Kingdome, his firſt act was this. That he diſcharged the guard of the three hundred ſouldiers, which Romulus had alwaies about his perſon, called Celeres: ſaying he would not miſtruſt them which truſted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which ſhould miſtruſt him. His ſecond act was, that he did adde to the two prieſts of Iupiter & Mars, a third, in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the auncient ROMAINES alſo called their prieſts, inſtituted in the old time, Flamines, by reaſon of certaine litle narrowe hats which they did weare on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in Greeke ſignifieth a hat. And at that time (as they ſay) there were many mo Greeke wordes mingled with the Latine, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did weare Lænas. And Iuba ſaith, that it is the very ſame which the GRECIANS call Chlænas, and that the young boy which was a ſeruant in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as ſome of the GRECIANS doe yet call the god Mercurie, becauſe hee is ſeruaunt of the gods. Now Numa hauing done theſe things at his firſt entrie into his Kingdome, ſtill to winne further fauour and good will of the people: beganne immediatly to frame his citizens to a certaine ciuility, being as iron wrought to ſoftnes, and brought them from their violent and warlike deſires, to temperate and ciuill manners. For out of doubt, ROME was properly that, which Plato aſcribeth to a city full of trouble and pride. For, firſt it was founded by the moſt couragious and warlike men of the world, which from all parts were gathered there together, in a moſt deſperate boldnes: and afterwards it increaſed, and grew ſtrong, by armes and continuall warres, like as piles driuen into the ground, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and ſticke the faſter. Wherfore Numa iudging it no ſmall nor light enterpriſe, to plucke downe the haughty ſtomacks of ſo fierce and violent a people, and to frame them vnto a ſober and quiet life: did ſeeme to worke it by meanes of the goddes, with drawing them on thereto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their whot and fierce courages to fight, with ſacrifices, feaſtes, dauncings, and common proceſſions, wherein he celebrated euer himſelfe. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled now and then, paſtime and pleaſure: and ſometimes he laid the terrour and feare of the goddes before their eyes, making them beleeue that he had ſeene ſtraunge viſions, or that he had heard voyces, by which the goddes did threaten them with ſome great troubles and plagues, alwaies to pull downe and humble their hearts, vnto the feare of the goddes. This was the cauſe why they thought afterwardes that he had learned his wiſedome of Pythagoras the Philoſopher: becauſe the greateſt part of the philoſophy of the one, and of the gouernment of the other, conſiſted in ſuch ceremonies, and diuine ſtudies. They report alſo that Numa did put on the outward ſhow and ſemblaunce of Pythagoras holineſſe, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they ſay, made an Eagle ſo tame and gentle, that ſhe would ſtoupe, and come downe to him by certaine voices, as ſhe flew in the aire ouer his head. And that paſſing through the aſſembly of the games Olympicall, he ſhewed her thigh of gold, & many other pretty feats and deedes they tell of, which ſeemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliaſian hath written theſe verſes of him:

Pythagoras which loued to dwell in dignity, and had an heart to glory bent, and paſt in pollicy,
Much like a man which ſought, by charming to enchaunt,
did vſe this art, to winne mens mindes, which vnto him did haunt,
His graue and pleaſaunt tongue, in ſugred ſpeach did flow, whereby he drew moſt mindes of men, to bent of his owne bow.

Euen ſo the fained fable of Numa, which he ſo cunningly diſguiſed, was about the loue of a goddeſſe, or ſome Nymphe of the mountaine: with whom he ſeemed to haue certaine ſecret meetings and talke, whereof we haue ſpoken before. And it is ſayed he much frequented the Muſes in the woddes. For he would ſay, he had the moſt part of his reuelations of the Muſes, and he taught the Romains to reuerence one of them aboue all the reſt, who was called Tacita, as ye would ſay, Lady ſilence. It ſeemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did ſo ſpecially commaund, and recommend ſilence vnto his ſchollers. Againe, if we conſider what Numa ordained concerning images, and the repreſentation of the goddes, it is altogether agreable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that God was neither ſenſible, nor mortall, but inuiſible, incorruptible, and only intelligible. And Numa did forbid the Romaines alſo to beleeue, that God had euer forme, or likeneſſe of beaſt or man. So that in thoſe former times, there was in Rome no image of God, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred three ſcore and ten yeares, that they had built temples & chappels vnto the gods in Rome, and yet there was neither picture nor image of God within thē. For they tooke it at the firſt for a ſacriledge, to preſent heauenly things by earthly formes, ſeeing we cannot poſſibly any way attaine to the knowledge of God, but in minde and vnderſtanding. The very ſacrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreable, and like vnto the manner of ſeruing of the gods, which the Pythagorians vſed. For in their ſacrifices they ſpilt not [illegible] bloud, but they did theirs commonly, with a litle meale, a litle ſheading of wine and milke, and with ſuch other light things. Such as affirme that thoſe two men did much company and were familiar together, do laie further proofes and arguments for the ſame. The firſt is this: that the Romaines did make Pythagoras a free man of the city of Rome, as Epicharmus the Comicall poet an auncient writer (and ſometimes one of Pythagoras ſchollers) ſaith in a book he wrote and dedicated vnto Antenor. The other proofe is: That Numa hauing had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras ſonnes name, from whom they ſay is diſcended, the houſe of the AEmilians, which is the nobleſt of the Patricians: for the King gaue him the ſurname of AEmilius, becauſe of his ſweet tongue and pleaſant voice. Furthermore, I my ſelfe haue heard ſay many times in Rome, that the Romaines hauing receiued an oracle, which commanded them to ſet vp images in their city, to the wiſeſt & valianteſt man that euer was among the Grecians: cauſed two ſtatues of braſſe to be ſet vp in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, and the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to ſtriue about this matter any further, ſeeing there are ſo many doubtes: me thinketh it were but vaine. Moreouer, they attribute to Numa, the firſt erection of the colledge pontificall: and ſay he him ſelfe was the firſt Pontifex that euer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, ſome will ſay they were ſo called, becauſe they chiefly were ordained & appointed for the ſeruice of the almighty: for this word Potens in the Romaine tongue, betokeneth mighty. Other thinke this name was giuen to them by their founders, as to exempt perſons out of the world: who enioyned them to do all the ſeruice and ſacrifices to the goddes they could poſſibly, and yet notwithſtanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not ſtraight condemned for omitting the ſame. Howbeit the moſt part doe bring out another deriuation of this name, wherein me thinkes there is little reaſon. As that they ſhould be called Pontifices, becauſe they had the charge and maintenaunce of the bridge. For that which the Grecians call Gephyran, the Latines call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to ſay truely, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the Biſhops: as well as the keeping of the moſt holy and vnchangeable ceremonies. For the ROMAINES thought it not only a thing vnlawful, but tooke it for a moſt damnable and wicked act, to deſtroy or breake the bridge of wood, which was only ioyned together (as they ſay) with pinnes of wood, & without any iron at all, by the commandement of an olde oracle. But the ſtone bridge was built long time after the raigne of Numa, and in the time of the raigne of his nephew Martius. Now the firſt and chiefeſt of theſe biſhops, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the high prieſt and maiſter, of their pontificall lawe: who ſhould be carefull, not onely about all publique ſacrifices and ceremonies, but alſo about ſuch as were priuate, and to ſee that no man priuately ſhould breake the auncient ceremonies, nor bring in any new thing into religion, but rather euery man ſhould be taught by him, how, and after what ſorte he ſhould ſerue and honour the gods. He alſo hath the keeping of the holy virgines which they call Veſtales. For they do giue Numa the firſt foundation and conſecrating of them, and the inſtitution alſo of keeping the immortall fire with honour and reuerence, which theſe virgines haue the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to commit the ſubſtance of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the cuſtodie of cleane and vncorrupt maides: or els becauſe he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, and bringeth forth nothing) was fitteſt, and moſt proper vnto virgines. For in GRECE, where they kept continuall fire likewiſe (as in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the maidens do not keepe the ſame, but olde women which are paſt mariage. And if this fire chaunce to faile, as they ſay in ATHENS the holy lampe was put out in the time of the tyrannie of Ariſtion: and in the citie of DELPHES it was put out, when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME alſo, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINES had againſt king Mithridates: and in the time of the ciuill warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and conſumed together: they ſay that it muſt not be lighted againe with other common fire, but muſt be made a new, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the ſunne, and that they doe in this manner. They haue a hollowe veſſell made of a peece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two ſides a like: ſo that from all parts of his compaſſe and circumference, it falleth into one pointe. Then they ſet this veſſell right againſt the beames of the ſunne, ſo that the bright ſunne beames come to aſſemble and gather together in the center of this veſſell, where they doe pearce the aire ſo ſtrongly, that they ſet it a fire: and when they put to it any drie matter or ſubſtance, the fire taketh it ſtraight, becauſe the beame of the ſunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drie matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thinke that theſe Veſtall virgines keepe no other thing, but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other ſay, there are other holy things alſo, which no body may lawfully ſee but they: whereof we haue written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the leaſt ſo much as may be learned and tolde. The firſt maidens which were vowed and put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they ſay) Gegania, and Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwards king Seruius increaſed the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vntill this day. Their rule & order ſet downe by king Numa was this: that they ſhould vowe chaſtitie for the ſpace of thirtie yeares. In the firſt ten yeares they learne what they haue to doe: the next ten yeares following, they doe that which they haue learned: and the laſt ten yeares, they teach young nouices. After they haue paſſed their thirtie yeares, they may lawfully marie if they be diſpoſed, and take them to another manner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very few of them which haue taken this libertie, and fewer alſo which haue ioyed after they were profeſſed, but rather haue repented themſelues, and liued euer after a very grieuous and ſorowfull life. This did ſo fraye the other Veſtalls, that they were better contented with their vowed chaſtitie: and ſo remained virgines, vntill they were olde, or els dyed. He gaue them alſo great priuiledges, and prerogatiues. As: to make their will and teſtament, in their fathers life time. To doe all things without any gardian or ouerſeer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they goe abroade, they carie maces before them to honour them. And if by chaunce they meete any offendour in their way, going to execution, they ſaue his life: howbeit the profeſſed Veſtall muſt affirme by othe, that ſhe met him vnwares, & not of ſet purpoſe. If any man preſume vnder their chaire, whereupon they are caried through the citie, he ſhall die for it. Alſo when they themſelues do any faulte, they are corrected by the great biſhop, who ſometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and qualitie of their offence) in a darke place, and vnder a curten. But ſhe that hath deflowred her virginity, is buried quick by one of the gates of the citie, which they call Collina gate: where within the citie there is a mount of earth of a good length, and ~~with~~ by the LATINES is ſaid to be raiſed. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollow vawte, and leaue a hole open, whereby one may go downe: and within it there is ſet a litle bed, a burning lampe, & ſome victuals to ſuſtaine life withall. As a litle bread, a litle water, a little milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honours ſake: to the ende they would not be thought to famiſh a body to death, which had bene conſecrated by the moſt holy and deuoute ceremonies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer ſtrongly, and cloſe it vp with thick leather in ſuch ſorte, that no body can ſo much as heare her voyce, and ſo they carie her thus ſhut vp through the market place. Euery one draweth back, when they ſee this litter a farre off, and do giue it place to paſſe by: and then follow it mourningly with heauy lookes, & ſpeake neuer a word. They do nothing in the citie more fearefull to behold, then this: neither is there any day wherein the people are more ſorowfull, then on ſuch a day. Then after ſhe is come to the place of this vawte, the ſergeants ſtraight vnloſe theſe faſt bound couerings: and the chiefe biſhop after he hath made certaine ſecret prayers vnto the gods, and lift his handes vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Veſtall muffled vp cloſe, and ſo putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyeth her downe into the vawte. That done, he withdraweth, and all the prieſts with him: and when the ſeely offendour is gone downe, they ſtraight pluck vp the ladder, and caſt aboundance of earth in at the open hole, ſo that they fill it vp to the very top of the arche. And this is the puniſhment of the Veſtalls which defile their virginitie.

They thinke alſo it was Numa that built the round temple of the goddeſſe Veſta, in which is kept the euerlaſting fire: meaning to repreſent not the forme of the earth, which they ſay is Veſta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middeſt whereof (according to the Pythagorians opinion) remaineth the proper ſeate and abiding place of fire, which they call Veſta, and name it the vnitie. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmooueable, nor yet that it is ſet in the middeſt of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it: but ſay to the contrarie, that the earth hanged in the ayre about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they graunt, that the earth is one of the firſt and chiefeſt parts of the world: as Plato helde opinion in that age, that the earth was in another place then in the very middeſt, and that the center of the world, as the moſt honorableſt place, did appertaine to ſome other of more worthy ſubſtance than the earth.

Furthermore, the biſhops office was to ſhewe thoſe that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and cuſtomes of buriall: whome Numa taught not to beleeue that there was any corruption or diſhoneſty in burials, but rather it was to worſhip and honour the goddes of the earth, with vſuall and honourable ceremonies, as thoſe which after their death receiue the chiefeſt ſeruice of vs that they can.

Libitina honored at funerals

But aboue all other in burials, they did ſpecially honour the goddeſſe called Libitina, that is ſaid, the chiefe gouernour and preſeruer of the rites of the dead: or be it Proſerpina, or Venus, as the moſt learned men among the ROMAINES do iudge, who not without cauſe do attribute the order of the beginning and end of mans life, to one ſelfe god, and power diuine.

The time of mourning.

Numa ordained alſo, how long time euery body ſhould mourne in blacke. And for a childe from three yeares to ten yeares of age, that dyed: he ordained they ſhould mourne no more moneths then it had liued yeares, and not to adde a day more For he commanded, that the longeſt time of mourning ſhould be but ten moneths onely, and ſo long time at the leaſt he willed women ſhould remaine widdowes, after the deceaſe of their husbands: or elſe ſhe that would marie within that time, was bounde by his order to ſacrifice a whole bullock.

Numa alſo erected many other orders of prieſts: of two ſortes whereof I will only make mention. The one ſhall be the order of the SALII, and the other of the FECIALES: for me thinkes, both the one and the other dooth manifeſtly ſhewe the great holineſſe, and ſingular deuotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly thoſe, which the GRECIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would ſay, peacekeepers. And in my iudgement, they had their right name according to their office, becauſe they did pacifie quarels with reaſon by waye of order, and did not ſuffer (as much as in them laye) that any matter ſhould be tried by violence, vntill they were paſt all hope of any peace. For the Grecians call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controuerſie with reaſon, and not with ſworde. Euen ſo thoſe which the Romaines called the Feciales, went many times in perſon to thoſe that did the Romaines iniurie, and ſought to perſuade them with good reaſon, to keep promiſe with the Romaines, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeeld to reaſon, whom they ſought to perſuade: then they called the gods to the witneſſe thereof, and praied them, that if they did not moſt earneſtly incenſe the Romaines, to purſue that moſt iuſtly appertained vnto their right, that all euils and miſchieues of the warres might fall vpon themſelues, and on their countrie. This done, they did threaten open warres againſt ſuch enemies. And if the Feciales would not conſent to open warres, and did happen to ſpeake againſt them: it was not lawfull in that caſe, neither for priuate perſon, nor for the King himſelfe to make any warres. But like a iuſt prince, he muſt haue leaue by their ſufferance to make the wars. Then did he conſider, and conſult, by what meanes he might beſt procure, & proſecute the ſame. Concerning this matter, they iudge that the ill hap which came to the Romaines, when the citie of Rome was taken and ſacked by the Gavles, chaunced iuſtly for breaking of this holy inſtitution. For at that time, the barbarous people beſieged the citie of the Clvsinians: and Fabius Ambuſtus was ſent ambaſſadour vnto them, to ſee if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill aunſwer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embaſie had bene ended, and being ſomwhat hotte, and raſhe, in defence of the Clvsinians, gaue defiance to the vallianteſt Gavle there, to fight with him mã to man. Fortune fauored him in this chalenge: for he ſlew the Gavle, and ſtripped him in the field. The Gavles ſeeing their man ſlaine, ſent immediatly an heraulde to Rome, to accuſe Fabius, howe againſt all right and reaſon, he began warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The Feciales being then conſulted with therabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the hands of the Gavles, as one that had broken the lawe of armes, and had deſerued it: but he made friends to the people which fauored him very much, and by their meanes eſcaped his deliuerie, and puniſhment. Neuertheleſſe, the Gavles within ſhort time after, came before Rome with all their power: which they tooke, ſacked, & burnt euery whit, ſauing the Capitoll, as we haue written more amplie in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Prieſts that were called Salij, they ſay he did inſtitute them vpon this occaſion. In the eight yeare of his reigne, there came a peſtilent diſeaſe through all Italie, and at the length it crept alſo into Rome. Whereat euery man being greatly affraide and diſcouraged, they ſay there fell from heauen a target of copper, which lighted betweene the hands of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King himſelfe affirmed he heard, of the Nymphe Egeria, and the Muſes. To wit, that this target was ſent from heauen, for the health and preſeruation of the citie: and therefore he ſhould keepe it carefully, and cauſe eleuen other to be caſt and made, all like vnto the ſame in faſhion and greatneſſe, to the end, that if any would enterpriſe to ſteale it, he ſhould not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he ſaid, he was commaunded to conſecrate the place to the Muſes (in the which he did oftentimes companie with them) and alſo the fields which were neere thereabouts: and likewiſe to giue the fountaine that ſprang in that place, vnto the Veſtalls profeſſed, that euery day they might drawe water at that Well, to waſh the ſanctuarie of their temple. The ſucceſſe hereof proued his words true, for the ſicknes ceaſed incontinently. So he aſſembled all the chiefe crafts men then in Rome, to proue which of them would take vpon him to make one like vnto that. Euery man deſpaired to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellenteſt workeman that was in thoſe dayes) did make them all ſo ſute like, that Numa himſelfe did not knowe the firſt target, when they were all laide together. So he ordained theſe prieſts Salij, to haue the cuſtodie of theſe targets, to ſee them ſafe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of Salian borne in Samothracia, or in Mantinea, as ſome haue vntruly alleaged, who firſt inuented the manner of dauncing all armed: but they were ſo called, of their faſhion and manner of dauncing, and leaping. For in the moneth of Marche, they go skipping and leaping vp and downe the citie, with thoſe targets on their armes, apparelled in red caſſockes without ſleeues, and girded about with broade leather ſworde girdles, ſtudded with copper, hauing helmets of copper on their heads,& ſtriking vpon their targets with ſhort daggers, which they cary in their hands. Moreouer, all their dauncing conſiſteth in mouing of their feete: for they handle them finely, making turnes aboue ground and beneath, with a ſodaine meaſure, and a maruellous force of agilitie. They call theſe targets Ancylia, becauſe of their faſhion, which is not altogether compaſſe: for they are not all round as other common targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many foldes, and one ſo neere another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon. Or els they are ſo called, becauſe Ancon ſignifieth an elbow, vpon which they cary them. All theſe deriuations are written in the hiſtorie of Iuba, who in any caſe will haue this word Ancylia to be drawne out of the Greeke tongue. And it may be alſo they were ſo called, becauſe the firſt came from aboue, which the GRECIANS call Anecathen: or els for healing the ſick, which is called Aceſis. Or els for ceaſing of the drineſſe, which in Greeke is called, Anchmôn Lyſis. Or for the ending of all diſeaſes and euils, for which cauſe the ATHENIANS call Caſtor and Pollux, Anacas: if they luſt to giue this word his deriuation from the Greeke tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldſmith had for the making of theſe targets was, that the Salij vnto this day do make mention of him, in their ſong, which they ſing going through the citie, and dauncing of their daunce all armed. Howbeit ſome thinke they ſay not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, auncient memorie. But Numa after he had ordained and inſtituted theſe orders of prieſts, built his palace neere vnto the temple of Veſta, which holdeth his name Regia at this day, to ſay, the Kings palace. In which he remained moſt part of his life, ſtudying either to ſacrifice to the gods, or to teach the Prieſts what they ſhould do, or how with them he ſhould beſt contemplate all heauenly things. It is true that he had another houſe on the hill, which they call at this day, Quirinall, the place whereof is yet to be ſeene. But in all theſe ſacrifices, ceremonies, and proceſſions of the Prieſts, there were alwaies huſſhers that went before, crying to the people, keepe ſilence, and tend vpon diuine ſeruice. For they ſay the Pythagorians thought it good, that men ſhould not worſhip the gods, nor make prayers to them in paſſing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it meete, that men ſhould of purpoſe go out of their houſes, to ſerue and pray vnto them. Euen ſo King Numa thought it not meete, that his ſubiects ſhould come to ſee, and heare diuine ſeruice negligently, as it were for a faſhion, and onely to be ridde of it, as heeding an other thing: but he would haue them ſet aſide all other buſines, and employ their thoughts and hearts only vpon the principall ſeruice of religion, and deuotion towards the gods. So that during ſeruice time, he would not haue heard any noiſe, any knocking, bounſing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in all artificers ſhops of occupation, whereof at this day yet they ſeee ſome ſignes and tokens, remaining in their ſacrifices at ROME. For all the time the Augur beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any ſacrifice, the vergers crie alowde: Hoc Age, which meaneth, tend this. And it is a warning to thoſe that are preſent, to call their wittes home, and to thinke on that which is in hand. Alſo there are many of his orders like the precepts of the Pythagorians. For as they did warne men, not to ſit vpon a little buſhell, not to cut fire with a ſword, not to looke behinde them when they goe abroade: to ſacrifice to the celeſtiall goddes in odde number, and to the goddes of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts they would not haue the commõ people to haue any knowledge or vnderſtanding. Euen ſo there are many inſtitutions of Numa, the reaſons whereof are hiddẽ and kept ſecret: as not to offer wine to the gods of the vine neuer cut, and not to ſacrifice vnto them without meale: and to turne a turne about when they do reuerence to the gods, & to ſit downe after they haue worſhipped them. And as touching the two firſt ordinances, it ſeemeth that by them he did recõmend clemency & humanity, as being a part of the deuotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make, that worſhip the gods: they ſay it preſenteth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thinketh it ſhould rather come of this: for that the temples being ſet to the eaſt, he that worſhippeth entring into the temple, ſheweth his backe to the Weſt, and for this cauſe turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth againe towards god: doing the whole turne, & ending the con-

ſummation of his prayer, by this double adoration which he maketh before & behind. Vnleſſe peraduenture that he ment ſecretly to ſignifie, & giue them to vnderſtand by this turning and chaunging of their looke, that which the EGYPTIANS figured by their wheeles: in ſhowing thereby, that theſe worldly things were neuer conſtant & in one ſtate. And therefore, that we ſhould take it thankfully, & patiently beare it, in what ſort ſo euer it pleaſed God to change or alter our life. And where he cōmanded that they ſhold ſit after they had worſhipped God: they ſaid it was a token of a good hope vnto them that praied, that their praiers ſhould be exalted, & that their goods ſhould remaine ſafe, and ſticke by them. Other ſay, that this eaſe & ſitting, is a ſeparating them from doing: and therefore he would they ſhould ſit in the temples of the gods, to ſhew they had done that which they had in hand before, to the end to take of the godds the beginning of another. And it may well be alſo, that it was referred to the thing we ſpake of a litle before. That Numa would accuſtome his people, not to ſerue the gods, nor to ſpeake to thē at all, as they paſſed by, or did any other thing, or were in haſte: but would haue thē pray vnto the godds when they had time & leaſure, & al other buſines at that time ſet a part. By this good inſtruction & training them vnto religion, the citie of ROME by litle & litle came to be ſo tractable, & had the great power of king Numa in ſuch admiratiō: that they tooke all to be as true as the goſpell that he ſpake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, then tales deuiſed of pleaſure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpoſſible to him, if he wold haue it. And for proofe hereof, there goeth a tale of him, that he hauing bidden a great company of the citizens of ROME to come and ſup with him, cauſed them to be ſerued with plaine groſſe meat, and in very poore and homely veſſell. And when they were ſet, and began to fall to their meat, he caſt out words ſodainly vnto them, how the goddeſſe with whom he accompanied, was come to ſee him euen at that inſtant, & that ſodainely the hall was richly furniſhed, & the tables couered with all ſorts of excellent fine & delicate meates. Howbeit this far paſſed all the vanity of lying, which is found writtē of him, about his ſpeaking with Iupiter. The hill Auentine was not at that time inhabited, nor incloſed within the walles of ROME, but was full of ſprings & ſhadowed groues, whither cōmonly repaired to ſolace themſelues, the two godds, Picus & Faunus, which otherwiſe might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titaniās: ſauing it is ſaid, that they went through all ITALY, doing the like miracles & wonders in phiſicke, charmes & art magike, which they report of thoſe the GRECIANS call Idæes Dactyles. There they ſay that Numa tooke them both, hauing put into the ſpring both wine & honnie, where they vſed to drinke. When they ſaw that they were taken, they transformed thēſelues into diuers formes, diſguiſing & disfiguring their naturall ſhape, into many terrible & fearefull ſights to behold. Neuertheles in the end, perceiuing they were ſo faſt, as to eſcape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, & taught him the purifying againſt lightning & thunder, which they make yet at this day with onions, haire, and pilchers. Other ſay, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Iupiter out of heauē, with their coniuring & magicke: whereat Iupiter being offended, anſwered in choller, that he ſhould make it with heads. But Numa added ſtraight, of onions: Iupiter replied, of men. Thē Numa asked him againe, to take a litle away the cruelty of the cōmaundement: What haires? Iupiter anſwered, quick haires. And Numa put to pilchers alſo. And it is reported that this was the goddeſſe Egeria, that taught Numa this ſubtiltie. This done, Iupiter returned appeaſed: by reaſon wherof the place was called Ilicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue ſignifieth appeaſed, & fauorable: & this purifying was afterwards made in that ſort. Theſe tales not only vaine, but ful of mockery alſo, do ſhow vs yet plainely the zeale & deuotion men had in thoſe times towards the godds: vnto which Numa through cuſtome had won them. And as for Numa himſelfe, they ſay that he ſo firmely put all his hope & confidence in the help of the godds: that one day when he was told his enemies were in armes againſt him, he did but laugh at it, & anſwered. And I do ſacrifice. It is he (as ſome ſay) that firſt built a temple to Faith & Terme: and which made the ROMAINES vnderſtand, that the moſt holy and greateſt oth they could make, was to ſweare by their faith, which they kepe yet at this day. But Terme, which ſignifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they doe ſacrifice, both publiquely & priuately, vpon the limits of inheritances, & now they ſacrifice vnto him liue beaſts. Howbeit in old time they did ſacrifice vnto him without any bloud,through the wiſe inſtitutiō of Numa: who declared & preached vnto them,that this God of bounds was ſincere,& vpright,without bloud or murther,as he that is a witnes of iuſtice,& a keper of peace. It was he,which in my opiniō,did firſt limit out the boūds of the territorie of ROME which Romulus would neuer doe,for feare leaſt in bounding out his owne,he ſhould confeſſe that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding & mearing, to him that wil keepe it iuſtly: is a bond that bridleth power & deſire. But to him that forceth not to keepe it:it is a proofe to ſhew his iniuſtice. To ſay truly,the territorie of ROME had no great bounds at the firſt beginning,& Romulus had got by conqueſt the greateſt part of it, and Numa did wholy deuide it vnto the needy inhabitants to relieue them,& to bring thē out of pouerty: (which carieth men hedlong into miſchiefe,& diſcourageth thē to labour)to the end that plowing vp the ſaid land,they ſhould alſo plow vp the weedes of their own barrennes,to become ciuill & gentle. For there is no exerciſe nor occupation in the world,which ſo ſodainly bringeth a man,to loue & deſire quietnes,as doth husbandry & tillage:& yet to defend a mans own, there is in it corage & hardines to fight. But greedy deſire,violently to take from others,& vniuſtly to occupy that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husband men. And therfore Numa hauing brought in husbandry amongſt his ſubiects,as a medicine and meane to make them loue quietnes: was deſirous to inure them to this trade of life,the rather to make thē humble & gentle of condition, then to increaſe them in riches. He deuided all the territorie of ROME into certaine parts which he called Pagos:as much to ſay,as villages. And in euery one of thē he ordeined controllers & viſiters,which ſhould ſuruey all about: & he himſelfe ſometimes went abroad in perſon, coniecturing by their labour thē manners & nature of euery man. Such as he found diligent,he aduanced them vnto honor, & gaue them countenance & authority: other which he ſaw ſlothfull & negligent,by rebuking & reprouing of them,he made them amend. But amongſt all his ordinances which he made,one aboue all the reſt caried the praiſe: & that was,that he deuided his people into ſundry occupations. For the citie of ROME ſeemed yet to be made of two nations, as we haue ſaid before: and to ſpeake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impoſſible to take away all factions, and to make there ſhould be no quarrels nor contentions between both parts. Wherfore he conſidered,that when one will mingle two bodies or ſimples together, which for their hardnes and contrary natures cannot well ſuffer mixture: then he breakes & beates them together,as ſmall as may be. For,ſo being brought into a ſmaller & leſſer powder,they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen ſo he thought it was beſt to deuide the people alſo into many ſmall parts: by meanes whereof they ſhould be put into many parties, which would more eaſily take away the firſt & the greateſt parr, when it ſhould be deuided and ſeparated thus into ſundry ſorts. And this diuiſion he made by arts & occupations: as minſtrels,goldſmiths,carpenters,diers,ſhoemakers,tawers,tanners,bel-founders,& pot makers,& ſo forth through other craftes and occupations. So that he brought euery one of theſe into one bodie, & company by it ſelfe: and ordeined vnto euery particular myſterie or craft, their feaſts, aſſemblies,& ſeruices, which they ſhould make vnto the goddes, according to the dignitie & worthines of euery occupation. And by this meanes,he firſt tooke away al faction: that neither ſide ſaid, nor thought any more,thoſe are SABYNES, theſe are ROMAINES, theſe are of Tatius,theſe are of Romulus. Inſomuch as this diuiſion was an incorporating, & an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinances,they did much commend his reforming of the law,that gaue libertie vnto fathers to ſell their children. For he did except childrē already maried,ſo they were maried with their fathers cōſent & goodwill:iudging it to be too cruell & ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought ſhe had maried a free man, ſhould find her ſelf to be the wife of a bondman. He began alſo to mend a litle the calender, not ſo exactly as he ſhould haue done,nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the raigne of Romulus, they vſed the moneths confuſedly,without any order or reaſon,making ſome of them 20. dayes & leſſe, and others 35. dayes and more, without knowing the difference betweene the courſe of the ſunne and the moone: and onely they obſerued this rule, that there was 360. dayes in the yeare. But Numa conſidering the inequalitie ſtood vpon 11. dayes, for that the 12. reuolutions of the moone are runne in 354. dayes, and the reuolution of the ſunne, in 365. dayes,he doubled the 11. dayes, whereof he made a moneth: which he placed from 2. yeres to 2. yeares, after the moneth of Februarie, & the ROMAINES called this moneth put betwene, Mercidinũ, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correction that Numa made, which ſince hath had a farre better amendmẽt. He did alſo change the order of the moneths. For March which before was the firſt, he made it now the third: and Ianuary the firſt, which vnder Romulus was the 11. and Februarie the 12. and laſt. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added theſe two, Ianuary & February. For the ROMAINES at the beginning had but 10. moneths in the yere: as ſome of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yere. And the ARCADIANS amongſt the GRECIANS haue but foure moneths for their yeare. The ACARNANIANS haue ſixe to the yeare. And the EGYPTIANS had firſt but one moneth to their yeare: & afterwards they made foure moneths for their yeare. And this is the cauſe why they ſeeme (albeit they inhabite in a new countrie) to be neuertheles the ancienteſt people of the world: for that in their Chronicles they reckon vp ſuch infinite number of yeares, as thoſe which count the moneths for the yeares. And to proue this true, that the ROMAINES at the beginning had but 10. moneths in the yeare, & not 12. it is eaſely to be iudged by the name of the laſt, which they call at this day Decẽber. And that the moneth of March was alſo the firſt, may be coniectured by this: for the fifth moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the 6. Sextilis, & ſo the other in order following the nũbers. For if Ianuary & February had then bene the firſt, of neceſſitie the moneth of Iuly, which they call Quintilis, muſt haue bene named September: conſidering alſo that it is verie likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was alſo by him ordained to be the firſt. The ſecond was Aprill: ſo called of the name Aphrodite, that is to ſay Venus, vnto whom they make open ſacrifice in this moneth. And on the firſt day of the ſame, women doe waſh themſelues, hauing a garland of myrtle vpon their heads. Howbeit ſome other ſay, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was only called Aprilis, becauſe thẽ is the chiefeſt force & ſtrength of the ſpring, at which ſeaſon the earth doth open, and the ſeedes of plants and hearbs begin to bud & ſhew forth, which the word it ſelfe doth ſignifie. The moneth following next after that, is called Maye: after the name of Maia, the mother of Mercurie, vnto whom the moneth is conſecrated.*The month of Iune is ſo called alſo, becauſe of the qualitie of that ſeaſon, which is as the youth of the yeare. Although ſome will ſay, that the moneth of Maye was named of this word Maiores, which ſignifieth as much as the elders: & the moneth of Iune, of Iuniores, which ſignifies the yonger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, Nouember, and December. But Quintilis, was after called Iulius, of the name of Iulius Caſar, who ſlew Pompeius. And Sextilis was named Auguſtus, Octauius Caſars ſucceſſour in the empire, who was alſo ſurnamed Auguſtus. It is true alſo that Domitian would they ſhould call the two moneths following (which are September & October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitianus. But that held not long: for ſo ſoone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recouered their auncient names againe. The two laſt moneths only, haue euer continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the leaſt tranſlated: the moneth of February doth ſignifie as much as purging, or at the leaſt the deriuation of the word ſoundeth neere it. In this moneth, they do ſacrifice of plants, * & do celebrate the feaſt of the Lupercales, in which there are many things agreable, and like to the ſacrifices made for purification. And the firſt, which is Ianuarie, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherfore me thinks that Numa tooke away the moneth of March from the firſt place, & gaue it vnto Ianuary: becauſe he would haue peace preferred before warre, and ciuill things before marſhall. For this Ianus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very ciuill & politick. For he changed the life of men, which before his time was rude, cruell, & wild: and brought it to be honeſt, gentle, & ciuill. For this cauſe they doe paint his image at this day with two faces, the one before, and the other behind, for thus chaunging the liues of men. And there is in ROME a temple dedicated vnto him, which hath two doores, that be called the doores of warre: for the cuſtome is to open them, when the ROMAINES haue any warres in any place; and to ſhut them when they be at peace. To haue them ſhut, it was a rare thing to ſee, and happened very ſeeldome: by reaſon of the greatneſſe of their empire, which of all ſides was enuironed with barbarous nations, whom they were cõpelled to keepe vnder with force of armes. Notwithſtanding it was once ſhut vp in the time of Auguſtus, after he had ſlaine Antonie: and once before alſo in the yere when Marcus Attilius & Titus Manlius were Cõſuls. But that cõtinued not long, for it was opened again incontinently, by reaſon of wars that came vpon them ſoone after. Howbeit during the raign of Numa, it was neuer one day opened, but remained ſhut continually by the ſpace of 43. yeares together. For all occaſions of wars, were then vtterly dead & forgotten: becauſe at Rome the people were not only through thexample of iuſtice, clemẽcie, & the goodnes of the King brought to be quiet, & to loue peace: but in the cities thereabouts, there began a maruellous change of maners & alteration of life, as if ſome gentle aire had breathed on them, by ſome gratious & healthfull wind, blowen from Rome to refreſh them. And thereby bred in mens minds ſuch a hearty deſire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, & to ſerue the goddes truly: that almoſt through all Italy, there was nothing but feaſts, playes, ſacrifices, and bankets. The people did traffick & frequent together, without feare or danger, and viſited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the ſpringing fountaine of Numaes wiſdome many pretie brookes & ſtreames of good & honeſt life had run ouer all Italie, and had watered it: and that the mildnes of his wiſedome had from hand to hand bene diſpearſed through the whole world. Inſomuch, as the ouer exceſſiue ſpeeches the Poets accuſtomably do vſe, were not ſufficient enough to expreſſe the peaceable raigne of that time.

For during all king Numaes raigne, it was neuer heard that euer there were any wars, ciuill diſſention, or innouation of gouernement attempted againſt him, nor yet any ſecret enmity or malice borne him, neither any cõſpiracy once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of diſpleaſing the gods (which viſibly ſeemed to take him into their protectiõ) or for the reuerent regard they had vnto his vertue, or for his proſperous & good ſucceſſe all the time he raigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he ſought to keepe men ſtill pure, & honeſt, from al wickednes, & layd moſt opẽ before the eies of the whole world, a very example of that which Plato long time after did affirme, & ſay, concerning true gouernmẽt: which was. That the only meane of true quietnes, & remedy from al euill (which euer troubleth men) was: whẽ by ſome diuine ordinance from aboue there meeteth in one perſon, the right maieſtie of a King, & the mind of a wiſe philoſopher, to make vertue gouerneſſe & ruler ouer vice. For in deede happy is ſuch a wiſe man, & more happy are they, which may heare the graue counſaile, & good leſſons of ſuch a mouth. And there me thinkes needeth no force, no compulſion, no threats, nor extremitie to bridle the people. For mẽ ſeeing the true image of vertue in their viſible prince, & in the example of his life, doe willingly grow to be wiſe, & of them ſelues do fall into loue, liking, and friendſhip together, and doe vſe all temperance, iuſt dealing, and good order one towarde another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe point of felicitie, and the moſt happie good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is beſt worthy to be a King, who through his wiſedome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners ſuch a good diſpoſition: and this, Numa aboue all other, ſeemed beſt to knowe and vnderſtand. Furthermore, touching his wiues and children, there are great contrarieties among the hiſtoriographers. For ſome of them ſay, he neuer maried other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one only daughter, and ſhe was called Pompilia. Other write to the contrarie, that he had foure ſonnes, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus: of euery one of the which (by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne) haue deſcended the nobleſt races, and moſt ancient houſes of the ROMAINES. As the houſe of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the houſe of the Pinarians, of Pinus: the houſe of the Calphurnians of Calpus: & the houſe of the Mamercians, of Mamercus. All which families by reaſon of their progenitor haue kept the ſurname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which do reproue the two firſt: ſaying that they did write to gratifie the families, making them falſely to deſcend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is ſaid, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martius, the ſonne of the ſame Martius, which perſwaded him to accept the kingdome of ROME. For he went with him to ROME, to remaine there: where they did him the honour to receiue him into the number of the Senatours. After the death of Numa, Martius the father ſtoode againſt Tullus Hoſtilius for the ſucceſſion of the Realme, and being ouercome, he killed him ſelfe for ſorrow. But his ſonne Martius, who maried Pompilia, continued ſtill at ROME, where he begot Ancus Martius, who was king of ROME after Tullus Hoſtilius, and was but fiue yeare old when Numa died. Whoſe death was not ſodaine. For he died conſuming by litle and litle, as well through age, as alſo through a lingring diſeaſe that waited on him to his end, as Piſo hath written: and Numa at his death was litle more then foure ſcore yeare old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funeralles, made his life yet more happy and glorious. For all the people his neighbours, friendes, kinſemen, and allies of the ROMAINES came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publique contributions to honour his obſequies. The noble men ſelues of the citie (which were called Patricians) caried on their ſhoulders the very bed, on which the corſe lay, to be conuaied to his graue. The Prieſtes attended alſo on his body, and ſo did all the reſt of the people, women and children in like caſe, which followed him to his tumbe, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with teares, ſighes, and mournings. Not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their deareſt kinſeman, and neareſt friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, becauſe (as ſome ſay) he commaunded the contrary by his will and teſtament: but they made two coffines of ſtone, which they buried at the foote of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they laide his body, and in the other the holy bookes which he had written himſelfe, much like vnto thoſe, which they that made the lawes among the GRECIANS did write in tables. But becauſe in his life time he had taught the prieſtes, the ſubſtaunce of the whole contained in the ſame: he willed the holy tables which he had written, ſhould be buried with his body. For he thought it not reaſonable that ſo holy matters ſhould be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens manners and exerciſes. And he followed herein they ſay, the Pythagorians, who would not put their workes in writing, but did printe the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy mẽ, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of perſon the hidden rules and ſecrets of Geometry, which had not bene worthy of them: then they ſaide the goddes by manifeſt tokens would threaten to reuenge ſuch ſacriledge and impiety, with ſome great deſtruction and miſery. Therefore, ſeeing ſo many things agreable, and altogether like betweene Numa and Pythagoras, I eaſely pardon thoſe which maintaine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acqnainted and conuerſant together. Valerius Antias the hiſtorian writeth, there were twelue bookes written concerning the office of Prieſtes, and twelue other containing the philoſophy of the GRECIANS. And that foure hundred yeares after (in the ſame yeare when Publius Cornelius, and Martius Bebius were conſuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earth, and diſcouered theſe coffines: and the liddes and couers thereof being caried away, they found the one altogether voide, hauing no manner of likelyhood, or token of a body that had layen in it: and in the other they found theſe bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Prætor) who had the charge to read them ouer, and to make the report of them. But he hauing peruſed them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not conuenient the matters contained in them ſhould be publiſhed vnto the ſimple people: and for that cauſe they were caried into the market place, and there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and iuſt men, that they are far more prayſed and eſteemed after their death, then before: becauſe that enuy doth not long continue after their death,and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithſtanding, the miſfortunes which chaunced afterwardes vnto the fiue Kings which raigned at ROME after Numa, haue made his honour ſhine, with much more noble glory then before. For the laſt of them was driuen out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very old. And of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treaſon. And Tullus Hoſtilius which raigned after Numa,deriding and contemning the moſt part of his good and holy inſtitutions, and chiefly his deuotion towardes the goddes, as a thing which made men lowly and faint hearted: did as ſoone as euer he came to be King, turne all his ſubiects hearts to the warres. But this mad humor of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a ſtraunge and moſt grieuous diſeaſe that followed him, which brought him to chaunge his mind, and did farre otherwiſe turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouer fearefull ſuperſtition, which did nothing yet reſemble the true Religion and deuotion of Numa:& beſides, he infected others with his contagious errour,through the inconuenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was ſtriken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF Lycurgus with Numa.

The vertues of Numa and Lycurgus were alike,but their deedes diuerſe.

THVS hauing written the liues of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth,though it be ſomewhat hard to doe, that we comparing the one with the other, ſhould ſet out the difference betweene them. For in thoſe things wherein they were like of condition, their deedes do ſhew it ſufficiently. As in their temperaunce, their deuotion to the goddes, their wiſedome in gouerning,and their diſcrete handling of their people, by making them beleeue that the goddes had reuealed the lawes vnto them,which they eſtabliſhed. And now to come vnto their qualities,which are diuerſely,& ſeuerally commended in either of them. Their firſt quality is,that Numa accepted the Kingdome,and Lycurgus gaue it vp. The one receiued it,not ſeeking for it: and the other hauing it in his handes did reſtore it againe. The one being a ſtraunger and a priuat man: was by ſtrangers elected and choſen, their Lord and King. The other being in poſſeſſion a King,made him ſelfe againe a priuat perſon. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iuſtice: but it is a goodlier thing to eſteeme iuſtice aboue a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in ſuch reputatiō,that he was iudged worthy to be choſen a King: and vertue bred ſo noble a mind in the other, that he eſteemed not to be a King. Their ſecond quality is,that like as in an inſtrumēt of muſicke, the one of them did tune and wreſt vp the ſlacke ſtrings which were in SPARTA: ſo the other ſlackened, and ſet them lower, which were too high mounted in ROME. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater For he did not perſwade his citizens, to plucke of their armour and curates, nor to lay by their ſwords: but only to leaue their gold & ſiluer, to forſake their ſoft beds, their fine wrought tables, and other curious rich furniture, and not to leaue off the trauell of wars, to giue them ſelues only vnto feaſtes, ſacrifices, and plaies. But to the contrary, to giue vp banquetting and feaſting, and continually to take paines in the wars, yeelding their bodies to al kinde of pains. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, eaſily perſwaded all that he would: and the other, by putting him ſelfe in daunger, and being hurt alſo, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpoſe and deſire. Numa his muſe was ſo gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now ſo tractable and ciuill, that he taught them to loue peace and iuſtice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongeſt the lawes and ordinaunces of Lycurgus, that which we haue written touching the ILOTES, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I muſt of force confeſſe that Numa was much wiſer, more gentle, and ciuill in his lawes, conſidering that euen vnto thoſe which in deede were borne ſlaues, he gaue ſome litle taſt of honor, and ſweetnes of liberty, hauing ordained, that in the feaſts of Saturne, they ſhould ſit down at meat at their maſters own table. Some hold opinion, that this cuſtome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that thoſe, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, ſhould haue ſome pleaſure thereof to make good cheere with the firſt fruites of the ſame. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembraunce of the equality which was amongeſt men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither maſter nor ſeruant, but all men were a like equall, as brethren or kinſmen. To conclude, it ſeemeth either of them tooke a direct courſe, thought beſt to them ſelues, to frame their people vnto temperaunce, and to be contented with their own. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre beſt, and the other iuſtice: vnleſſe it were that men would ſay, that for the diuerſity of the nature or cuſtome of their people (which were almoſt contrary in manners) they were both compelled to vſe alſo contrary and diuers meanes from other. For it was not of a faint heart, that Numa tooke from his people the vſe of armes, and deſire to be in warres: but it was to the end they ſhould not doe any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus alſo ſtudy to make his people ſouldiers and warlike, to hurt others: but for feare rather that others ſhould hurt them. And ſo, to cut off the exceſſe in the one, and to ſupply the defect of the other: they were both enforced to bring in a ſtraunge manner of gouernment. Furthermore, touching their ſeuerall kind of gouernment, and diuiding of their people into ſtates and companies: that of Numa was maruellous meane and baſe, and framed to the liking of the meaneſt people, making a body of a city, and a people compounded together of all ſortes, as goldeſmiths, minſtrels, founders, ſhoemakers, and of all ſortes of craftes men and occupations together. But that of Lycurgus, was directly contrary: for his was more ſeuere and tyrannicall, in gouerning of the nobility, caſting all craftes and baſe occupations vpon bondmen and ſtraungers, and putting into the handes of his citizens the ſhield and launce, ſuffering them to exerciſe no other art or ſcience, but the art and diſcipline of warres, as the true miniſters of Mars: which all their life time neuer knew other ſcience, but only learned to obey their captaines, and to commaund their enemies. For to haue any occupation, to buy and ſell, or to trafficke, free men were expreſſely forbidden: becauſe they ſhould wholly & abſolutely be free. And all ſciences to get money was lawfull for ſlaues, and the ILOTES: being counted for as vile an occupation, as to dreſſe meate, and to be a ſcullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amongſt his people, but only tooke away couetous deſire to be rich by warres: but otherwiſe, he did not forbid them to get goods by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regard to bring all to equality, and to be a like wealthy, but ſuffered euery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuent pouerty, which crept in, and ſpred far in his city. Which he ſhould haue looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequality amongeſt them, and that his citizens for ſubſtaunce were in manner equall one with another: for then was the time whē he ſhould haue made head againſt auarice, to haue ſtopped the miſchieues & inconueniences, which fell out afterwards, & they were not litle. For that only was the fountaine and roote, of the moſt part of the greateſt euils and miſchieues, which happened afterwards in ROME. And as touching the diuiſion of goodes: neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality to the one, was a groũd and foundation of his common wealth, which he afterwards inſtituted: and vnto other, it could not be. For this diuiſion being made not long before the time of his predeceſſour, there was no great need to change the firſt, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching mariages, and their children to be in common, both the one and the other wiſely ſought to take away all occaſion of iealouſie: but yet they tooke not both one courſe. For the ROMAINE husband, hauing children enough to his contentation: if another that lacked children came vnto him, to pray him to lend him his wife, he might graunt her vnto him, and it was in him to giue her altogether, or to lend her for a time, and to take her afterwardes againe. But the LACONIAN keping his wife in his houſe, and the mariage remaining whole and vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to haue childrẽ by her: nay furthermore, many (as we haue told you before) did them ſelues intreat men, by whom they thought to haue a trimme broode of children, and layed them with their wiues. What difference, I pray you was betweene theſe two cuſtomes? ſauing that the cuſtome of the LACONIANS ſhewed, that the husbands were nothing angry, nor grieued with their wiues for thoſe things, which for ſorrow and iealouſie doth rent the hearts of moſt maried men in the world. And that of the ROMAINS was a ſimplicity ſomewhat more ſhamefaſt, which to couer it, was ſhadowed yet with the cloke of matrimony, and contract of mariage: confeſſing that to vſe wife and children by halfes together, was a thing moſt intollerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of maidens to be maried by Numaes order, was much ſtraighter & more honorable for womãhood: and Lycurgus order hauing too much ſcope & liberty, gaue Poets occaſion to ſpeake, and to giue them ſurnames not very honeſt. As Ibycus called them Phænomeridas: to ſay, thigh ſhewers: and Andromanes: to ſay manhood. And Euripides ſaith alſo of them.

and ſought for young mens company, and tooke their ware in charge:
And ſhewed their thighes all bare, the taylour did them wrong, on ech ſide open were their cotes, the ſlits were all too long.

And in deede to ſay truely, the ſides of their peticotes were not ſowed beneath: ſo that as they went, they ſhewed their thighes naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth eaſely declare by theſe verſes:

The ſong which you ſhall ſing, ſhall be the ſonnet ſaide,
by Hermony luſty laſſe, that ſtrong and ſturdy maide: VVhich truſt her petticote, about her middle ſhort,
and ſet to ſhew her naked hippes, in francke and friendly ſort.

And therefore it is ſaid, the LACON wiues were bold, manly, and ſtout againſt their husbands, namely the firſt. For they were wholly miſtreſſes in the houſe, and abroad: yea they had law on their ſide alſo, to vtter their minds franckly concerning the chiefeſt maters. But Numa euer reſerued the honor and dignity vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken them away perforce, diſpoſed them ſelues to vſe them as gently as poſſibly they could: neuertheleſſe, he added otherwiſe thereto, great honeſty, and tooke away all curioſity from them, and taught them ſobriety, and did inure them to ſpeake litle. For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibite them to ſpeak, although it were for things neceſſary, vnles it were in the preſence of their husbands. In ſo much as it is reported, that a woman chauncing one day to plead her cauſe in perſon, openly before the iudges: the Senate hearing of it, did ſend immediatly vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognoſticate to the city. And therefore Numa thought the memory of the naughty women, would much commend the great humility, gentlenes, & obedience of the good. For like as our GRECIAN hiſtoriographers do note thoſe which were the firſt that killed any of their citizens, or haue fought with their brethrẽ, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen ſo the ROMAINS doe note that Spurius Caruilius was the firſt that forſooke his wife, two hundred and thirtie yeares after the firſt foundation of ROME, which was neuer done by any before.

fore. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalæa, was the firſt which euer brauled or quarrelled with her mother in law called Gegania, in the time when Tarquine ſurnamed the proud raigned: ſo well and honeſtly were the orders of Numa deuiſed concerning mariage. Moreouer, the age and time of marying of maydes, which both the one and the other ordeined: doth agree with the reſt of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they ſhould be maried, till they were of good yeres, and women growen: to the end that they knowing the company of man at ſuch time as nature requireth, it ſhould be a beginning of their pleaſure and loue, and not of griefe and hate, when ſhe ſhould be compelled vnto it before time agreeable by nature, and becauſe their bodies alſo ſhould be more ſtrong and able to beare children, and to indure the mothers painefull throwes and trauell in child bearing, conſidering they are maried to no other ende, but to beare children. But the ROMAINES to the contrary, doe marie them at twelue yeres of age and vnder: ſaying, that by this meanes their bodies and manners be wholy theirs, which doe marie them, being aſſured that no body els could touch them. By this reaſon it is manifeſt, that the one is more naturall, to make them ſtrong to beare children: & the other more morall, to giue them the forme and maner of conditions, which a man would haue thẽ to keepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for education of children, that they ſhould be brought vp, inſtructed, and taught, vnder the ſelfe ſame maſters & gouernors, which ſhould haue an eye to make them drinke, eate, play, & exerciſe themſelues honeſtly, and orderly together: Numa made no more prouiſion for the ſame, then the leaſt maker of lawes that euer was, and nothing in compariſon of Lycurgus. For Numa left the parents at libertie, to vſe their diſcretion (according vnto their couetouſneſſe or neceſſitie) to cauſe their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they would put them to be labourers, carpenters, founders, or minſtrels. As if they ſhould not frame the manners of children, and faſhion them from their cradell all to one end: but ſhould be as it were like paſſengers in one ſhip, which being there, ſome for one buſineſſe, other for another purpoſe, but all to diuerſe ends, do neuer medle one with another, but in a rough ſtorme or tempeſt, when euery man is affraide of his owne life. For otherwiſe, no man careth but for himſelfe. And other makers of lawes alſo, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath ſcaped them through ignorance, or ſome time through lacke of ſufficient power and authoritie. But a wiſe philoſopher, hauing receiued a realme of people newly gathered together, which did contrary him in nothing: whereto ſhould he moſt plie his ſtudie and indeuour, but to cauſe children to be well brought vp, and to make young men exerciſe themſelues, to the end they ſhould not differ in manners, nor that they ſhould be troubleſome, by their diuerſe manner of bringing vp, but that they ſhould all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one ſelfe trade, and faſhioned vnder one ſelfe patterne of vertue? That good education, beſides other commodities, did alſo ſerue to preſerue Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their othe which they had made, had bene of ſmall effect, if he had not through inſtitution, and education (as it were) died in wolle the manners of children, and had not made them from their nurſes breaſts in manner, ſucke the Iuice and loue of his lawes, and ciuill ordinaunces. And this was of ſuch force, that for the ſpace of fiue hundred years and more, Lycurgus chiefe lawes and ordinaunces remained in full perfection, as a deepe woded die, which went to the bottome, and pearced into the tender wolle. Contrariwiſe, that which was Numaes chiefe end and purpoſe, to continue ROME in peace and amity, died by and by with him. For he was no ſooner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he ſo carefully had kept ſhut all his raigne, as if in deede he had kept in warres there, vnder locke and key, and they filled all ITALIE with murther and bloud: and this his godly, holy, and iuſt gouernment which his Realme enioyed all his time, did not laſt long after, becauſe it had not the bond of education, and the diſcipline of children which ſhould maintaine it. Why, may a man ſay to me here: hath not ROME excelled ſtill, and preuailed more and more in cheualry? This queſtion requireth a long aunſwer, and ſpecially vnto ſuch men as place felicity in riches, in poſſeſſions, and in the greatnes of empire, rather then in the quiet ſafety, peace, and concord of a common weale: and in clemency and iuſtice, ioyned with contentation. Neuertheles, how ſoeuer it was, that maketh for Lycurgus alſo, that the ROMAINES after they had chaunged the ſtate which they had of Numa, did ſo maruellouſly increaſe and grow mightie: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS to the contrary, ſo ſoone as they beganne to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authoritie & ſway, fell afterwardes to be of ſmall account. So that hauing loſt the ſoueraigntie & commaundement ouer GRECE, they ſtood in great hazard alſo to be ouerthrowen for euer. But in troth it was ſome diuine thing in Numa, that he being a meere ſtranger, the ROMAINES did ſeeke him, to make him King, and that he could ſo chaunge all, and rule a whole citie as he liſted (not yet ioyned together) without neede of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be aſſiſted with the beſt of the citie, in reſiſting the commōs of LACEDÆMON, but he could neuer otherwiſe haue kept them in peace, and made them loue together, but by his only wiſedome and iuſtice.

Great friendſhip betwixt Solon and Piſiſtratus.

DIDYMVS the Grammarian, in a litle booke that he wrote, & dedicated vnto Aſclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, alleageth the wordes of one Philocles, in which he ſpeaketh againſt the common opinion of thoſe that haue written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the ſonne of Execeſtides, a man but reaſonably to liue, although otherwiſe he was of the nobleſt and moſt auncient houſe of the city of ATHENS. For of his fathers ſide, he was deſcended of king Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, ſhe was coſin germaine vnto Piſiſtratus mother. For this cauſe euen from the beginning there was great friendſhip betweene them, partly for their kindred, and partly alſo for the curteſie, and beauty of Piſiſtratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of ſtate and gouernment: yet this ſquare bred no violent inconuenience betweene them, but they reſerued in their hearts ſtill their auncient amity, which continued the memory of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no ſtaied man to withſtand beauty, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifeſt to all, aſwell by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by a law of his owne: wherein he did forbid bondmen to perfume themſelues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this lawe among honeſt matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better ſort, and forbidding it to the baſeſt. They ſay alſo that Piſiſtratus ſelfe was in loue with Charmus, and that he did ſet vp the litle image of loue, which is in Academia, where they were wont to light the holy candle. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) hauing ſpent his goods in liberalitie, and deedes of courteſie, though he might eaſily haue ben relieued at diuers mens hands with money, he was yet aſhamed to take any, becauſe he came of a houſe which was wont rather to giue & relieue others, then to take themſelues: ſo being yet a young man, he deuiſed to trade marchandiſe. Howbeit other ſay, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to ſee the world, and to learne: then to trafficke, or gaine. For ſure he was very deſirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifeſtly: for that being now old, he commonly vſed to ſay this verſe:

I grow old, learning ſtill.

Alſo he was not couetouſly bent, nor loued riches too much: for he ſaid in one place:

VVho ſo hath goods, and gold enough at call,
great heards of beaſtes, and flockes in many a folde,
both horſe and mule, yea ſtore of corne and all,

And in another place alſo he ſaieth:

In deed I do deſire, ſome wealth to haue at will:
but not vnleſſe the ſame be got, by faithfull dealing ſtill.
For ſure who ſo deſires by wickedneſſe to thriue:
ſhall finde that iuſtice from ſuch goods, will iuſtly him depriue.

There is no law forbiddeth an honeſt man, or gentleman, greedily to ſcrape goods together, and more then may ſuffice: & likewiſe to get ſufficient to maintaine one withall, and to defray all needfull charges. In thoſe dayes no ſtate was diſcommended, as ſaith Heſiodus, nor any arte or ſcience made any difference betweene men: but marchandiſe they thought an honorable ſtate, as that which deliuered meanes, to trafficke into ſtrange and far countries, to get acquaintance with ſtates, to procure the loue of princes, & chiefly to gather the experiēce of the world. So that there haue bene marchants, which heretofore haue bene founders of great cities: as he which firſt built MASSILIA, after he had obtained the friendſhip of the GAVLES, dwelling by the riuer of Rhoſne. And they ſay alſo, that Thales Mileſius the wiſe, did trafficke marchandiſe, and that Hippocrates the mathematike did euen ſo: & likewiſe that Plato trauelling into Egypt, did beare the whole charges of his iourney, with the gaines he made of the ſale of oile he caried thither. They remēber alſo that Solon learned to be lauiſh in expence, to fare delicatly, & to ſpeake wantonly of pleaſures in his Poems, ſomewhat more licentiouſly then became the grauity of a Philoſopher: only becauſe he was brought vp in the trade of marchandiſe, wherin for that men are maruellous ſubiect to great loſſes and daungers, they ſeeke otherwhiles good chere to driue theſe cares away, and liberty to make much of themſelues. Yet it appeareth by theſe verſes, that Solon accoumpted himſelfe rather in the nūber of the poore, then of the rich.

This Poetrie at the beginning he vſed but for pleaſure, and when he had leaſure, writing no matter of importance in his verſes. Afterwards he did ſet out many graue matters of philoſophie, and the moſt part of ſuch things as he had deuiſed before, in the gouernment of a cōmon weale, which he did not for hiſtorie or memories ſake, but onely of a pleaſure to diſcourſe: for he ſheweth the reaſons of that he did, and in ſome places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And ſome affirme alſo he went about to write his lawes and ordinances in verſe, and doe recite his preface, which was this:

Vouchſafe ô mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth high King:
to graunt good fortune to my lawes, and heaſts in euery thing.
And that their glorie growe, in ſuch triumphant wiſe,
as may remaine in fame for aye, which liues and neuer dies.

Solon delighted in morall, but not in naturall philoſophie.

He chiefely delighted in morall philoſophie, which treated of gouernement and common weales: as the moſt part of the wiſe men did of thoſe times. But for naturall philoſophie, he was very groſſe and ſimple, as appeareth by theſe verſes.

The clattering hayle, and ſoftly falling ſnowe
doe breede in aire, and fall from cloudes on hie.
The dreadfull clappes, which thunderbolts doe throwe,
do come from heauen, and lightnings bright in skie.
The ſea it ſelfe by boiſterous blaſts dooth rore which (were it not prouoked ſo full ſore)
VVould be both calme and quiet for to paſſe, as any element that euer was.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the ſeuen wiſe men of GRECE, who ſearched further the contemplation of things in common vſe among men, than he. For ſetting him a parte, all the others got the name of wiſdome, onely for their vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernment. It is reported that they met on a day all ſeauen together in the citie of DELPHES, and another time in the citie of CORINTH, where Periander got them together at a feaſt that he made to the other ſixe. But that which moſt increaſed their glorie, and made their fame moſt ſpoken of, was the ſending backe againe of the three footed ſtoole when they all had refuſed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, how certaine fiſher men of the Ile of CO, caſt their nettes into the ſea, and certaine ſtrangers paſsing by, that came from the citie of MILETVM, did buie their draught of fiſhe at aduenture, before the net was drawne. And when they driue it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed ſtoole of maſſy gold, which men ſay, Hellen (as ſhe did returne from TROYE) had throwne in in that place, in memory of an auncient oracle ſhe called then vnto her minde. Thereupon the ſtrangers and fiſher men firſt fell at ſtrife about this three footed ſtoole, who ſhould haue it: but afterwardes the two cities tooke part of both ſides, on their citizens behalfe. In ſo much as warres had like to haue followed betweene them, had not the propheteſſe Pythia giuen a like oracle vnto them both. That they ſhould giue this three footed ſtoole vnto the wiſeſt man. VVhereupon the men of CO, ſent it firſt to Thales in the city of MILETVM, as being willing to graunt that vnto a priuate perſon, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales ſaide, he thought Bias a wiſer man then him ſelfe: and ſo it was ſent vnto him. He likewiſe ſent it again vnto another, as to a wiſer man. And that other, ſent it alſo vnto another. So that being thus poſted from man to man, and through diuerſe handes, in the end it was brought backe againe vnto the city of MILETVM, and deliuered into the handes of Thales the ſecond time: and laſt of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Iſmenian. Howbeit Theophraſtus, writeth, that firſt it was ſent to the city of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the city of MILETVM, by Bias conſent. And after that it had paſſed through all their hands, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and laſtly it was ſent to the city of DELPHES. And thus much haue the beſt and moſt auncient writers written: ſauing that ſome ſay in ſteade of a three footed ſtoole, it was a cuppe that king Crœſus ſent vnto the city of DELPHES. Other ſay, it was a peece of plate which Bathycles left there. They made mention alſo of another priuate meeting betwixt Anacharſis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharſis being arriued at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, ſaying that he was a ſtraunger which came of purpoſe to ſee him, and to deſire his acquaintance and friendſhip. Solon aunſwered him, that it was better to ſeeke friendſhip in his owne countrie. Anacharſis replyed againe: thou then that art at home, and in thine owne countrie, beginne to ſhew me friendſhip. Then Solon wondering at his bolde readie wit, entertained him verie courteouſly: and kept him a certain time in his houſe, and made him very good cheere, at the ſelfe ſame time wherein he was moſt buſie in gouerning the common weale, & making lawes for the ſtate thereof. Which when Anacharſis vnderſtoode, he laughed at it, to ſee that Solon imagined with written lawes, to bridle mens couetouſnes and iniuſtice. For ſuch lawes, ſayde he, doe rightly reſemble the ſpyders cobwebbes: becauſe they take holde of little flies and gnattes which fall into them, but the rich and mightie will breake and runne through them at their will. Solon anſwered him, that men do iuſtly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, becauſe it is to the hinderance of either partie to breake them: & euen ſo, he did ſo temper his lawes, that he made his citizens knowe, it was more for their profite to obey law and iuſtice, then to breake it. Neuertheleſſe afterwards, matters proued rather according to Anacharſis compariſon, then agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceiued. Anacharſis being by happe one daye in a common aſſembly of the people at ATHENS, ſaide that he maruelled much, why in the conſultations and meetings of the GRECIANS, wiſe men propounded matters, and fooles did decide them. It is ſaid moreouer, that Solon was ſometime in the citie of MILETVM at Thales houſe, where he ſaide that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marrie to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a word at that preſent: but within fewe dayes after he ſuborned a ſtraunger, which ſaid that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but ten dayes before. Solon asked him immediately, What newes there? This ſtranger whom Thales had ſchooled before, anſwered: none other there, ſauing that they carried a young man to buriall, whom all the citie followed: for that he was one of the greateſt mens ſonnes of the citie, and the honeſteſt man withall, who at that preſent was out of the countrie, and had bene a long time (as they ſaide) abroade. O poore vnfortunate father, then ſaid Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard him named, ſaid the ſtranger, but I haue forgotten him nowe: ſauing that they all ſaide, he was a worthy wiſe man. So Solon ſtill trembling more and more for feare, at euery anſwer of this ſtranger: in the ende he could holde no longer, being full of trouble, but tolde his name himſelfe vnto the ſtranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the ſonne of Solon which was buried. The very ſame, ſaid the ſtranger. Solon with that, like a mad man ſtraight began to beate his head, and to ſay, and doe, like men impatient in affliction, and ouercome with ſorrow. But Thales laughing to ſee this pageant, ſtaid him, and ſaid. Loe, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children: which is of ſuch a violence, that thou ſeeſt it hath now ouercome thee, although otherwiſe thou art ſtrong, aud able to wreſtle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath ſaid vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it is but a tale, and nothing ſo. Hermippus writeth, that Patæcus (he which ſayd he had Eſops ſoule) reciteth this ſtory thus. Neuertheleſſe it lacketh iudgement, and the courage of a man alſo, to be afraid to get things neceſſary, fearing the loſſe of them: for by this reckonning, he ſhould neither eſteeme honour, goodes, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to loſe them. For we ſee that vertue it ſelfe, which is the greateſt and ſweeteſt riches a man can haue, decayeth oft times through ſickenes, or els by phiſicke, and potions. Furthermore Thales ſelfe, although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, vnleſſe he would confeſſe that he neither loued friends, kinſmen, nor countrey: howbeit Thales had an adopted ſonne, called Cybiſtus, which was his ſiſters ſonne. For our ſoule hauing in it a naturall inclination to loue, and being borne as well to loue, as to feele, to reaſon, or vnderſtand, and to remember: hauing nothing of her owne whereupon ſhe might beſtow that naturall loue, borroweth of other. As where there is a houſe or inheritaunce without lawfull heires, many times ſtraungers, and baſe borne children, doe creepe into the kinde affection of the owner, and when they

haue once wonne and poſſeſſed his loue, they make him euer after to be kinde and tender ouer them. So that ye ſhall ſee many times men of ſuch a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marie, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwardes are readie to die for feare and ſorow, when they ſee their baſtardes (that they haue gotten of their ſlaues or concubines) fall ſicke or die, and doe vtter wordes farre vnmeete for men of noble courage. And ſome ſuch there be, that for the death of a dogge, or their horſe, are ſo out of heart, and take ſuch thought, that they are readie to goe into the ground, they looke ſo pittifully. Other ſome are cleane contrarie, who though they haue loſt their children, forgone their friendes, or ſome gentleman deare vnto them, yet no ſorowfull worde hath commen from them, neither haue they done any vnſeemely thing: but haue paſſed the reſt of their life like wiſe, conſtant, and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weakeneſſe, which breedeth theſe extreme ſorowes, and exceeding feare, in men that are not exerciſed, nor acquainted to fight againſt fortune with reaſon. And this is the cauſe that plucketh from them the pleaſure of that they loue and deſire, by reaſon of the continuall trouble, feare and griefe they feele, by thinking how in time they may be depriued of it. Nowe we muſt not arme our ſelues with pouertie, againſt the griefe of loſſe of goods: neither with lacke of affection, againſt the loſſe of our friendes: neither with want of mariage, againſt the death of children: but we muſt be armed with reaſon againſt misfortunes. Thus haue we ſufficiently enlarged this matter. The Athenians hauing now ſuſteined a long and troubleſome warre againſt the Megarians, for the poſſeſſion of the Ile of Salamina: were in the ende wearie of it, and made proclamation ſtraightly commaunding vpon paine of death, that no man ſhould preſume to preferre any more to the counſaile of the citie, the title or queſtion of the poſſeſſion of the Ile of Salamina. Solon could not beare this open ſhame, and ſeeing the moſt part of the luſtieſt youthes deſirous ſtill of warre though their tongues were tyed for feare of the proclamation: he fained himſelfe to be out of his wits, and cauſed it to be giuen out that Solon was become a foole, & ſecretly he had made certain lamentable verſes, which he had cunned without booke, to ſing abroad the citie. So one day he ranne ſodainely out of his houſe with a garland on his head, and got him to the market place, where the people ſtraight ſwarmed like Bees about him: and getting him vp vpon the ſtone where all proclamations are vſually made, out he ſingeth theſe Elegies he had made, which began after this ſort.

I here preſent my ſelfe (an Herauld) in this caſe, which come from Salamina land, that noble worthy place.
My mind in pelting proſe, ſhall neuer be expreſt,
But ſong in verſe Heroicall, for ſo I thinke it beſt.

This Elegie is intituled Salamina, & conteineth a hundred verſes, which are excellently well written. And theſe being ſung openly by Solon at that time, his friendes incontinently prayſed them beyond meaſure, and ſpecially Piſiſtratus: and they went about perſwading the people that were preſent, to credit that he ſpake. Hereupon the matter was ſo handled amongſt them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they beganne to follow the warres with greater fury then before, appointing Solon to be generall in the ſame. But the common tale and report is, that he went by ſea with Pyſiſtratus vnto the temple of Venus, ſurnamed Coliade: where he found all the women at a ſolemne feaſt and ſacrifice, which they made of cuſtome to the goddeſſe. He taking occaſion thereby, ſent from thence a truſty man of his owne vnto the Megarians, which then had Salamina: whom he inſtructed to faine himſelfe a reuolted traytour, and that he came of purpoſe to tell them, that if they would but goe with him, they might take all the chiefe ladies and gentlewomen of Athens on a ſodaine. The Megarians eaſely beleeued him, and ſhipped forthwith certaine ſouldiers to goe with him. But when Solon perceyued the ſhippe vnder ſaile comming from Salamina, he commaunded the women to depart, and in ſtead of them he put luſty beardleſſe ſpringalles into their apparell, and gaue them litle ſhort daggers to conuay vnder their clothes, commaunding them to play and daunce together vpon the ſea ſide, vntill their enemies were landed, and their ſhippe at anker; and ſo it came to paſſe. For the Megarians being deceyued by that they ſaw a farre off, as ſoone as euer they came to the ſhore ſide, did land in heapes, one in anothers necke, euen for greedines, to take theſe women: but not a man of them eſcaped, for they were ſlaine euery mothers ſonne. This ſtrategeme being finely handled, and to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke ſea ſtraight, and coaſted ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the ſodaine, and wanne it without much reſiſtance. Other ſay that it was not taken after this ſort: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon firſt ſuch an oracle.

Thou ſhalt firſt winne by vowes and ſacrifice,
the helpe of lordes and demygods full bright:
of whoſe dead bones, the duſt engraued lies,
in weſterne ſoyle, Aſopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night paſſed ouer to SALAMINA, & did ſacrifice to Periphemus, and to Cichris, demy gods of the country. Which done, the ATHENIANS deliuered him fiue hundreth men, who willingly offered themſelues: and the citie made an accord with them: that if they tooke the Ile of SALAMINA, they ſhould beare greateſt authoritie in the common weale. Solon imbarked his ſoldiers into diuers fiſher boates, and appointed a galliot of thirtie owers to come after him, & he ankered hard by the citie of SALAMINA, vnder the poynt which looketh towards the Ile of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, hauing by chaunce hard ſome inckling of it, but yet knew nothing of certaintie: ranne preſently in hurly burly to arme them, and manned out a ſhippe to deſcry what it was. But they fondly comming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS vnder hatches faſt bound, and in their roomes put aborde in their ſhippe the choyſeſt ſouldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commaunding them to ſet their courſe direct vpon the citie, and to keepe themſelues as cloſe out of ſight as could be. And he himſelf with al the reſt of his ſouldiers landed preſently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the field. Now whileſt they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had ſent in the MEGARIANS ſhippe, entred the hauen and wan the towne. This is certainly true, & teſtified by that which is ſhewed yet at this day. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a ſhippe of ATHENS arriueth quietly at the firſt, & by & by thoſe that are in the ſhippe make a great ſhowte, and a man armed leaping out of the ſhippe, runneth ſhowting towards the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme land: and hard by the ſame is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whẽce he ſent back againe thoſe priſoners that he had taken (which were ſaued from the ſlaughter of the battell) without any ranſome paying. Neuertheles, the MEGARIANS were ſharply bent ſtill, to recouer SALAMINA againe. Much hurt being done and ſuffered on both ſides: both partes in the end made the LACEDÆMONIANS iudges of the quarrell. But vpon iudgment giuen, common report is, that Homers authoritie did Solon good ſeruice, becauſe he did adde theſe verſes to the number of ſhippes, which are in the Iliades of Homer, which he rehearſed before the iudges, as if they had bene indeede written by Homer.

twelue ſhippes from Salamina ſoyle, which he had left at large,

and place in order for to fight, with enemies force at laſt.
In that ſame very place, whereas it ſeemed then,
the captaines which from Athens came, imbatteld had their men.

Howbeit the ATHENIANS ſelues thinke, it was but a tale of pleaſure: and ſay that Solon made it appeare to the iudges, that Philæus, and Euryſaces (both Aiax ſonnes) were made free denizẽs of ATHENS Whereupon they gaue the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of ATTICA: & the other in a towne called MELITUM. And for due proofe thereof, they ſay there is yet a certen canton or quarter of the country of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philæides, after the name of this Philæus, where Piſiſtratus was borne. And it is ſayed moreouer, that Solon (becauſe he would throughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did alleage that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in MEGARA they burie the dead with their faces to the Eaſt: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the Weſt. Yet Hereas the Megarian denieth it ſaying that the MEGARIANS did burie them

alſo with their faces towards the Weſt: alleadging moreouer, that at ATHENS euery corſe had his owne beere or coffin by it ſelfe, & that at MEGARA they did put three or foure corſes together. They ſay alſo there were certeine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly helpe Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their ſtrife was iudged by fiue Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to ſay, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypſechidas, Anaxilas, & Cleomenes: Solon vndoutedly wonne great glory & honour by this exployte, yet was he much more honoured & eſteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the temple of Apollo, in the citie of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be ſuffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS ſhould at their pleaſure abuſe the ſanctuarie of the oracle, & that they ſhould ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the counſell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his words and perſuaſions, proclaymed warres againſt the CYRRHÆIANS: as diuers others do witneſſe, and eſpecially Ariſtotle, in the ſtorie he wrote of thoſe that wanne the Pythian games, where he aſcribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neuertheleſſe Hermippus ſayeth, Solon was not made generall of their armie, as Enanthes Samian hath written. For AEſchines the Orator wrote no ſuch thing of him: & in the chronicles of the DELPHIANS they find, that one Alcmæon, & not Solon, was the generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the citie of ATHENS had a long time beene vexed and troubled through Cylons haynous offence, euer ſince the yere that Megacles (gouernour of the citie of ATHENS) did with fayre words handle ſo the confederats of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken ſanctuarie within the liberties of the temple of Minerua: that he perſuaded them to be wiſe, and to preſent themſelues before the iudges, holdinge by a threed, which they ſhould tye about the baſe of the image of the goddeſſe where ſhee ſtoode, becauſe they ſhould not loſe their libertie. But when they were come to the place of the honorable goddeſſes ſo called (which be the images of the furies) comming downe to preſent themſelues before the iudges, the threed brake of it ſelfe. Then Megacles, and other officers his companions, layed hold on them preſently, ſaying that it was a manifeſt ſigne that the goddeſſe Minerua refuſed to ſaue thẽ. So thoſe they tooke, and all they could lay hands on, were immediately ſtoned to death without the citie: the reſt which tooke the altars for refuge, were ſlaine there alſo. And none were ſaued, but ſuch as had made meanes to the gouernours wiues of the cittie, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, and commonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the iſſues of the rebelles that roſe with Cylon, chanced to riſe againe in credit, & growing to great authoritie, they neuer left quarelling & fighting continually with the offspring of Megacles. Theſe factiõs were greateſt & higheſt in Solons time: who being of authoritie, & ſeeing the people thus diuided in two partes, he ſtepped in betweene them, with the chiefeſt men of ATHENS, & did ſo perſuade, & intreate thoſe whom they called the abiects & excõmunicates, that they were contented to be iudged. So three hundreth of the chiefeſt citizens were choſen iudges to heare this matter. The accuſer was Myron Phlyeian. This matter was heard and pleaded, & by ſentence of the iudges, the excommunicats were condemned. Thoſe that were aliue, to perpetuall exile: & the bones of them that were dead, to be digged vp, & throwẽ out of the confines of the territorie of ATHENS. But whileſt the cittie of ATHENS was occupied with theſe vprores, the MEGARIANS wiſely caught holde of the occaſion deliuered, and ſet vpon the ATHENIANS, tooke frõ them the hauen of NISÆA & recouered againe out of their handes the Ile of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the cittie was poſſeſſed with a certaine ſuperſtitious feare: for ſome ſayed, that ſprites were come againe, and ſtraunge ſightes were ſeene. The prognoſticators alſo ſayed, they perceiued by their ſacrifices the cittie was defiled with ſome abhominable & wicked things, which were of neceſſitie to be purged and throwen out. Hereupon, they ſent into CRETA for Epimenides Phæſtian, whom they reckoned the ſeuenth of the wiſe men, at the leaſt ſuch as will not alowe Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuoute man, and very wiſe in celeſtiall thinges, by inſpiration from aboue: by reaſõ whereof, men of his time called him the new Curetes, that is to ſay, Prophet: and he was thought the ſonne of a Nimphe called Balté. When he was come to ATHENS, and growen in friendſhippe with Solon: he did helpe him much, and made his waye for eſtabliſhing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their ſacrifices much lighter, and of leſſe coſt: and brought the citizẽs to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting off certaine ſeuere and barbarous ceremonies, which the moſt parte of women obſerued in their mourning, and he ordeined certen ſacrifices which he would haue done immediatly after the obſequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the reſt was, that by vſing the citizens vnto holines & deuotion, daily ſacrifices, prayers vnto the godds, purging of themſelues, & humble offerings: he wan mens hartes by litle & litle, to yeeld them more cõfirmable to Iuſtice, and to be more inclined to cõcord & vnitie. It is reported alſo that Epimenides whẽ he ſaw the hauen of Munychia, & had long conſidered of it: told thoſe about him, that men were very blind in foreſeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS, (ſayd he) knew what hurt this hauẽ would bring thẽ: they would eate it as (they ſay) with their teeth. It is ſayed alſo that Thales did prognoſticate ſuch alike thing, who after his death commaunded they ſhould burie his bodie, in ſome vile place of no reckoning, within the territorie of the MILESIANS, ſaying that one day there ſhould be the place of a citie. Epimenides therefore being marueilouſly eſteemed of euerie man for theſe cauſes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great preſents of mony and other things, but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to giue him a bough of the holy oliue: which they graunted him, and ſo he returned ſhortely home into CRETA. Now that this ſedition of Cylon was vtterly appeaſed in ATHENS, for that the excommunicates were baniſhed the country: the citie fell againe into their olde troubles and diſſentions about the gouernment of the common weale: & they were deuided into ſo diuers partes and factions, as there were people of ſundry places & territories within the cõtrie of ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines, the people of the vallies, and the people of the ſea coaſt. Thoſe of the mountaines, tooke the cõmon peoples part for their liues. Thoſe of the valley, would a few of the beſt citizens ſhould carie the ſway. The coaſte men would that neither of them ſhould preuaile, becauſe they would haue had a meane gouernmẽt & mingled of them both. Furthermore, the faction betwene the poore & rich, proceeding of their vnequalitie, was at that time very great. By reaſon whereof the citie was in great daunger, and it ſeemed there was no way to pacifie or take vp theſe controuerſies, vnles ſome tyrant happened to riſe, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For all the cõmon people were ſo ſore indebted to the rich, that either they plowed their lands, and yeelded them the ſixt part of their croppe: (for which cauſe they were called Hectemorij and ſeruants) or els they borowed mony of them at vſurie, vpon gage of their bodies to ſerue it out. And if they were not able to pay them, then were they by the law deliuered to their creditours, who kept them as bondmen and ſlaues in their houſes, or els they ſent them into ſtraunge cõtries to be ſold: and many euen for very pouertie were forced to ſel their owne children (for there was no law to forbid the contrarie) or els to forſake their citie & country, for the extreame cruelty & hard deling of theſe abominable vſurers their creditors. Inſomuch that many of the luſtieſt & ſtowteſt of thẽ, banded together in cõpanies, & incouraged one another, not to ſuffer & beare any longer ſuch extremitie, but to chooſe them a ſtoute & truſty captaine, that might ſet them at libertie, and redeeme thoſe out of captiuity, which were iudged to be bondmen & ſeruants, for lacke of paying of their debts at their dayes appoynted: & ſo to make againe a new diuiſion of all landes and tenements, and wholy to chaũge and turne vp the whole ſtate and gouernment. Then the wiſeſt men of the citie, who ſaw Solon only neither partner with the rich in their oppreſſion, neither partaker with the poore in their neceſſitie: made ſute to him, that it would pleaſe him to take the matter in hand and to appeaſe and pacifie all theſe broyles and ſedition. Yet Phanias Leſbian writeth, that he vſed a ſubtiltie, whereby he deceiued both the one and the other ſide, concerning the cõmon weale. For he ſecretly promiſed the poore to deuide the lands againe: & the rich alſo, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. Howſoeuer it fell out, it is very certain that Solon frõ the beginning made it a great matter, & was very ſcrupulous to deale betwene them. fearing the couetouſnes of the one, & arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was choſen gouernour after Philõbrotus, & was made reformer of the rigour of the lawes, & the tẽperer of the ſtate & cõmõ weale, by cõſent & agreemẽt of both parties. The rich accepted him, becauſe he was no begger: the poore did alſo like him, becauſe he was an honeſt man. They ſay moreouer, that one word & ſentẽce which he ſpake (which at that preſent was riſe in euery mans mouth) that equalitie did breede no ſtriſe: did aſwell pleaſe the rich and wealthie, as the poore and needie. For the one ſort conceiued of this word equalitie, that he would meaſure all things according to the qualitie of the man: and the other tooke it for their purpoſe, that he would meaſure all things by the number, and by the polle only. Thus the captaines of both factions perſwaded and prayed him, boldly to take vpon him that ſoueraigne authoritie, ſithence he had the whole citie now at his commaundement. The neuters alſo of euery parte, when they ſaw it very hard to pacifie theſe things with law and reaſon, were well content that the wiſeſt, and honeſteſt man, ſhould alone haue the royall power in his handes. Some ſay alſo that there was ſuch an oracle of Apollo.

Sitt thou at helme, as gouernour to ſteere
to guide our courſe, and rule the rowling ſhippe, for thou ſhalt ſee, full many Athenians there,
will take thy parte, and after thee will trippe.

Solon refuſeth to be a tyrant. Tynnondas, & Pittacus tyrants.

But his familiar friendes aboue all rebuked him, ſaying he was to be accompted no better then a beaſt, if for feare of the naine of tyrant, he would refuſe to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the moſt iuſt and honorable ſtate, if one take it vpon him that is an honeſt man. As in olde time, Tinnondas made himſelfe King of thoſe of Negrepont, with their conſent: and as Pittacus was then preſently of thoſe of METELIN. Notwithſtanding, all theſe goodly reaſons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they ſay that he aunſwered his friendes, that principalitie and tirannie, was indeede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entered into it. And in certaine verſes that he wrote to Phocus, thus he ſayde:

I neither bluſh, nor yet repent my ſelfe,
that haue preſerude, my natiue ſoyle alwaies,
and that therin (to hourde vp traſh and pelfe)
no tyrants thought, could once eclypſe my praiſe.
No might could moue, my mind to any wrong,
which might beblot, the glory of my name:
for ſo I thought, to liue in honour long,
and farre excell all other men for fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was choſen reformer of the ſtate, to ſtabliſh new lawes: he was then of great countenance and authoritie. But he himſelfe writeth, that many ſayed of him thus, after he had refuſed the occaſion of vſurping of this tyrannie:

Sure Solon was a foole, and of a baſhfull mind that would refuſe the great good happe, which godds to him aſſignde.
The praye was in his handes, yet durſt hee neuer draw, the net therefore: but ſtood abaſht, and like a daſtard dawe.
For had not that ſo bene, he would (for one dayes reigne, to be a kinge in Athens towne) himſelfe (all quicke) haue ſlaine.
And eke ſubuerted quite, his familie withall,
So ſweete it is to rule the roſt, yclad in princely pall.

Excellent temperature.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Now, notwithſtanding he had refuſed the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remiſſe nor ſoft therefore in gouerning, neither would he bow for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their likeing, that had choſen him their reformer. For where the miſchieſe was tollerable, he did not ſtraight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither did he ſo change the ſtate, as he might haue done, leaſt if he ſhould haue attẽpted to turne vpſide down the whole gouernment, he might afterwards haue bene neuer able to ſettle and ſtabliſh the ſame againe. Therefore he only altered that, which he thought by reaſon he would perſuade his citizens vnto, or els by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he ſayd, ſowre with ſweet, and force with iuſtice. And herewith agreeth his aũſwer that he made afterwards vnto one that asked him, if he had made the beſt lawes he could for the ATHENIANS? yea ſure, ſayth he, ſuch as they were able to receiue. And this that followeth alſo, they haue euer ſince obſerued in the Athenian tong: to make certẽ things

pleaſant, that be hatefull, finely conueying them vnder colour of pleaſing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions: garriſons, gardes: priſons, houſes. And all this came vp firſt by Solons inuẽtiõ, who called cleering of debts Seiſachtheian: in Engliſh, diſcharge. For the firſt change & reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordeined that all manner of debts paſt ſhould be cleere, and no body ſhould aske his debtor any thing for the time paſt. That no man ſhould thenceforth lend money out to vſurie, vpon couenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Howbeit ſome write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were cõtẽted that the intereſt onely for vſury ſhould be moderated, without taking away the whole debt; & that Solon called this eaſie & gentle diſcharge, Seiſachtheian with crying vp the value of mony. For he rayſed the peiſe of ſiluer, being before but threeſcore and thirteene Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: ſo they which were to pay great ſummes of money, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with leſſe number of peeces then the debt could haue bene payed when it was borrowed. And ſo the detters gained much, & the crediteurs loſt nothing. Neuertheles the greater part of them which haue written the ſame, ſay, that this crying vp of money, was a generall diſcharge of all debts, conditions, & couenantes vpon the ſame: whereto the very poemes themſelues, which Solon wrote, do ſeeme to agree. For he glorieth, & breaketh forth in his verſes, that he had taken away all bawks & markes that ſeparated mens lands through the country of ATTICA: & that now he had ſet at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the cittizens of ATHENS, which for lack of payment of their debts had bene condẽned for ſlaues to their creditours, he had brought many home againe out of ſtrange coũtries, where they had bene ſo long, that they had forgotten to ſpeake their naturall tongue: & other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had now ſet them all at good libertie. But while he was in doing this, men ſay a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruellouſly. For hauing framed an Edict for clearing of al debts, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, and to giue it ſome pretie preface, that otherwiſe was ready to be proclaymed: he opened him ſelfe ſomewhat to certaine of his familiars whom he truſted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) & told them how he would not medle with lands and poſſeſſions, but would onely cleere and cut off all maner of debts. Theſe men before the proclamatiõ came out, went preſently to the mony men, & borrowed great ſummes of mony of them, & layed it out ſtraight vpon land. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the landes they had purchaſed, but reſtored not the mony they had borrowed. This fowle part of theirs made Solon very ill ſpoken of, & wrõgfully blamed: as if he had not only ſuffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong & iniuſtice. Notwithſtanding he cleared himſelfe of this ſlaunderous report, loſing fiue talents by his owne law. For it was well knowne that ſo much was due vnto him, & he was the firſt that following his owne proclamation, did clearly releaſe his debtors of the ſame. Other ſay he was owing fifteene talents: and among the ſame, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithſtanding they euer after called Solons friendes, Greocopides, cutters of debts. This law neither liked the one nor the other ſort. For it greatly offended the rich, for cancelling their bonds: and it much more miſliked the poore, because all landes and poſſeſſions they gaped for, were not made againe common, and euery body a like rich and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuẽth deſcended of the right line from Hercules, & had many yeres bene king of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authoritie, and made himſelf many friends: all which things together, did greatly help him to execute that, which he wiſely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet alſo he vſed more perſuaſion then force, a good witnes thereof the loſſe of his eye: preferring a law before his priuate iniurie, which hath power to preſerue a citie long in vnion and concorde, and to make cittizens to be neither poore nor rich. Solon could not attaine to this, for he was borne in a popular ſtate, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could poſſible, with the power he had, as one ſeeking to win no credit with his citizẽs, but onely by his counſaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the cittie, by his proclamation which he made: he himſelfe doth witneſſe it ſaying:

The value of money cryed vp by Solon.

Lawes would be kept ſecret till they be publiſhed.

Ill conſciences by craft preuent lawe.

A good lawmaker, beginneth to do iuſtice in himſelf.

Euen thoſe which earſt, did beare me frendly face,
and ſpake full fayer, where euer I them met:

gan now beginne, to looke full grim of grace,
and were (like foes) in force againſt me ſet.
As if I had done them, ſome ſpite or ſcorne,
or open wrong, which were not to be borne,

Neuertheles he ſayeth immediatly after, that with the ſame authoritie and power he had, a man poſſibly

Could not controll, the peoples mindes:
nor ſtill their braynes, which wrought like windes.

But ſhortly after, hauing a feeling of the benefite of his ordinance, and euery one forgetting his priuate quarrell: they altogether made a common ſacrifice, which they called the ſacrifice of Seiſachthia, or diſcharge, and choſe Solon generall reformer of the law, and of the whole ſtate of the cōmon weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will. As the offices of ſtate, common aſſemblies, voyces in election, iudgments in iuſtice, and the bodie of the Senate. And they gaue him alſo full power and authoritie, to ſeſſe and taxe any of thē, to appoint the number, what time the ſeſſe ſhould continue, and to keepe, confirme, and diſanull at his pleaſure, any of the auncient lawes and cuſtomes then in being. To begin withall, he firſt tooke away all Dracons bloudie lawes, ſauing for murther, and manſlaughter, which were too ſeuere & cruel. For almoſt he did ordaine but one kind of puniſhment, for all kind of faultes and offences which was death. So that they which were condemned for idlenes, were iudged to dye. And pety larceny, as robbing mens hortyards, & gardens of frute, or herbes, was as ſeuerely puniſhed: as thoſe who had committed ſacriledge or murder. Demades therefore encountered it pleaſantly, when he ſayed: that Dracons lawes were not written with inck, but with bloud. And Draco himſelfe being asked one day, why his puniſhmēts were ſo vnequall, as death for all kind of faultes: he aunſwered. Becauſe he thought the leaſt offence worthie ſo much puniſhment: and for the greateſt: he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being deſirous to haue the chiefe offices of the citie to remaine in rich mens handes, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authoritie of gouernment in ſuch ſort, as the meaner people might beare a litle ſway, which they neuer could before: he made an eſtimate of the goodes of euery priuate citizen. And thoſe which he found yerely worth fiue hūdreth buſhells of corne, and other liquide frutes and vpwardes, he called Pentacoſiomedimnes: as to ſay, fiue hundreth buſhell men of reuenue. And thoſe that had three hundred buſhells a yere, and were able to keepe a horſe of ſeruice, he put in the ſecond degree, and called them knightes. They that might diſpend but two hundreth buſhells a yere, were put in the thirde place, & called Zeugites. All other vnder thoſe, were called Thetes, as ye would ſay, hierlings, or craftes men liuing of their labour: whome he did not admit to beare any office in the cittie, neither were they taken as free citizens, ſauing they had voyces in elections, and aſſemblies of the cittie, and in iudgments, where the people wholy iudged. This at the firſt ſeemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpoſe, for hereby the moſt part of priuate quarrelles and ſtrifes that grew among them, were in the end layed open before the people. For he ſuffered thoſe to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong iudgment in their cauſes. Furthermore becauſe his lawes were written ſomewhat obſcurely, and might be diuerſely taken and interpreted: this did giue a great deale more authoritie and power to the iudges. For, conſidering all their controuerſies could not be ended, and iudged by expreſſe lawe: they were driuen of neceſſitie alwaies to runne to the iudges, and debated their matters before them. In ſo much as the iudges by this meanes came to be ſomewhat aboue the lawe: for they did euen expound it as they would themſelues. Solon ſelfe doth note this equall diuiſion of the publicke authoritie, in a place of his poeſies, where he ſayeth.

Such power haue I giuen, to common peoples hand,
as might become their meane eſtate, with equitie to ſtande:
and as I haue not pluct, from them their dignitie,
ſo haue I not too much increaſt, their ſmall authoritie.
Vnto the rich likewiſe, I haue allowed no more,
then well might ſeeme (in iuſt conceit) ſufficient for their ſtore.

And ſo I haue for both prouided in ſuch wiſe, that neither ſhall each other wrong, nor ſeeme for to deſpiſe.

Yet conſidering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common ſorte of people: he ſuffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence, of any poore mans caſe that had the wrong. For if a man were hurt, beaten, forced, or otherwiſe wronged: any other man that would, might lawfully ſue the offendour, and proſecute lawe againſt him. And this was a wiſe lawe ordeined of him, to accuſtome his citizens to be ſorie one for anothers hurt, and ſo to feele it, as if any part of his owne body had bene iniured. And they ſay he made an anſwer on a time agreeable to this law. For, being asked what citie he thought beſt gouerned: he anſwered. That citie where ſuch as receiue no wrong, do as earneſtly defend wrong offered to other, as the very wrong and iniury had bene done vnto themſelues. He erected alſo the counſell of the Areopagites, of thoſe magiſtrates of the citie, out of which they did yeerely chooſe their gouernour: and he himſelfe had bin of that number, for that he had bin gouernour for a yeare. Wherfore perceiuing now the people were growne to a ſtomack, and haughtineſſe of minde becauſe they were cleare diſcharged of their debts: he ſet one vp for matters of ſtate, another counſell of an hundred choſen out of euery tribe, wherof foure hundred of them were to conſult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great counſell of the people at large ſhould be aſſembled, no matters ſhould be put forth, vnles it had bin before well conſidered of, & digeſted, by the counſell of the foure hundred. Moreouer, he ordeined the higher court ſhould haue the chiefe authoritie and power ouer all things, and chiefly to ſee the lawe executed and maintained: ſuppoſing that the common weale being ſetled, and ſtayed with theſe two courts (as with two ſtrong anker holdes) it ſhould be the leſſe turmoiled and troubled, and the people alſo better pacified and quieted. The moſt part of writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the counſaile of the Areopagites, as we haue ſaid, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his lawes and ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but alwayes ſpeaketh to the Ephetes (which were iudges of life and death) when he ſpake of murther, or of any mans death. Notwithſtanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of Solon ſaith thus, in theſe very words. All ſuch as haue bene baniſhed or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his lawes, ſhalbe reſtored againe to their goods and good name, except thoſe which were condemned by order of the counſaile of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open courte, for murther, and death of any man, or for aſpiring to vſurpe tyrannie. Theſe words to the contrarie ſeeme to proue and teſtifie, that the counſell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was choſen reformer of the lawes. For how could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the counſell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the firſt that gaue it authoritie to iudge? vnleſſe a man will ſay peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obſcure and darke, and would ſupply that they lacked, with expounding of the ſame by them. Thoſe which ſhall be found attainted and conuicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the counſell of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernours of the citie when this law ſhall come forth: ſhall ſtand condemned ſtill, and all other ſhall be pardoned, reſtored, and ſet at libertie. Howſoeuer it is, ſure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore amongſt the reſt of his lawes, one of them indeed was of his owne deuiſe: for the like was neuer ſtabliſhed elſe where. And it is that lawe, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnhoneſt, who in a ciuill vprore among the citizens, ſitteth ſtill a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither ſide. Whereby his minde was as it ſhould appeare, that priuate men ſhould not be only carefull to put themſelues and their cauſes in ſafetie, nor yet ſhould be careleſſe for other mens matters, or thinke it a vertue not to medle with the miſeries and miſfortunes of their countrie, but from the beginning of euery ſedition that they ſhould ioyne with thoſe that take the iuſteſt cauſe in hand, and rather to hazard themſelues with ſuch, then to tarie looking (without putting themſelues in daunger) which of the two ſhould haue the victorie. There is another lawe alſo, which at the firſt ſight me thinketh is very vnhoneſt and fond. That if any man according to the lawe hath matched with a riche heire and inheritour, and of himſelfe is impotent, and vnable to do the office of a husband, ſhe may lawfully lie with any whom ſhe liketh, of her husbands neareſt kinſemen. Howbeit ſome affirme, that it is a wiſe made lawe for thoſe, which knowing themſelues vnmeete to entertaine wedlocke, will for couetouſneſſe of lands, mary with riche heires and poſſeſsioners, and minde to abuſe poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of lawe: and will thinke to force and reſtraine nature. For, ſeeing the lawe ſuffereth an inheritour or poſſeſsioner thus ill beſtowed, at her pleaſure to be bolde with any of her husbands kinne: men will either leaue to purchaſe ſuch mariages, or if they be ſo careleſſe that they will needs mary, it ſhalbe to their extreame ſhame and ignominie, and ſo ſhall they deſeruedly pay for their greedie couetouſneſſe. And the lawe is well made alſo, becauſe the wife hath not ſcope to all her husbands kinſemen, but vnto one choice man whome ſhe liketh beſt of his houſe: to the ende that the children that ſhall be borne, ſhalbe at the leaſt of her husbands bloud and kindred. This alſo confirmeth the ſame, that ſuch a new maried wife ſhould be ſhut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him: and that he alſo which marieth ſuch an inheritour, ſhould of duetie ſee her thriſe a moneth at the leaſt. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honour the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honeſt woman, that he loueth her, and that he eſteemeth of her. Beſides, it taketh away many miſlikings and diſpleaſures which oftentimes happen in ſuch caſes, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it dye not vtterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke away all ioynters and dowries in other mariages, and willed that the wiues ſhould bring their husbands but three gownes onely, with ſome other litle moueables of ſmall value, and without any other thing as it were: vtterly forbidding that they ſhould buie their husbands, or that they ſhould make marchandiſe of mariages, as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman ſhould marrie together for iſſue, for pleaſure, and for loue, but in no caſe for money. And for proofe hereof, Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILE, one day anſwered his mother (which would needes be maried to a young man of SYRACVSA) in this ſort. I haue power (ſaieth he) to breake the lawes of SYRACVSA, by hauing the Kingdome: but to force the lawe of nature, or to make mariage without the reaſonable compaſſe of age, that paſſeth my reache and power. So is it not tollerable, and much leſſe allowable alſo, that ſuch diſorder ſhould be in well ordered cities, that ſuch vncomely and vnfit mariages ſhould be made, betweene couples of ſo vnequall yeares: conſidering there is no meete nor neceſſarie ende of ſuch matches. A wiſe gouernour of a citie, or a iudge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well ſaye to an olde man that ſhould marie with a young maide, as the Poet ſaieth of Philoctetes:

at theſe young yeares, for to be maried now?

And finding a young man in an olde riche womans houſe, getting his liuing by riding of her errants, and waxing fat as they ſay the Partridge dooth by treading of the hennes: he may take him from thence, to beſtowe him on ſome young maide that ſhall haue neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another lawe of Solons, which forbiddeth to ſpeake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke, that they ought not to touche the dead, no more than to touche holy things: and men ſhould take great heed to offend thoſe that are departed out of this world, beſides it is a token of wiſedome and ciuilitie, to beware of immortall enemies He commanded alſo in the ſelfe ſame lawe, that no man ſhould ſpeake ill of the liuing, ſpecially in Churches, during diuine ſeruice, or in counſell chamber of the citie, nor in the Theaters whileſt games were a playing: vpon paine of three ſiluer * Drachmes to be paied to him that was iniured, and two to the common treaſurie. For he thought it too much ſhamleſſe boldneſſe, in no place to keepe in ones choller, and moreouer, that ſuch lacked ciuilitie and good manners: and yet altogether to ſuppreſſe and ſmother it, he knew it was not onely a harde matter, but to ſome natures vnpoſſible. And he that maketh lawes, muſt haue regarde to the common poſsibilitie of men, if he will puniſh litle, with profitable example, and not much without ſome profit. So was he maruelouſlie well thought of, for the lawe that he made touching wils and teſtaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their heyres whom they would, but the goods came to the children or kindred of the teſtatour. But he leauing it at libertie, to diſpoſe their goods where they

they thought good, ſo they had no children of their owne: did therein preferre friendſhip before kindred, and good will and fauour before neceſſitie and conſtrainte, and ſo made euery one lorde and maiſter of his owne goods. Yet he did not ſimply and a like allowe all ſorts of giftes, howſoeuer they were made: but thoſe onely which were made by men of ſound memorie, or by thoſe whoſe wittes failed them not by extreame ſickneſſe, or through drinkes, medicines, poyſonings, charmes, or other ſuch violence and extraordinarie meanes, neither yet through the intiſements and perſwaſions of women. As thinking very wiſely, there was no difference at all betweene thoſe that were euidently forced by conſtraint, and thoſe that were compaſſed and wrought by ſubornation at length to do a thing againſt their will, taking fraude in this caſe equall with violence, and pleaſure with ſorrow, as paſſions with madneſſe, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to drawe and driue men from reaſon. He made another lawe alſo, in which he appointed women their times to go abroade into the fields, their mourning, their feaſts and ſacrifices, plucking from them all diſorder and wilfull libertie, which they vſed before. For he did forbid that they ſhould carie out of the citie with them aboue three gownes, and to take victuals with them aboue the value of an halfe pennie, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite high: and ſpecially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their coche, and that a torche ſhould be caried before them. He did forbid them alſo at the buriall of the dead, to teare and ſpoile themſelues with blowes, to make lamentations in verſes, to weepe at the funerals of a ſtranger not being their kinſeman, to ſacrifice an oxe on the graue of the dead, to burie aboue three gownes with the corſe, to go to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corſe: all which or the moſt part of them, are forbidden by our lawes at this day. Moreouer, thoſe lawes appoint a penaltie vpon ſuch women as offend in the ſame, to be diſtrained for, by certaine officers expreſſely named, to controll and reforme the abuſes of women, as womaniſh perſons and fainte harted, which ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome with ſuch paſſions and fondneſſe in their mourning. And perceiuing that the citie of ATHENS began to repleniſh dayly more and more, by mens repairing thither from all parts, and by reaſon of the great aſſured ſafetie, and libertie that they found there: and alſo conſidering howe the greateſt parte of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffequing the ſeas, are not wonte to bring any marchandiſe to thoſe, which can giue them nothing againe in exchange: he began to practiſe that his citizens ſhould giue themſelues vnto craftes and occupations, and made a lawe, that the ſonne ſhould not be bound to relieue his father being olde, vnleſſe he had ſet him in his youth to ſome occupation. It was a wiſe part of Lycurgus ( who dwelt in a citie where was no reſorte of ſtrangers, and had ſo great a territorie, as could haue furniſhed twiſe as many people, as Euripides ſaith, and moreouer on all ſides was enuironed with a great number of ſlaues of the ILOTES, whom it was needfull to keepe ſtill in labour and worke continually ) to haue his citizens alwaies occupied in exerciſes of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other ſcience, but diſcharged them of all other miſerable occupations and handy crafts. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, and not things vnto lawes, when he ſaw the countrie of ATTICA ſo leane and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to ſuſtaine thoſe that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impoſsible to keepe ſo great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requiſite to ſet vp occupations, and to giue them countenance and eſtimation. Therefore he ordeined, that the counſell of the Areopagites, ſhould haue full power and authoritie to enquire how euery man liued in the citie, and alſo to puniſh ſuch as they found idle people, and did not labour. But this was thought too ſeuere and ſtraight a lawe which he ordained ( as Heraclides Ponticus writeth ) that the children borne of common harlots and ſtrumpets ſhould not be bound to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainely ſheweth that he tooke not a wife to haue children, but onely to ſatiſfie his luſt and pleaſure: and ſo ſuch an one hath his iuſt reward, and is diſappointed of the reuerence that a father ought to haue of his children, ſince through his owne faulte the birth of his childe falleth out to his reproche. Yet to ſay truly, in Solons lawes touching women, there are many abſurdities, as they fall out ill fauoredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the fact. But he that rauiſheth or forciblie taketh away a free woman, is onely condemned to pay a hundred ſiluer * drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, ſhould only pay twentie drachmes. Vnleſſe ſhe had bene a common ſtrumpet or curtiſan: for ſuch do iuſtifie open acceſſe, to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any perſon to ſell his daughters or ſiſters, vnleſſe the father or brother had taken them, abuſing themſelues before mariage. Me thinketh it is farre from purpoſe and reaſon with ſeueritie to puniſh a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to paſſe it ouer in another: or to ſet ſome light fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to diſcharge him, as it were but a matter of ſporte. Vnleſſe they will excuſe it thus, that money being very hard and ſcante at that time in ATHENS, thoſe fines were then very great and grieuous to pay. For in ſetting out the charges of offerings which ſhould be made in ſacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a conuenient offering, and he ſetteth a buſſhell of corne at a ſiluer drachme. More he ordained, that they which wunne any of the games at ATHENS, ſhould pay to the common treaſurie an hundred drachmes. And thoſe that wunne any of the games Olympicall, fiue hundred drachmes. Alſo he appointed that he which brought a he woolfe, ſhould haue fiue drachmes, & him one drachme for reward of a ſhe woolfe. Wherof as Demetrius Phalerian writeth: the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordained in the ſixteenth table of his lawes meete for burnt ſacrifices, it is likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithſtanding, the price which he ſetteth, is very litle in compariſon of that which they are worth at this day. Now it was a cuſtome euer amongſt the ATHENIANS to kill their woolues, becauſe all their countrie laye for paſture, and not for tillage. Some there be that ſay, the tribes of the people of ATHENS haue not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their diuers trades and manners of liuing, which they tooke themſelues vnto from the beginning. For, ſuch as gaue themſelues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would ſay, men of armes. Thoſe that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to ſay, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, & followed the plough, were calld Teleontes: as you would ſay, labouring men. And thoſe that kept beaſts and cattell, were called Ægicores: as much to ſay, as heardmen. Now, foraſmuch as the whole prouince of ATTICA was very drye, and had great lack of water, being not full of riuers, running ſtreames, nor lakes, nor yet ſtored with any great number of ſprings, in ſo much as they are driuen there to vſe (through the moſt part of the countrie) water drawne out of welles made with mens hands: he made ſuch an order, that where there was any Well within the ſpace of an Hippicon, that euery body within that circuite, might come and draw water only at that Well, for his vſe and neceſſitie. Hippicon is the diſtaunce of foure furlongs, which is halfe a mile: and thoſe that dwelt further off, ſhould go ſeeke their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yardes deepe in their ground, and could finde no water in the bottome, in this caſe, they might lawfully go to their next neighbours well. and take a pot full of water containing ſixe gallons, twiſe a day: iudging it great reaſon that neceſſitie ſhould be holpen, but not that idleneſſe ſhould be cheriſhed. He appointed alſo the ſpaces that ſhould be kept and obſerued by thoſe, that would ſet or plant trees in their ground, as being a man very ſkilfull in theſe matters. For he ordained, that whoſoeuer would plante any kinde of trees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them fiue foote a ſunder one from another: but for the figge tree and olyue tree ſpecially, that they ſhould in any caſe be nine foote a ſunder, becauſe theſe two trees do ſpread out their branches farre off, and they cannot ſtand neere other trees, but they muſt needs hurt them very much. For beſides that they drawe away the ſame that doth nouriſh the other trees, they caſt alſo a certaine moiſture and ſteame vpon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that whoſoeuer would digge a pit or hole in his ground, he ſhould digge it as farre off from his neighbours pit, as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would ſet vp a hiue of bees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them at the leaſt three hundred foote from other hiues ſet about him before. And of the frutes of the earth, he was contented they ſhould tranſporte and ſell onely oyle out of the Realme to ſtrangers, but no other frute or graine. He ordained that the go-uernour of the citie ſhould yearely proclaime open curſes againſt thoſe that ſhould doe to the contrarie, or elſe he himſelfe making default therein, ſhould be fined at a hundred drachmes. This ordinance is in the firſt table of Solons lawes, and therefore wee may not altogether diſcredite thoſe which ſay, they did forbid in the olde time that men ſhould carie figges out of the countrie of Attica, and that from thence it came that theſe picke thankes, which bewray and accuſe them that tranſported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another law alſo againſt the hurt that beaſtes might doe vnto men. Wherein he ordeined, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him ſhould deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tyed to a logge of timber of foure cubites long: and this was a very good deuiſe, to make men ſafe from dogges. But he was very ſtraight in one lawe he made, that no ſtranger might be made denizen and free man of the citie of Athens, vnleſſe he were a baniſhed man for euer out of his countrie, or elſe that he ſhould come and dwell there with all his family, to exerciſe ſome craft or ſcience. Notwithſtanding, they ſay he made not this lawe ſo much to put ſtraungers from their freedome there, as to drawe them thither, aſſuring them by this ordinance, they might come and be free of the citie: and he thought moreouer, that both the one & the other would be more faithfull to the common weale of Athens. The one of them, for that againſt their wils they were driuen to forſake their countrie: and the other ſort, for that aduiſedly and willingly they were contented to forſake it. This alſo was another of Solons lawes, which he ordeined for thoſe that ſhould feaſt certaine dayes at the towne houſe of the citie, at other mens coſt. For he would not allow, that one man ſhould come often to feaſts there. And if any man were inuited thither to the feaſt, and did refuſe to come: he did ſet a fine on his head, as reprouing the miſerable niggardlineſſe of the one, and the preſumptuous arrogancie of the other, to contemne & deſpiſe common order. After he had made his lawes, he did ſtabliſh them to continue for the ſpace of one hundred yeares, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones, which were made more long then broad, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine ſome monuments yet in our time, which are to be ſeene in the towne hall of the citie of Athens. Ariſtotle ſayth, that theſe tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus alſo the Comicall poet ſayth in one place, of Solon and Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veſſell or pan wherin they did frie millet or hirſe. Howbeit others ſay, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which conteined the ordinances of the ſacrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the common weale. So, all the counſels & magiſtrates together did ſweare, that they would keepe Solons lawes themſelues, and alſo cauſe them to be obſerued of others throughly & particularly. Then euery one of the Theſmothetes (which were certaine officers attendant on the counſell, and had ſpeciall charge to ſee the lawes obſerued) did ſolemnly ſweare in the open market place, neere the ſtone where the proclamations are proclaimed: and euery of them both promiſed, and vowed openly to keepe the ſame lawes, and that if any of them did in any one point breake the ſaid ordinances, then they were content that ſuch offender ſhould pay to the tẽple of Apollo, at the citie of Delphes, an image of fine golde, that ſhould waigh as much as himſelf. Moreouer, Solon ſeeing the diſorder of the moneths, and the mouing of the moone, which followed not the courſe of the ſunne, and vſed not to riſe & fal when the ſunne doth, but oft times in one day, it doth both touch and paſſe the ſunne: he was the firſt that called the chaunge of the moone, Ene caì néa, as much to ſay, as olde and new moone. Allowing that which appeared before the coniunction, to be of the moneth paſt: and that which ſhewed it ſelfe after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the firſt alſo (in my opinion) that vnderſtoode Homer rightly, when he ſayd: then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the chaunge, he called Neomenia, as much to ſay, as the new moneth, or the newe moone. After the twenty day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckoned not the reſt of the moneth, as increaſing, but as in the wane: & gathered it by ſeeing the light of the moone decreaſing vntill the thirtie day. Now after his lawes were come abroad, and proclaimed, there came ſome daily vnto him, which either praiſed them, or miſliked them: & praied him either to take away, or to adde ſome thing vnto them. Many againe came and asked him, how he vnderſtoode ſome ſentence of his lawes: and requeſted him to declare his meaning, and how it ſhould be taken. Wherfore conſidering how it were to no purpoſe to refuſe to do it, & againe how it would get him much ennie and ill will to yeelde thereunto: hee determined (happen what would) to wind himſelfe out of theſe bryers, and to flie the gronings, complaints, and quarrels of his citizens. For he ſayth himſelfe:

Full hard it is, all mindes content to haue,

So, to conuey himſelfe a while out of the way, he tooke vpon him to be maſter of a ſhippe in a certaine voyage, and aſked licence for ten yeares of the ATHENIANS to goe beyonde ſea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his lawes. So went he to the ſeas, & the firſt place of his arriuall was in EGYPT, where he remained a while, as he himſelfe ſayth.

He went to his booke there, and did conferre a certaine time with Pſenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wiſeſt prieſtes at that time that were in EGYPT: whom when he heard rehearſe the ſtorie of the Iles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the ſame into verſe, and did ſend it abroad through GRECE. At his departure out of EGYPT he went into CYPRVS, where he had great courteſie and friendſhip of one of the princes of that countrie, called Philocyprus, who was lord of a pretie litle citie which Demophon (Theſeus ſon) cauſed to be built vpon the riuer of Clarie, and was of a goodly ſtrong ſituation, but in a very leane and barren countrie. Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very fayre and pleaſant valley that lay vnderneath it, and there to make it larger and ſtatelier then it was: which was done according to his perſwaſion. And Solons ſelfe being preſent at it, was made ouerſeer of the buildings, which he did helpe to deuiſe and order in good ſort, aſwell in reſpect of pleaſure, as for force and defence: inſomuch as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other lordes of the countrie did follow the example of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon, called his citie SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his words vnto Philocyprus, as followeth.

So graunt the goddes, that thou, and thine offſpring may clyme to great and paſsing princely ſtate:

And as for the meeting and talke betwixt him & king Cræſus, I know there are that by diſtance of time will proue it but a fable, and deuiſed of pleaſure: but for my part I wil not reiect, nor cōdemne ſo famous an hiſtorie, receiued & approued by ſo many graue teſtimonies. Moreouer it is very agreeable to Solons maners & nature, and alſo not vnlike to his wiſdom & magnanimity: although in all points it agreeth not with certaine tables (which they call Chronicles) where they haue buſily noted the order and courſe of times which euen to this day, many haue curiouſly ſought to correct, and could yet neuer diſcuſſe it, nor accord all contrarieties & manifeſt repugnances in the ſame. Solon at the deſire and requeſt of Cræſus, went to ſee him in the citie of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he ſeemed to be in the ſelfe ſame taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne and bred vp on the maine land, and had neuer ſeene the ſea neither farre nor neere, did imagine euery riuer that he ſawe had bene the ſea. So Solon paſſing alongſt Cræſus palace, and meeting by the way many of the lordes of his Court richly apparelled, and carying great traines of ſeruing men, and ſouldiers about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill hee was brought vnto Cræſus ſelfe. Who was paſſing richly attrayed, what for precious ſtones and iewels, and for rich colloured ſilkes, layd on with curious goldſmithes worke,& all to ſhew himſelfe to Solon in moſt ſtately, ſumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repayre to his preſence, that he ſhewed no manner of ſigne,nor countenance of wondring, to ſee ſo great a ſtate before him, neither had giuen out any worde neere or likely to that which Cræſus looked for in his owne imagination,but rather had deliuered ſpeeches for men of iudgement & vnderſtanding to know, how inwardly he much did miſlike Cræſus fooliſh vanitie & baſe mind: then Cræſus commanded all his treaſuries to be opened where his gold and ſiluer lay,next that they ſhould ſhewe him his rich and ſumptuous wardroppes, although that needed not: for to ſee Cræſus ſelfe,it was enough to diſcerne his nature and condition. After he had ſeene all ouer and ouer, being brought againe vnto the preſence of the King: Cræſus asked him,if euer he had ſeene any man more happy than himſelfe was? Solon anſwered him, I haue: and that was one Tellus a citizen of ATHENS, who was a maruellous honeſt man,and had left his children behind him in good eſtimation,and wel to liue,& laſtly,was moſt happy at his death,by dying honorably in the field,in defence of his countrie. Cræſus hearing this anſwere, began to iudge him a man of litle wit,or of groſſe vnderſtanding, becauſe he did not thinke that to haue ſtore of gold & ſiluer,was the only ioy & felicitie of the world, and that he would preferre the life & death of a meane & priuate man as more happie,than all the riches & power of ſo mightie a King. Notwithſtanding all this,Cræſus yet asked him againe: What other man beſide Tellus he had ſeene happier than himſelf? Solon anſwered him,that he had ſeene Cleobis & Biton,which were both brethren, and loued one another ſingularly well, and their mother in ſuch ſort: that vpon a ſolemne feſtiual day,when ſhe ſhould go to the temple of Iuno in her couch drawen with oxen: becauſe they taried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoaked thēſelues by the neckes,& drue their mothers couch in ſtead of the oxen,which maruellouſly reioyced her,and ſhe was thought moſt happy of all other,to haue borne two ſuch ſonnes. Afterwards when they had done ſacrifice to the goddeſſe, & made good cheere at the feaſt of this ſacrifice, they went to bed: but they roſe not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without ſuffering hurt or ſorow,after they had receiued ſo much glorie and honour. Cræſus then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in choller,ſaid vnto him: why, doeſt thou recken me than in no degree of happie men? Solon would neither flatter him,nor further increaſe his heate, but aunſwered him thus: O King of LYDIANS, the goddes haue giuen vs GRECIANS all things in a meane, and amongſt other things chiefly, a baſe and popular wiſedome, not princely nor noble: which, conſidering how mans life is ſubiect to infinite chaunges,doth forbid vs to truſt or glorie in theſe worldly riches. For time bringeth daily miſfortunes vnto man,which he neuer thought of,nor looked for.But when the goddes haue continued a mans good fortune to his end,then we thinke that man happy & bleſſed,and neuer before. Otherwiſe, if we ſhould iudge a man happie that liueth, conſidering he is euer in danger of chaunge during life: we ſhould be much like to him, who iudgeth him the victory before hand,that is ſtill a fighting,and may be ouercome,hauing no ſuertie yet to carie it away. After Solon had ſpoken theſe wordes, he departed from the Kings preſence, and returned backe againe, leauing King Cræſus offended, but nothing the wiſer, nor amended. Now Æſope that wrote the fables,being at that time in the citie of SARDIS,& ſent for thither by the King,who entertained him very honorably: was very ſory to ſee that the King had giuen Solon no better entertainment: ſo by way of aduiſe he ſaid vnto him. O Solon, either wee muſt not come to princes at all, or elſe we muſt ſeeke to pleaſe and content them. But Solon turning it to the contrarie, aunſwered him: either we muſt not come to princes, or els wee muſt needes tell them truely, and counſell them for the beſt. So Cræſus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he had loſt the battell againſt Cyrus, and that his citie was taken, him ſelfe became priſoner, and was bound faſt to a gibbet, ouer a great ſtake of wood, to be burnt in the ſight of all the PERSIANS, and of Cyrus his enemie: he then cryed out as lowde as he could, thriſe together. O Solon. Cyrus being abaſhed, ſent to aske him, whether this Solon he onely cryed vpon in his extreme miſerie, was a god or man. Cræſus kept it not ſecret from him, but ſaid: he was one of the wiſe men of GRECE, whom I ſent for to come vnto me on a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I ſtood in neede of, but only that he might witnes my felicitie, which then I did enioy: the loſſe whereof is now more hurtfull, than the enioying of the ſame was good or profitable. But now (alas) too late I knowe it, that the riches I poſſeſſed then, were but words and opinion, all which are turned now to my bitter ſorrow, and to preſent & remedileſſe calamitie. Which the wiſe GRECIAN conſidering then, and foreſeeing a farre off by my doings at that time, the inſtant miſerie I ſuffer now: gaue me warning I ſhould marke the end of my life, and that I ſhould not too farre preſume of my ſelfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glorie of opinion of happines, the ground thereof being ſo ſlipperie, and of ſo litle ſuertie. Theſe words being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wiſer than Crœſus, & ſeeing Solons ſaying confirmed by ſo notable an example: he did not only deliuer Crœſus from preſent perill of death, but euer after honoured him ſo long as he liued. Thus had Solon glorie, for ſauing the honor of one of theſe Kings and the life of the other, by his graue & wiſe counſell. But during the time of his abſence, great ſeditions roſe at ATHENS amongeſt the inhabitantes, who had gotten them ſeuerall heads amongſt them: as thoſe of the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coaſt men, Megacles, the ſonne of Alcmæon. And thoſe of the mountaines, Piſiſtratus: with whom all artificers & crafts men liuing of their handie labour were ioyned, which were the ſtowteſt againſt the rich. So that notwithſtanding the citie kept Solons lawes & ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a chaunge, and deſired to ſee things in another ſtate: either parties hoping their condition would mend by chaunge, and that euery of them ſhould be better than their aduerſaries. The whole common weale broyling thus with troubles, Solon arriued at ATHENS, where euery man did honour and reuerence him, howbeit hee was no more able to ſpeake alowde in open aſſembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, becauſe his age would not ſuffer him: & therefore he ſpake with euery one of the heads of the ſeuerall factions a part, trying if he could agree & reconcile them together againe. Whereunto Piſiſtratus ſeemed to be more willing then any of the reſt, for he was courteous, and maruellous fayre ſpoken, and ſhewed him ſelfe beſides, very good & pitifull to the poore, and temperate alſo to his enemies: further, if any good qualitie were lacking in him, he did ſo finely counterfeate it, that men imagined it was more in him, than in thoſe that naturally had it in them in deede. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aſpiring no higher, and hating thoſe which would attempt to chaunge the preſent ſtate of the common weale, and would practiſe any innouation. By this art and fine manner of his, hee deceiued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him ſtraight, and ſaw the marke he ſhot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and ſought ſtill to winne him, and bring him to reaſon, ſaying oft times, both to him ſelfe, and to others. That who ſo could plucke out of his head the worme of ambition, by which hee aſpired to be the chiefeſt, and could heale him of his greedie deſire to rule: there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better citizen than hee would proue. About this time began Theſpis to ſet out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the people for the rareneſſe thereof, being not many Poets yet in number, to ſtriue one againſt another for victorie, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally deſirous to heare and learne, and by reaſon of his age ſeeking to paſſe his time away in ſportes, in muſicke, and making good cheere more then euer he did: went one day to ſee Theſpis, who playd a part himſelfe, as the old faſhion of the Poets was, and after the play was ended, he called him to him & asked him: if he were not aſhamed to lye ſo openly in the face of the world. Theſpis anſwered him, that it was not materiall to doe or ſay any ſuch things, conſidering all was but in ſport. Then Solon beating the ground with his ſtaffe he had in his hand: but if we cōmend lying in ſport (quoth he) we ſhall finde it afterwards in good earneſt, in all our bargaines and dealings. Shortly after Piſiſtratus hauing wounded himſelfe, and bloudied all his bodie ouer, cauſed his men to carie him in his couch into the market place, where he put the people in an vproare, and told them that they were his enemies that thus traiterouſly had handled and arraied him, for that he ſtood with them about the gouerning of the common weale: inſomuch as many of them were maruellouſly offended, and mutined by & by, crying out it was ſhamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere ſaid vnto him, O thou ſonne of Hippocrates, thou doeſt ill fauouredly counterfeate the perſon of Homers Vlyſſes: for thou haſt whipped thy ſelfe to deceiue thy citizens, as he did teare & ſcratch him ſelfe, to deceiue his enemies. Notwithſtanding this, the common people were ſtill in vprore, being ready to take armes for Piſiſtratus: and there was a generall counſell aſſembled, in the which one Ariſton ſpake, that they ſhould grant fifty men, to cary holdberds and maſes before Piſiſtratus for guard of his perſon. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, ſtoutly inuayed againſt it: and perſwaded the people with many reaſons, like vnto theſe he wrote afterwards in verſe.

Ech one of you (ô men) in priuate actes,
can play the foxe, for ſlie and ſubtill craft:
But when you come, yfore (in all your factes)
then are you blinde, dull witted and bedaſt,
For pleaſaunt ſpeach, and painted flatterie,
beguile you ſtill, the which you neuer ſpie.

But in the end, ſeeing the poore people did tumult ſtill, taking Piſiſtratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way alſo, ſaying: he had ſhewed him ſelfe wiſer then ſome, and hardier then other. Meaning, wiſer then thoſe which ſaw not Piſiſtratus reach and fetch: and hardier then they which knew very well he did aſpire to be King, and yet neuertheleſſe durſt not reſiſt him. The people went on with the motion of Ariſton, and authoriſed the ſame, touching the graunt of holberders: limiting no number, but ſuffered him to haue about him and to aſſemble, as many as he would, vntill ſuch time as he had gotten poſſeſſion of the caſtle. Then the city was maruellouſly affraide and amazed: and preſently Megacles, and all thoſe which were of the houſe of the Alcmeonides did flie. Solon, who for yeares was now at his laſt caſt, and had no man to ſticke vnto him: went notwithſtanding into the market place, and ſpake to the citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beaſtlineſſe, and faint cowardly harts, and encouraged them not to loſe their liberty. He ſpake at that time notably, and worthy memory, which euer after was remembred. Before, ſaid he, you might more eaſely haue ſtaide this preſent tyranny: but now that it is already faſhioned, you ſhal winne more glory, vtterly to ſuppeſſe it. But for all his goodly reaſons, he found no man that would hearken to him, they were all ſo amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his houſe, and laid them before his gate in the middeſt of the ſtreete, ſaying. For my part, I haue done what I can poſſible, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my countrey. So from that time he betooke him ſelfe vnto his eaſe, and neuer after dealt any more in matters of ſtate, or common weale. His friends did counſell him to flie: but all they could not perſwade him to it. For he kept his houſe, and gaue him ſelfe to make verſes: in which he ſore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, ſaying:

If preſently, your burden heauy be:
yet murmur not againſt the goddes therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your ſelues may ſee, which graunted haue of mighty Mars the lore
to ſuch as now, by your direction
doe hold your neckes, in this ſubiection.

His friends hereupon did warne him, to beware of ſuch ſpeaches, and to take heede what he ſaid: leaſt if it came vnto the tyrants eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherin he truſted, that he ſpake ſo boldly. He aunſwered them, in my age. Howbeit Piſiſtratus after he had obtained his purpoſe, ſending for him vpon his worde and faith, did honour and entertaine him ſo well, that Solon in the end became one of his counſell, and approoued many things which he did. For Piſiſtratus him ſelfe did ſtraightly keepe, and cauſed his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Inſomuch as when he was called by proces into the court of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrant: he preſented him ſelfe very modeſtly to aunſwer his accuſation, and to purge him ſelfe thereof. But his accuſer let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Piſiſtratus him ſelfe alſo did make new lawes: as this. That he that had bene maymed, and made lame of any member in the warres, ſhould be maintained all his life long, at the common charges of the city. The ſelfe ſame was before decreed by Therſippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perſwaſion: who did preferre it to the counſell. Piſiſtratus afterwards tooke hold of the motion, and from thence forth made it a generall law. Theophraſtus ſaith alſo, it was Piſiſtratus, and not Solon, that made the law for idleneſſe: which was the only cauſe that the countrey of ATTICA became more frutefull, being better manured: and the city of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon hauing begon to write the ſtory of the Iles ATLANTIDES in verſe (which he had learned of the wiſe men of the city of SAIS in EGYPT, and was very neceſſary for the ATHENIANS) grew weary, and gaue it ouer in mid way: not for any matters or buſines that trobled him, as Plato ſaid, but only for his age, and becauſe he feared the tediouſneſſe of the worke. For otherwiſe he had leyſure enough, as appeareth by theſe verſes where he ſaith:

I grow old, and yet I learne ſtill.

And in another place where he ſaieth,

Now Venus yeelds me ſweete delights,
and Bacchus lends me comfort ſtill:
the Muſes eke, refresh my ſprights,
and much relieue my weary will.
Theſe be the pointes of perfect eaſe, which all mens mindes oft times do pleaſe.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the ſtory and fables of the Iles of ATLANTIDES, was deſirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of ſpeach haue broken vp a field or lay land of his owne, or that this gift had deſcended to him of right from Solon. He began to raiſe vp a ſtately front vnto the ſame, and encloſed it with high walles, and large ſquared courts at the entry thereof: ſuch was it, as neuer any other worke, fable or poeticall inuention had euer ſo notable, or the like. But becauſe he began a litle too late, he ended his life before his work, leauing the readers moſt ſorrowfull for that was left vnwritten, then they toke pleaſure in that they found written. For euen as in the city of ATHENS, the temple of Iupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: ſo the wiſedome of Plato (amongeſt many goodly matters of his that haue come aboad) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Iles ATLANTIDES. Solon liued long time after Piſiſtratus had vſurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Epheſian writeth, that he liued not aboue two yeares after. For Piſiſtratus vſurped tyrannicall power in the yeare that Comias was chiefe gouernour in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon died in the yeare that Hegeſtratus was gouernour, which was the next yeare after that. And where ſome ſay, the aſhes of his body were after his death ſtrawed abroade through the Ile of SALAMINA: that ſeemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheleſſe it hath bene written by many notable authors, and amongeſt others, by Ariſtotle the Philoſopher.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS Valerius Publicola.

VALERIVS PVBLICOLA

NOW we haue declared what Solon was, we haue thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAINE people for an honour gaue that ſurname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, deſcended from that auncient Valerius, who was one of the chiefeſt workers and meanes, to bring the ROMAINES and the SABINES that were mortall enemies, to ioyne together as one people. For it was he that moſt moued the two Kings to agree, and ioyne together. Publicola being deſcended of him, whileſt the Kings did rule yet at ROME, was in very great eſtimation, as well for his eloquence, as for his riches: vſing the one rightly and freely for the maintenaunce of iuſtice, and the other liberally and curteouſly, for the reliefe of the poore. So that it was manifeſt, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publicke ſtate, he ſhould be one of the chiefeſt men of the ſame. It chanced that King Tarquine ſurnamed the proude, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarily by indirect and wicked waies, and behauing him ſelfe not like a King, but like a cruell tyrant; the people much hated and deteſted him, by reaſon of the death of Lucretia(which killed her ſelfe for that ſhe was forcibly rauiſhed by him) and ſo the whole city roſe and rebelled againſt him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head and captaine of this inſurrection and rebellion, did ioyne firſt with this Valerius: who did greatly fauour and aſſiſt his enterpriſe, and did helpe him to driue out king Tarquine with all his houſe and family. Now whileſt they were thinking that the people would chooſe ſome one alone to be chiefe ruler ouer them, in ſtead of a king: Valerius kept him ſelfe quiet, as yelding willingly vnto Brutus the firſt place, who was meeteſt for it, hauing bene the chiefe authour and worker of their recouered liberty. But when they ſaw the name of Monarchy(as much to ſay, as ſoueraintу alone) was diſpleaſant to the people, and that they would like better to haue the rule deuided vnto two, and how for this cauſe they would rather chooſe two Conſuls: Valerius then beganne to hope, he ſhould be the ſecond perſon with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him. For againſt Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus(the husband of Lucretia was choſen Cõſul with him: not becauſe he was a man of greater vertue, or of better eſtimation then Valerius. But the noble men of the city fearing the practiſes of the Kings abroade, which ſought by all the faire and flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the citie: did determine to make ſuch a one Conſull, whom occaſion forced to be their hard and heauie enemie, perſwading themſelues that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no reſpect yeeld vnto thē. Valerius tooke this matter grieuouſly, but they had a miſtruſt in him, as if he would not do any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: notwithſtanding he had neuer any priuate iniurie offered him by the tyrants. Wherefore, he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for priuate men, and wholy gaue vp to meddle in matters of ſtate: in ſo much as he gaue many occaſion to thinke of his abſence, and it troubled ſome men much, who feared leaſt vpon this his miſliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings ſide, and ſo bring all the citie in an vprore, conſidering it ſtoode then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who ſtood in ielouſie of ſome, would by oth be aſſured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day ſolemnely to take their othes vpon the ſacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerefull countenaunce came into the market place, and was the firſt that tooke his oth he would leaue nothing vndone that might preiudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight againſt them, and defend the liberty of the city. This oth of his maruellouſly reioyced the Senate, and gaue great aſſuraunce alſo to the Conſuls; but ſpecially, becauſe his deedes did ſhortly after performe his wordes. For there came ambaſſadours to ROME which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of ſweete and lowly ſpeaches to win the fauour of the people, with commiſſion to vſe all the mildeſt meanes they could, to dulce and ſoften the hardened harts of the multitude: who declared how the King had left all pride & cruelty, and ment to aske nought but reaſonable things. The Conſuls thought beſt to giue them open audience, and to ſuffer them to ſpeake to the people. But Valerius was againſt it, declaring it might perill the ſtate much, and deliuer occaſion of new ſturre vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more affraide of warres, then of tyranny. After that, there came other ambaſſadours alſo, which ſaide that Tarquine would from thenceforth for euer giue ouer and renounce his title to the kingdome, and to make any more warres, but beſought them only, that they would at the leaſt deliuer him and his friends their money and goods, that they might haue wherwithall to keepe them in their baniſhment. Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeeld to this requeſt, and ſpecially Collatinus, one of the Conſuls who did fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a faſt and reſolute man, and very fierce in his heart, ranne immediatly into the market place, crying out that his fellow Conſull was a traytour, and contented to graunt the tyraunts matter, and meanes to make warre vpon the city, where indeede they deſerued not ſo much, as to be relieued in their exile. Hereupon the people aſſembled together, and the firſt that ſpake in this aſſembly, was a priuat man called Gaius Minutius, who ſpeaking vnto Brutus, and to the whole aſſembly, ſaid vnto them. O noble Conſul and Senate, handle ſo the matter, that the tyraunts goods be rather in your cuſtody to make warre with them, then in theirs, to bring warre vpon your ſelues. Notwithſtanding the ROMAINS were of opinion, that hauing gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the tyrants: they ſhould not diſappoint the offered peace, with keeping backe their goods, but rather they ſhould throw their goods out after them. Howbeit this was the leaſt part of Tarquines intent, to ſeeke his goods againe: but vnder pretence of that demaund, he ſecretly corrupted the people, and practiſed treaſon, which his ambaſſadours followed, pretending only to get the Kings goods and his fauourers together, ſaying, that they had already ſold ſome part, and ſome part they kept, and ſent them daily. So as by delaying the time in this ſort with ſuch pretences, they had corrupted two of the beſt and auncienteſt houſes of the city: to wit, the family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senatours: and the family of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senatours: all which by their mothers, were Conſul Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians alſo were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their own ſiſter, and had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawen to their ſtring, two of the eldeſt of them, becauſe they familiarly frequented together, being coſin germains: whom they had intiſed to be of their conſpiracy, allying them with the houſe of the Tarquines, which was of great power, & through the which they might perſwade themſelues to riſe to great honour and preferment by meanes of the Kings, rather then to truſt to their fathers wilfull hardneſſe. For they called his ſeueritie to the wicked, hardneſſe: for that he would neuer pardon any. Furthermore Brutus had fained himſelfe madde, and a foole of long time for ſafetie of his life, becauſe the tyrantes ſhould not put him to death: ſo that the name of Brutus onely remained. After theſe two young men had giuen their conſent to be of the confederacie, and had ſpoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great and horrible othe, drinking the bloude of a man, and ſhaking hands in his bowels, whom they would ſacrifice. This matter agreed vpon betweene them, they met together to put their ſacrifice in execution, in the houſe of the Aquilians. They had fitly pickt out a darke place in the houſe to do this ſacrifice in, and where almoſt no body came: yet it happened by chaunce, that one of the ſeruants of the houſe called Vindicius, had hidden him ſelfe there, vnknowing to the traitours, and of no ſet purpoſe, to ſpie and ſee what they did, or that he had any manner of inckling thereof before: but falling by chaunce vpon the matter, euen as the traitours came into that place with a countenance to do ſome ſecret thing of importance, fearing to be ſeene, he kept him ſelfe cloſe, and lay behinde a coffer that was there, ſo that he ſawe all that was done, and what they ſaid and determined. The concluſion of their counſell in the ende was this, that they would kill both the Conſuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertiſing the ſame, which they gaue vnto his ambaſſadours, being lodged in the houſe of the Aquilians, & were preſent at this concluſion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out alſo as ſecretly as he could, being maruellouſly troubled in minde, and at a maze how to deale in this matter. For he thought it dangerous (as it was in deed) to go and accuſe the two ſonnes vnto the father (which was Brutus) of ſo wicked and deteſtable a treaſon, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other ſide alſo, he thought this was a ſecret, not to be imparted to any priuate perſon, and not poſſible for him to conceale it, that was bounde in duetie to reueale it. So he reſolued at the laſt to go to Valerius to bewraye this treaſon, of a ſpeciall affection to this man, by reaſon of his gentle and courteous vſing of men, giuing eaſie acceſſe and audience vnto any that came to ſpeake with him, and ſpecially for that he diſdained not to heare poore mens cauſes. Vindicius being gone to ſpeake with him, and hauing tolde him the whole conſpiracie before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abaſhed and fearefull withall: whereupon he ſtaied him leaſt he ſhould ſlip away, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watche the doore, that no body went in nor out vnto him. And willed his brother alſo, that he ſhould go and beſet the Kings palace round about, to intercept theſe letters if it were poſſible, and to ſee that none of their ſeruants fled. Valerius ſelfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friends and people that waited on him, went ſtraight vnto the houſe of the Aquilians, who by chaunce were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he found the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquines ambaſſadours laye. Whileſt he was thus occupyed, the Aquilians hauing intelligence thereof, ranne home immediatly, and found Valerius comming out at their gate. So they would haue taken thoſe letters from him by force and ſtrong hand. But Valerius and his company did reſiſt them, and moreouer hudded them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought them (do what they could) into the market place. The like was done alſo in the Kings palace, where Marcus Valerius found other letters alſo wrapt vp in certaine fardels for their more ſafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place, all the Kings ſeruants he found there. There the Conſuls hauing cauſed ſilence to be made, Valerius ſent home to his houſe for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Conſuls: then the traytours were openly accuſed, and their letters redde, and they had not the face to anſwer one worde. All that were preſent, being amazed, hung downe their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durſt once open his mouth to ſpeake, excepting a fewe, who to gratifie Brutus, began to ſay that they ſhould baniſh them: and Collatinus alſo gaue them ſome hope, becauſe he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his ſonnes by theyr names: come on (ſaid he) Titus and thou Valerius, why do you not aunſwer to that you are accuſed off? and hauing ſpoken thryſe vnto them to aunſwer, when he ſawe they ſtood

mute, and ſaid nothing: he turned him to the ſergeants, and ſaid vnto them. They are now in your hands, do iuſtice. So ſoone as he had ſpoken theſe words, the ſergeants layde holde immediately vpon the two young men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound theyr hands behinde them, and then whipped them with roddes: which was ſuch a pitifull ſight to all the people, that they could not finde in their hearts to behold it, but turned them ſelues another waye, becauſe they would not ſee it. But contrariwiſe, they ſay that their owne father had neuer his eye off them, neither did chaunge his auſtere and fierce countenance, with any pitie, or naturall affection towards them, but ſtedfaſtly did beholde the puniſhment of his owne children, vntill they were laied flat on the ground, and both their heads ſtriken off with an axe before him. When they were executed, Brutus roſe from the benche, and left the execution of the reſt vnto his fellow Conſull. This was ſuch an acte, as men cannot ſufficiently prayſe, nor reproue enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his minde ſo quiet, or elſe the greatneſſe of his miſerie that tooke away the feeling of his ſorowe: whereof neither the one nor the other was any ſmall matter, but paſſing the common nature of man, that hath in it both diuineneſſe, and ſomtime beaſtly brutiſhneſſe. But it is better the iudgement of men ſhould commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their iudgements ſhould diminiſh his vertue. For the ROMAINES holde opinion, it was not ſo great an acte done of Romulus firſt to build ROME: as it was for Brutus to recouer ROME, and the beſt liberty thereof, and to renew the auncient gouernment of the ſame. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without ſpeaking to ſee what was done. The Aquilians ſtraight grew bold, for that they ſawe the other Conſul Collatinus proceede gently, and mildely againſt them: and ſo made petition they might haue time giuen them to aunſwer to the articles they were accuſed of, and that they might haue their ſlaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their hands, becauſe there was no reaſon he ſhould remaine with their accuſers. The Conſull ſeemed willing to yeeld thereto, and was ready to breake vp the aſſembly therevpon. But Valerius ſaid, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the aſſembly that attended vpon his perſon) and ſtayed the people beſides for departing away, leaſt they ſhould negligently let thoſe eſcape that had ſo wickedly ſought to betray their countrie. Vntill he himſelfe had layed handes vpon them, calling vpon Brutus to aſſiſt him, with open exclamation againſt Collatinus, that he did not behaue himſelfe like a iuſt and true man, ſeeing his fellow Brutus was forced for iuſtice ſake to ſee his owne ſonnes put to death: and he in contrarie manner, to pleaſe a few women, ſought to let go manifeſt traitours, and open enemies to their countrie. The Conſull being offended herewith, commanded they ſhould bring away the bondman Vindicius. So the ſergeants making way through the preaſe, layde hands vpon him to bring him away with them, and began to ſtrike at them which offered to reſiſt them. But Valerius friends ſtept out before them, and put them by. The people ſhowted ſtraight, & cried out for Brutus: who with this noiſe returned againe into the market place, and after ſilence made him, he ſpake in this wiſe. For mine owne children, I alone haue bene their ſufficient iudge, to ſee them haue the law according to their deſeruings: the reſt I haue left freely to the iudgement of the people. Wherefore (ſaid he) if any man be diſpoſed to ſpeake, let him ſtand vp, and perſuade the people as he thinketh beſt. Then there needed no more words, but onely to hearken what the people cried: who with one voice and conſent condemned them, & cried execution, & accordingly they had their heads ſtriken off. Now was Conſull Collatinus long before had in ſome ſuſpition, as allied to the Kings, and diſliked for his ſurname, becauſe he was called Tarquinius: who perceiuing himſelfe in this caſe much hated and miſtruſted of the people, voluntarilye yeelded vp his Conſulſhip, and departed the citie. The people aſſembling then themſelues, to place a ſucceſſour in his roome: they choſe Valerius in his roome, without the contradiction of any, for his faithfull trauaile and diligence beſtowed in this great matter. Then Valerius iudging that Vindicius the bondman had well deſerued alſo ſome recompence, cauſed him not only to be manumiſſed by the whole graunt of the people, but made him a free man of the citie beſides: and he was the firſt bondman manumiſſed, that was made citizen of ROME, with permiſion alſo to giue his voice in all elections of officers, in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumiſſed, to giue their voices alſo in elections, as other citizens did: and vnto this day the perfect manumiſſing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free man. Theſe things thus paſſed ouer, the goods of the Kings were giuen to the ſpoile of the people, and their palaces were raced and ouerthrowne. Now amongſt other lands, the goodlieſt part of the field of Mars was belonging vnto king Tarquine: the ſame they conſecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, and not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The ſheaues being yet in ſhocks in the field, they thought they might not grinde the wheate, nor make any commoditie of the profit thereof: wherfore they threw both corne & ſheaues into the riuer, & trees alſo which they had hewen downe & rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, ſhould be left bare, without bearing any frute at all. Theſe ſheaues thus throwne into the riuer, were caried downe by the ſtreame not far from thence, vnto a forde and ſhallowe place of the water, where they firſt did ſtaye, and did let the other which came after, that it could go no further: there theſe heapes gathered together, and lay ſo cloſe one to another, that they began to ſincke and ſettle faſt in the water. Afterwards the ſtreame of the riuer brought downe continually ſuch mud and grauell, that it euer increaſed the heape of corne more and more in ſuch ſorte, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather ſoftly preſſing and driuing it together, did firme and harden it, and made it growe ſo to land. Thus this heape riſing ſtill in greatneſſe and firmneſſe, by reaſon that all that came downe the riuer ſtaied there, it grewe in the end, and by time to ſpred ſo farre, that at this day it is called the holy Iland in ROME: in which are many goodly temples of diuerſe gods, and ſundry walkes about it, and they call it in Latine, Inter duos pontes: in our tongue, betweene the two bridges. Yet ſome write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was conſecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwards, when one of the Veſtall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquines field. For which liberalitie and bountie of hers, they did graunt her in recompence many priuiledges, and did her great honour beſides.. As amongſt others, it was ordained, that her word and witneſſe ſhould ſtand good, and be allowed, in matters iudiciall: which priuiledge, neuer woman beſides her ſelf did enioy. By ſpecial grace of the people alſo, it was granted her, that ſhe might mary if ſhe thought it good: but yet ſhe would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the report how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being paſt hope of euer entring into his kingdome againe, went yet vnto the THVSCANS for ſuccour, which were very glad of him: and ſo they leauied a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his kingdome againe. The Conſuls alſo hearing thereof, went out with their armie againſt him. Both the armies preſented themſelues in battell raye, one againſt another, in the holy places conſecrated to the gods: whereof the one was called the wood Arſia, and the other the meadowe Æſuuia And as both armies began to giue charge vpon each other, Arnus the eldeſt ſonne of king Tarquine, and the Conſull Brutus encountered together, not by chance, but ſought for of ſet purpoſe to execute the deadly fode and malice they did beare each other. The one, as againſt a tyraunt and enemie of the libertie of his countrie: the other, as againſt him that had bene chiefe authour and worker of their exile and expulſion. So they ſet ſpurres to their horſes, ſo ſoone as they had ſpyed each other, with more furie then reaſon, and fought ſo deſperately together, that they both fell ſtarke dead to the ground. The firſt onſet of the battell being ſo cruell, the end thereof was no leſſe bloudie: vntill both the armies hauing receiued and done like damage to each other, were parted by a maruellous great tempeſt that fell vpon them. Now was Valerius maruelouſly perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wanne the field that day: ſeeing his ſouldiers as ſorowfull for the great loſſe of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the ſlaughter and victorie of their enemies. For, to viewe the multitude of the ſlaine bodies of either ſide, the number was ſo equall in ſight, that it was very hard to iudge, of which ſide fell out the greateſt ſlaughter: ſo that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were perſwaded in their opinion, that they had rather loſt then wun, coniecturing a farre off the fall of their enemies. The night being come, ſuch things fell out, as may be looked for after ſo terrible a battell For when both campes were all laied to reſt, they ſay the wood wherein they lay incamped, quaked and trembled: and they heard a voyce ſay, that onely one man more was ſlaine on the THSCANS ſide, than on the ROMAINES part. Out of doubt this was ſome voice from heauen: for the ROMAINES thereupon gaue a ſhrill ſhout, as thoſe whoſe hearts receiued a new quickening ſpirit or courage. The THVSCANS on the contrarie part were ſo afraide, that the moſt part of them ſtole out of the campe, and ſcattered here and there: and there remained behinde about the number of fiue thouſand men, whom the ROMAINES tooke priſoners euery one, & had the ſpoile of their campe. The carkaſſes were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were ſlaine in that battell, eleuen thouſand and three hundred of the THVSCANS: and of the ROMAINES, ſo many ſauing one. This battell was fought (as they ſay) the laſt day of Februarie, and the Conſull Valerius triumphed, being the firſt of the Conſuls that euer entered into ROME triumphing vpon a chariot drawne with foure horſes; which ſight the people found honorable and goodly to behold, and were not offended withall (as ſome ſeeme to report) nor yet did enuie him for that he began it. For if it had bin ſo, that cuſtome had not bin followed with ſo good acceptation, nor had continued ſo many yeares as it did afterwards. They much commended alſo the honor he did to his fellow Conſul Brutus, in ſetting out his funerals and obſequies, at the which he made a funerall oration in his praiſe. They did ſo like and pleaſe the ROMAINES, that they haue euer ſince continued that cuſtome at the buriall of any noble man, or great perſonage, that he is openly praiſed at his buriall, by the worthieſt man that liueth among them. They report this funerall oration is far more ancient then the firſt, that was made in GRECE in the like caſe: vnleſſe they will confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praiſing the dead at their funerals, was firſt of all inſtituted by Solon. But they did moſt enuie Valerius, and beare him grudge, becauſe Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their liberty) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twiſe, that they ſhould appoint Valerius fellow conſul with him. This man in contrariwiſe (ſaid the people) taking vpon him alone the rule and ſoueraignty, ſheweth plainly he wil not be Brutus ſucceſſour in his Conſulſhip, but Tarquinius ſelf in the kingdom. For to great purpoſe was it to praiſe Brutus in words, and to follow Tarquinius in deeds: hauing borne before him ſelfe only all the maſes, the axes and the rods, when he commeth abroade out of his owne houſe, which is far greater, & more ſtately, then the kings palace which he himſelfe ouerthrew. And to ſay truly, Valerius dwelt in a houſe a little too ſumptuouſly built and ſeated, vpon the hanging of the hill called mount Velia: & becauſe it ſtood high, it ouerlooked all the market place, ſo that any man might eaſily ſee from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very ill to come to it: but when he came out of his houſe, it was a maruellous pompe and ſtate to ſee him come downe from ſo high a place, and with a traine after him, that caried the maieſtie of a Kings courte. But herein Valerius left a noble example, ſhewing how much it importeth a noble man and magiſtrate, ruling weighty cauſes, to haue his eares open to heare, and willingly to receiue free ſpeache in ſteed of flatteries, and plaine troth in place of lyes For, being enformed by ſome of his friends how the people miſliked and complained of it, he ſtood not in his owne conceit, neither was angry with them: but forthwith ſet a world of workmen vpon it, early in the morning before breake of day, and commanded them to pluck downe his houſe, and to race it to the ground. Inſomuch as the next day following, when the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, and ſaw this great ſodaine ruine, they much commended the noble acte and minde of Valerius, in doing that he did: but ſo were they angry, and ſory both, to ſee ſo faire and ſtatelie a built houſe (which was an ornament to the citie) ouerthrowne vpon a ſodaine. Much like in compariſon to a man, whom through ſpite and enuie they had vniuſtly put to death: and to ſee their chiefe magiſtrate alſo like a ſtranger and a vagabond, compelled to ſeeke his lodging in another mans houſe. For his friends receiued him into their houſes, vntill ſuch time as the people had giuen him a place, where they did build him a newe houſe, farre more orderly, and nothing ſo ſtately and curious as the firſt was, and it was in the ſame place, where the temple called Vicus Publicus ſtandeth at this day. Now becauſe he would not onely reforme reforme his perſon, but the office of his Conſulſhippe, and alſo would frame himſelfe to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before hee ſeemed vnto them to be fearefull, he put away the carying of the axes from the roddes, which the ſergeants vſed to beare before the Conſull. Moreouer when he came into the market place, where the people were aſſembled, he cauſed the roddes to be borne downewardes, as in token of reuerence of the ſoueraigne maieſtie of the people: which all the magiſtrates obſerue yet at this day. Now in all this humble ſhewe and lowlineſſe of his, hee did not ſo much imbaſe his dignitie and greatneſſe, which the common people thought him to haue at the firſt: as he did thereby cut off enuie from him, winning againe as much true authoritie, as in ſemblance hee would ſeeme to haue loſt. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to ſubmit them ſelues vnto him: inſomuch as vpon this occaſion he was ſurnamed Publicola, as much to ſay, as the people pleaſer. Which ſurname he kept euer after, and we from henceforth alſo writing the reſt of his life, will vſe no other name: for he was contented to ſuffer any man that would, to offer him ſelfe to aske the Conſulſhippe in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kinde of man they would ioyne fellowe Conſull with him, and fearing leaſt through enuie or ignorance, the party might thwart his purpoſe and meaning: employed his ſole power and authoritie whileſt he ruled alone, vpon high and noble attempts. For firſt of all he ſupplyed vp the number of Senatours that were greatly decayed, becauſe King Tarquine had put ſome of them to death not long before, and other alſo had bene lately ſlaine in the warres: in whoſe places he had choſen new Senatours, to the number of a hundred three ſcore and foure. After that, he made newe decrees and lawes, which greatly did aduance the authoritie of the people. The firſt lawe gaue libertie to all offenders, condemned by iudgement of the Conſuls, to appeale vnto the people. The ſecond, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould take vpon him the exerciſe of any office, vnleſſe he had come vnto it by the gift of the people. The third was, and all in fauour of the poore, that the poore citizens of ROME ſhould pay no more cuſtome, nor any impoſt whatſoeuer. This made euery man the more willing to giue himſelfe to ſome craft or occupation, when he ſawe his trauell ſhould not be taxed, nor taken from him. As for the law that he made againſt thoſe that diſobeyed the Conſuls, it was found to be ſo fauourable to the cōmunaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, than for the rich and great men. For the offenders and breakers of that law, were condemned to pay for a penaltie, the value of fiue oxen, and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, ten oboles, and of an oxe, a hundred oboles. For in thoſe dayes, the ROMAINES had no ſtore of coined money, otherwiſe, they lacked no ſheepe, nor other rother beaſts. Hereof it came, that to this day they call their riches or ſubſtance, Peculium, becauſe Pecus ſignifieth ſheepe and muttons. And in the olde time the ſtampe vpon their money was an oxe, a mutton, or a hogge: & ſome of them called their childrē Bubulci, which ſignifieth cowheards: others Caprarij, to ſay goateheards: and others Porcij, as you would ſay, ſwineheardes. Now though in all his other lawes, he was very fauourable and temperate toward the people: yet in that moderation, ſometimes he did ſet grieuous paines and puniſhments. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accuſation, that did aſpire to the kingdome, and he did ſet the murderer free of all puniſhment: ſo he brought forth manifeſt proofe, that the partie ſlaine, had practiſed to make himſelfe King. As being impoſſible a man ſhould pretend ſo great a matter, and no man ſhould find it: and contrariwiſe being poſſible, albeit he were ſpyed, that otherwiſe he might attempt it, by making himſelfe ſo ſtrong, that he needed not paſſe for the law. In this caſe he gaue euery man libertie by ſuch act or meane, to preuent him if he could of diſcretion: who by ſtrength otherwiſe ſought to aſpire to reigne. They greatly commended him alſo for the law that he made touching the treaſure. For being very neceſſarie that euery priuate citizen ſhould according to his abilitie, bee contributer to the charges and maintenance of the warres: he him ſelfe would neither take ſuch collection into his charge, nor ſuffer any man of his to meddle with the ſame, nor yet that it ſhould be laide in any priuate mans houſe, but he did ordeine that Saturnes temple ſhould be the treaſurie thereof. This order they keepe to this preſent day. Furthermore, he graunted the people to chuſe two young men Quæſtores of the ſame, as you would ſay the treaſurers, to take the charge of this money:

and the two firſt which were choſen, were Publius Veturius, and Marcus Minutius, who gathered great ſummes of money together. For numbring the people by the polle, there were found a hundred and thirtie thouſande perſons which had payde ſubſidie, not reckoning in this account, orphans, nor widowes, which were excepted from all payments. After he had eſtabliſhed all theſe things, he cauſed Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be choſen fellowe Conſull with him, vnto whom, for that he was his auncient, hee gaue the vpper hande, and commaunded they ſhould carrie before him the roddes, which were the ſignes of the chiefe magiſtrate: and euer ſince they haue giuen this honour vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they choſe againe in his place Marcus Horatius, who helde out the Conſulſhippe with Publicola the reſt of the yeare. Nowe about that time King Tarquine remained in the countrie of THVSCANE, where he prepared a ſeconde armie againſt the ROMAINES, and there fell out a maruellous ſtraunge thing thereupon. For when hee raigned king of ROME, he had almoſt made an ende of the building of the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receiued, or vpon any fantaſie it is not knowen) to ſet vp a couch of earth baked by a potter, in the higheſt place of the temple, and hee put it out to be done by certaine THVSCAN workemen of the citie of VEIES: but whileſt they were in hand with the worke, he was driuen out of his Realme. When the workemen had formed this couch, and that they had put it into the furnace to bake it, it fell out contrarie to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worke put into the furnace. For the earth did not ſhut and cloſe together in the fire, nor dryed vp all the moiſture thereof: but rather to the contrarie it did ſwell to ſuch a bigneſſe, and grew ſo hard and ſtrong withall, that they were driuen to breake vp the head and walles of the furnace to get it out. The ſoothſayers did expound this, that it was a celeſtiall token from aboue, and promiſed great proſperitie and increaſe of power vnto thoſe, that ſhould enioy this couch. Whereuppon the VEIANS reſolued not to deliuer it vnto the ROMAINES that demaunded it, but aunſwered that it did belong vnto King Tarquine, and not vnto thoſe that had baniſhed him. Not manie dayes after, there was a ſolemne feaſt of games for running of horſes in the citie of VEIES, where they did alſo many other notable actes, worthy ſight according to their cuſtome. But after the game was playde, he that had wonne the bell, being crowned in token of victorie as they did vſe at that time, brought his couch & horſes faire and ſoftly out of the ſhew place: and ſodainely the horſe being affrayde vpon no preſent cauſe or occaſion ſeene, whether it was by chance, or by ſome ſecret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their couch to the citie of ROME. The couch driuer did what he could poſſible at the firſt to ſtay them, by holding in the raynes, by clapping them on the backes, and ſpeaking gently to them: but in the ende, perceiuing he could doe no good, and that they would haue their ſwinge, he gaue place to their furie, and they neuer linne running, till they brought him neere to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrewe him and his couch, not farre from the gate called at this preſent, Ratumena. The VEIANS wondering much at this matter, and being affrayde withall: were contented the workmē ſhould deliuer their couch made of earth vnto the ROMAINES. Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquine the firſt (which was the ſonne of Demaratus) vowed in the warres that he made againſt the SABYNES, that he would build it. And Tarquine the proude, being the ſonne of him that made this vowe did build it: howbeit he did not conſecrate it, becauſe he was driuen out of his Kingdome before hee had finiſhed it. When this temple was built and throughly finiſhed, and ſet forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was maruellouſly deſirous to haue the honour of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glorie, being very angrie that he could not content him ſelfe with all thoſe honours that he had receiued in peace, for the good lawes he had made, & in warres for the victories he had obteined and well deſerued, but further that he would ſeeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing did pertaine vnto him: they then did egge Horatius, and perſwaded him to make ſute for the ſame. Occaſion fell out at that time, that Publicola muſt haue the leading of the ROMAINES armie into the fielde: in the meane time, while Publicola was abſent, it was procured that the people gaue their voyces to Horatius, to conſecrate the temple, knowing they could not ſo well haue brought it to paſſe he being preſent. Other ſay, the Conſuls drewe lots betweene them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to leade the armie againſt his will, and vpon Horatius to conſecrate this temple, which may be coniectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication thereof. For all the people being aſſembled together in the Capitoll with great ſilence, on the fifteenth day of the moneth of September, which is about the new moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius hauing done all the ceremonies needefull in ſuch a caſe, and holding then the doores of the temple, as the vſe was euen to vtter the ſolemne wordes of dedication: Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, hauing ſtoode a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunitie to ſpeake, beganne to ſay a lowde in this wiſe. My lorde Conſull, your ſonne is dead of a ſickeneſſe in the Campe. This made all the aſſembly ſorie to heare it, but it nothing amaſed Horatius, who ſpake onely thus much. Caſt his bodie then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to ende his conſecration. This was but a deuiſe and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, onely to make Horatius leaue off his conſecration. Horatius in this ſhewed him ſelfe a maruellous reſolute man, were it that hee ſtreight found his deuiſe, or that he beleeued it to be true: for the ſodaineneſſe of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in conſecrating of the ſecond temple. For this firſt which Tarquine had built and Horatius conſecrated, was conſumed by fire in the ciuill wars: and the ſecond was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus ſet vp the ſuperſcription of the dedication, becauſe Sylla died before he could dedicate it. The ſecond temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumultes which were at ROME, vnder Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Veſpaſian, from the ground to the toppe. But this good happe he had aboue other: to ſee his worke perfected and finiſhed before his death, & not ouerthrowen as it was immediatly after his death. Wherein he did farre paſſe the happineſſe of Sylla, who dyed before he could dedicate that he had built: and the other deceaſed before hee ſawe his worke ouerthrowen. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the onely foundations of the firſt temple, coſt Tarquinius fortie thouſand Pondos of ſiluer. And to gilde onely the temple which we ſee now in our time, they ſay all the goods and ſubſtance that the richeſt citizen of ROME then had, will come nothing neere vnto it: for it coſt aboue twelue thouſand talents. The pillers of this temple are cut out of a quarrie of marble, called pentlike marble, and they were ſquared parpine, as thicke as long: theſe I ſaw at ATHENS. But afterwardes they were cut againe, and poliſhed in ROME, by which doing they got not ſo much grace, as they loſt proportion: for they were made too ſlender, and left naked of their firſt beautie. Now he that would wonder at the ſtately building of the Capitoll, if he came afterwardes vnto the palace Domitian, and did but ſee ſome galerie, porch, hall, or hotte houſe, or his concubines chambers: he would ſay (in my opinion) as the Poet Epicharmus ſayd of a prodigall man.

How much was ſpent in building the Capitoll.

It is a fault, and folly both in thee
to laſh out giftes, and prodigall rewardes: For fond delights, without all rule that be,
regarding not what happens afterwardes.

So might they iuſtly ſay of Domitian. Thou art not liberall, nor deuout vnto the goddes: but it is a vice thou haſt to loue to build, and deſireſt (as they ſay of olde Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold, and precious ſtones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine after that great foughten battell wherein he loſt his ſonne (that was ſlaine by Brutus in fighting together hand to hande) went to the citie of CLVSIVM, vnto king Claras Porſena: the mightieſt prince that raigned at that time in all ITALIE, and was both noble & a courteous prince. Porſena promiſed him aide: and firſt of all he ſent to ROME to ſummone the citizens to receiue their King againe. But the ROMAINES refuſing the ſummones, he ſent forthwith an Herauld to proclaime open warres againſt them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwardes immediatly with a great armie. Publicola now being abſent, was choſen Conſull the ſecond time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to ROME, becauſe he would exceede king Porſena in greatneſſe of mind,

he began to build a citie called SIGLIVRIA, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre from ROME: and hauing walled it about to his maruellous charge, he ſent thither ſeuen hundred citizens to dwell there, to ſhew that he made litle account of this war. Howbeit Porſena at his comming did giue ſuch a luſtie aſſault to the mount Ianiculum, that they draue out the ſouldiers which kept the ſame: who flying towards ROME, were purſued ſo harde with the enemies, that with them they had entered the town, had not Publicola made a ſaly out to reſiſt them. Who began a hotte skirmiſh hard by the riuer of Tyber, & there ſought to haue ſtaied the enemies to follow any further: which being the greater nūber, did ouerlay the ROMAINES, and did hurt Publicola very ſore in this skirmiſh, ſo as he was caried away into the citie in his ſouldiers armes. And euen ſo was the other Conſull Lucretius hurt in like caſe: which ſo diſcouraged and frayed the ROMAINES, that they all tooke them to their legges, & fled towards the citie. The enemies purſued them at their heeles as far as the wodden bridge: ſo that the citie was in maruellous hazard of taking vpon the ſodaine. But Horatius Cocles, and Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefeſt noble young men of the citie, ſtood with them to the defence of the bridge, and made head againſt the enemie. This Horatius was ſurnamed Cocles (as much to ſay, as one eye) becauſe he had loſt one of them in the warres. Howbeit other writers ſay, it was becauſe of his flat noſe which was ſo ſuncke into his head, that they ſaw nothing to part his eyes, but that the eye browes did meete together: by reaſon whereof the people thinking to ſurname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they ſay) Cocles. But howſoeuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to ſhew his face againſt the enemy, and to keepe the bridge, vntil ſuch time as they had cut & broken it vp behind him. When he ſaw they had done that, armed as he was, & hurt in the hippe with a pike of the THVSCANS, he leaped into the riuer of Tyber, and ſaued himſelfe by ſwimming vnto the other ſide. Publicola wondring at this manly act of his, perſwaded the ROMAINES ſtraight, euery one according to his abilitie, to giue him ſo much as he ſpent in a day, : & afterwards alſo he cauſed the common treaſurie to giue him as much lande as he could compaſſe about with his plow in a day. Furthermore he made his image of braſſe to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Now whileſt King Porſena was hottely bent, very ſtraightly to beſiege ROME, there begane a famine among the ROMAINES: and to encreaſe the danger, there came a new armie out of THVSCANE, which ouerranne, burnt, and made waſte, all the territorie of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being choſen Conſull, then the third time, thought he ſhould neede to doe no more to reſiſt Porſena brauely, but to be quiet only, and to looke well to the ſafe keeping of the citie. Howbeit ſpying his oportunitie, he ſecretly ſtole out of ROME with a power, and did ſet vpon the THVSCANS that deſtroyed the countrie about: and ouerthrew & ſlew of them, fiue thouſand men. As for the hiſtorie of Mutius, many do diuerſely report it: but I will write it in ſuch ſort, as I thinke ſhall beſt agree with the trueth. This Mutius was a worthie man in all reſpectes, but ſpecially for the warres. He deuiſing how he might come to kill King Porſena, diſguiſed himſelfe in THVSCANS apparell, and ſpeaking Thuſcan very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kinges chayre, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, hee durſt not aske which was he, leaſt he ſhould be diſcouered, but drew his ſworde at aduenture, and ſlew him whom he tooke to be King. Vpon that they layde holde on him, and examined him. And a panne full of fire being brought for the King that entended to doe ſacrifice vnto the goddes, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whileſt the fleſh of his hand did frye off, he neuer chaunged hewe nor countenance: the King wondering to ſee ſo ſtraunge a ſight, called to them to withdrawe the fire, and he himſelfe did deliuer him his ſword againe. Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they ſay afterwardes, he had giuen him the ſurname of Sceuola, as much to ſay, as left handed, and tolde him in taking of it. Thou couldeſt not Porſena for feare haue ouercomed me, but now through courteſie thou haſt wonne me. Therefore for good will I will reueale that vnto thee, which no force, nor extremitie could haue made mee vtter. There are three hundred ROMAINES diſperſed through thy campe, all which are prepared with like minds to followe that I haue begunne, only gaping for opportunitie to put it in practiſe.

How Mutius came by the name of Sceuola.

The lot fell on me to be the firſt to breake the Iſe of this enterpriſe: and yet I am not ſory my hand failed to kill ſo worthy a man, that deſerueth rather to be a friend then an enemy vnto the ROMAINES. Porſena hearing this, did beleeue it, and euer after he gaue the more willing eare to thoſe that treated with him of peace: not ſo much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in wait to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMAINES noble minde and great courage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scæuola: howbeit Athenodorus ſurnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octauia, Auguſtus ſiſter, ſaieth that he was alſo called Opſigonus. But Publicola taking king Porſena not to be ſo daungerous an enemy to ROME, as he ſhould be a profitable friend and allie to the ſame: let him vnderſtand that he was contented to make him iudge of the controuerſie between them & Tarquine. Whom he did many times prouoke to come and haue his cauſe heard before king Porſena, where he ſhould iuſtifie to his face, that he was the naughtieſt and moſt wicked man of the world, and that he was iuſtly driuen out of his countrey. Tarquine ſharpely anſwered, that he would make no man his iudge, and Porſena leaſt of all other, for that hauing promiſed him to put him again in his Kingdome, he was now gone from his word, and had changed his minde. Porſena was very angry with this aunſwer, iudging this a manifeſt token that his cauſe was ill. Wherefore Porſena being ſollicited againe by his owne ſonne Aruns, who loued the ROMAINES, did eaſily grant them peace vpon condition: that they ſhould redeliuer backe againe to him the lands they had gotten before within the country of THVSCAN, with the priſoners alſo which they had taken in this war, and in lieu thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the ROMAINS, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the ROMAINS deliuered him hoſtages, tenne of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of the city, and ſo many of their daughters: among which was Valeria, Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porſena brake his army, and withdrew his ſtrengh, truſting to the peace concluded. The ROMAINES daughters deliuered for hoſtages, came down to the riuers ſide to waſh them, in a quiet place where the ſtreame ran but gently, without any force or ſwiftnes at all. When they were there, and ſaw they had no guard about them, nor any came that way, nor yet any botes going vp nor downe the ſtreame: they had a deſire to ſwim ouer the riuer, which ran with a ſwift ſtreame, and was maruellous deepe. Some ſay, that one Clælia ſwam the riuer vpon her horſe backe, and that ſhee did imbolden and incorage the other to ſwim hard by her horſe ſide: and recouering the other bancke, and being paſt all daunger, they went and preſented them ſelues before Publicola the Conſul. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had plaid, but was maruellous ſory, fearing leaſt men would iudge him leſſe carefull to kepe his faith, then was king Porſena: and that he might ſuſpect the boldneſſe of theſe maidens, was but a crafty ſleight deuiſed of the ROMAINES. Therefore he tooke them all againe, and ſent them immediatly vnto King Porſena Whereof Tarquine hauing intelligence, he laide an ambuſh for them, that had the conduction of them. Who ſo ſoone as they were paſt the riuer, did ſhew them ſelues, & brake vppon the ROMAINES: they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very ſtoutly defend thē ſelues Now whileſt they were in earneſt fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and three of her fathers ſeruaunts, eſcaped through the middeſt of them, and ſaued them ſelues. The reſidue of the virgines remained in the middeſt among their ſwords, in great daunger of their liues. Aruns king Porſenas ſonne aduertiſed hereof, ranne thither incontinently to the reſcue: but when he came the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their iourney to redeliuer their hoſtages. Porſena ſeeing them againe, asked which of them it was that beganne firſt to paſſe the riuer, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clælia. He looked vpon her very earneſtly, and with a pleaſaunt countenaunce, and commaunded they ſhould bring him one of his beſt horſes in the ſtable, and the richeſt furniture he had for the ſame, and ſo he gaue it vnto her. Thoſe which hold opinion that none but Clælia paſſed the riuer a horſe backe, doe alledge this to proue their opinion true. Other doe deny it, ſaying that this THVSCAN king, did only honor her noble courage. Howſoeuer it was, they ſee her image a horſe backe in the holy ſtreete, as they goe to the pallace: and ſome ſay it is the ſtatue of Valeria, other of Clælia. After Porſena had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking vp his campe, he ſhewed his noble minde vnto them in many other things, and ſpecially in that he commaunded his ſouldiers they ſhould cary nothing but their armour and weapon onely, leauing his campe full of corne, victuals, and other kinde of goods. From whence this cuſtome came, that at this day when they make open ſale of any thing belonging to the common weale, the ſergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porſenas goods, and taken of thankefulneſſe and perpetuall memory of his bounty and liberality towardes them. Further, Porſenas image ſtandeth adioyning to the pallace where the Senate is vſed to be kept, which is made of great antique worke. Afterwardes the SABINES inuading the ROMAINES territory with a great force, Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then choſen Conſul, with one Poſthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all matters of waight and importaunce paſſed by Publicolaes counſell and authority, who was preſent at any thing that was done: and by whoſe means Marcus his brother wanne two great battells, in the laſt whereof he ſlew thirteene thouſand of his enemies not loſing one of his owne men. For which his victories, beſides the honour of triumphe he had, the people alſo at their owne charges, built him a houſe in the ſtreete of mount Palatine, and graunted him moreouer that his doore ſhould open outwardes into the ſtreete, where all other mens doores did open inwards into their houſe: ſignifying by grant of this honour and priuiledge, that he ſhould alwaies haue benefit by the common weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houſes in olde time, did all open outwards after that faſhion, and they doe coniecture it by the comedies that are played. Where thoſe that would goe out of their houſes; did firſt knocke at their doores, and make a noiſe within the houſe, leaſt in opening their doore vppon a ſodaine, they might ouerthrow or hurt him that taried at the ſtreete doore, or paſſed by the way: who hearing the noyſe, had warning ſtraight to auoide the daunger. The next yeare after that, Publicola was choſen Conſul the fourth time, becauſe they ſtoode in great doubt that the SABINES and LATINES would ioyne together to make warres vpon them: beſides all this, there was a certaine ſuperſtitious feare ranne through the city, of ſome ill happe toward it, becauſe moſt part of the women with childe were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking ſome one limme or other, and all of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in ſome of Sybillaes books, made priuat ſacrifice vnto Pluto, and did ſet vp againe ſome feaſts and ſolemne games that were left off, and had bene commaunded before time to be kept by the oracle of Apollo. Theſe meanes hauing a litle reioyced the city with good hope, becauſe they thought that the anger of the goddes had bene appeaſed: Publicola then began to prouide for the daungers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in all places, and made great preparation to inuade them. Now there was at that time amongſt the SABINES, a great rich man called Appius Clauſus, very ſtrong and actiue of body, and otherwiſe a man of great reputation and eloquence, aboue all the reſt of his countrey men: but notwithſtanding he was much inuied, & could not auoide it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to ſtay thoſe intended warres againſt the ROMAINES. Whereupon, many which before tooke occaſion to murmur againſt him, did now much more increaſe the ſame: with ſaying he ſought to maintaine the power of the ROMAINES, that afterwards by their aide he might make him ſelfe tyraunt and King of the countrey. The common people gaue eaſie eare vnto ſuch ſpeaches, and Appius perceiuing well enough how the ſouldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine and accuſe him. Wherfore being well backed and ſtood to by his kinſemen, friends, and followers, he practiſed to make a ſturre among the SABINES, which was the cauſe of ſtaying the warres againſt the ROMAINES. Publicolca alſo for his part was very diligent, not only to vnderſtand the originall cauſe of this ſedition, but to feed on further and encreaſe the ſame, hauing gotten men meete for the purpoſe, which caried Appius ſuch a meſſage from him. That Publicola knew very well he was a iuſt man, and one that would not be reuenged of his citizens to the generall hurt of his countrey, although the iniuries he receiued at their hands, deliuered him iuſt occaſion to doe it: neuertheleſſe if he had any deſire to prouide for his ſafety, and to repaire to ROME, leauing them which cauſeles wiſhed him ſo much euill, they would both openly and priuatly receiue him with that due honour which his vertue deſerued, and the worthineſſe of the ROMAINE people required. Clauſus hauing long and many times conſidered ſidered this matter with himſelf, reſolued that it was the beſt way he could take, making vertue of neceſſity; and therefore being determined to do it, he did procure his friends to do as he did, and they got other alſo vnto them, ſo that he brought away with him out of the countrey of the SABINES, fiue thouſand families with their wiues and children (of the quieteſt & moſt peaceable people among the SABINES) to dwell at ROME. Publicola being aduertiſed thereof before they came, did receiue them at their comming to ROME with great ioy, and all maner of good curteous entertainement. For at their firſt comming, he made them all and their families free citizens, and aſſigned vnto euery perſon of them two iugera of land, (which contained one acre, one roode, eleuen pole, and 69. parts of a pole) by the riuer of Tyber: and vnto Appius ſelfe he gaue 25. iugera (to wit, 16. acres and a halfe, 4. pole and 76. parts of a pole) and receiued him into the number of the Senatours. And thus came he firſt vnto the gouernment of the common weale in ROME, where he did ſo wiſely behaue himſelfe, that in the end he came to be the chiefeſt man of dignity and authority in ROME, ſo long as he liued. After his death, he left behind him the family of the Claudians, deſcending from him: which for honor, and worthines, gaue no place to the nobleſt family in ROME. But now the ſedition amongſt the SABINES being pacified, by the departure of thoſe that were gone to ROME: the ſeditious gouernors would not ſuffer thoſe that remained to liue in peace, but ſtill cried out, it were too much ſhame for them, that Clauſus being a fugitiue, and become an enemy, ſhould honor their enemies abroad, that being preſent durſt not ſhew ſo much at home, and that the ROMAINES ſhould eſcape vnreuenged, who had done them ſuch apparaunt wrongs. So they raiſed great force and power, and went and encamped with their army neare the city of FIDENES, and laid an ambuſh hard by ROME, in certaine hidden and hollow places, where they put a two thouſand choiſe footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to ſend certaine light horſemen to runne and pray to ROME gates: commaunding them, that when the ROMAINES came out of the city to charge them, they ſhould ſeeme leyſurely to retire, vntill they had drawen them within daunger of their ambuſh. Publicola receiuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traytour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priuy ambuſh, and ſo deuided his army in two parts: for he gaue his ſon in law Poſthumius Balbus, three thouſand foootemen, whom he ſent away by night, commaunding them the ſame night to take the hilles, in the bottome wherof the SABINES were laid in ambuſh. Lucretius, fellow Conſull with Publicola, hauing the lighteſt and luſtieſt men of the city, was appointed to make head againſt the vauncurriers of the SABINES that minded to approch the gates. And Publicola with the reſt of the army, marched a great compaſſe about to incloſe his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chaunce it was a thicke miſte, and at that preſent time Poſthumius comming downe from the hilles, with great ſhouts, charged them that lay in ambuſh. Lucretius on the other ſide, ſet vppon the light horſemen of the SABINES: and Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all ſides the SABINES enterpriſe had very ill ſucceſſe, for they had the worſt in euery place, & the ROMAINS killed them flying, without any turning again to make reſiſtance. Thus the place which gaue them hope of beſt ſafety, turned moſt to their deadly ouerthrow. For euery one of their companies ſuppoſing the other had bene whole and vnbroken, when a charge was giuen vpon them, did ſtraight breake, and neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemy. For they that were in the campe, ran toward them which lay in ambuſh: and thoſe which were in ambuſh on the contrary ſide, ran towards them that were in campe. So that in flying, the one met with the other, & found thoſe, towards whom they were flying to haue bene ſafe, to ſtand in as much neede of helpe as them ſelues. That which ſaued ſome that were not ſlaine, was the city of FIDENES, which was neare the campe, and ſpecially ſaued thoſe which fled thither. But ſuch as came ſhort of the city, and could not in time recouer it, were all ſlaine in the field, or taken priſoners. As for the glory of this honourable victory, albeit the ROMAINES were wont to aſcribe all ſuch great notable matters to the ſpeciall prouidence and grace of the goddes, yet at that time notwithſtanding, they did iudge that this happy ſucceſſe fell out by the wiſe foreſight and valiantneſſe of the captaine. For euery man that had ſerued in this iourney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had deliuered their enemies into their handes, lame, and blinde, and as a man might ſay, bound hand and feete to kill them at their pleaſure. The people were maruellouſly enriched by this victory, aſwell for the ſpoile, as for the raunſome of the priſoners that they had gotten. Now Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernment of the city to thoſe, which were choſen Conſuls for the yere following: died incontinently, hauing liued as honorably and vertuouſly all the daies of his life, as any man liuing might doe. The people then tooke order for his funerals, that the charges thereof ſhould be defrayed by the city, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life; and that they had bene ſtill debters vnto him for the noble ſeruice he had done vnto the ſtate and common weale whileſt he liued. Therfore towards his funerall charges, euery citizen gaue a peece of money called a Quatrine. The women alſo for their part to honour his funerals, agreed among them ſelues to mourne a whole yeare in blacke for him, which was a great and honourable memoriall. He was buried alſo by expreſſe order of the people, within the city, in the ſtreete called Velia; and they graunted priuiledge alſo vnto all his poſterity, to be buried in the ſelfe ſame place. Howbeit they doe no more bury any of his there. But when any die, they bring the corſe vnto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it vnder the place, and take it ſtraight away againe, to ſhew that they haue liberty to bury him there, but that they willingly refuſe this honour: and this done, they cary the corſe away againe.

Solon with Publicola.

NOW preſently to compare theſe two perſonages together, it ſeemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not found in any other of their liues which we haue written of before. And the ſame is, that the one hath bene a witnes, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the ſentence that Solon ſpake to king Cræſus, touching Tellus felicity and happines, might haue better bene applied vnto Publicola, then to Tellus: whom he iudged to be very happy, becauſe he died honourably, he had liued vertuouſly, and had left behinde him goodly children. And yet Solon ſpeaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his poems: neither did he euer beare any honorable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowme after his death. Whereas Publicola ſo long as he liued, was alwaies the chiefe man among the ROMAINS, of credit and authority: and afterwards ſince his death, certaine of the nobleſt families, and moſt auncient houſes of ROME, in theſe our daies, as the PVBLICOLES, the MESSALES, and the VALERIANS, for ſix hundred yeares continuance, doe referre the glory of the nobility and auncientry of their houſe vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was ſlain by his enemies, fighting valiantly liantly like a worthy honeſt man. But Publicola died after he had ſlaine his enemies: which is farre more great good hap, then to be ſlaine. For after he as generall had honourably ſerued his countrie in the wars, and had left them conquerers, hauing in his life time receiued all honours and triumphes due vnto his ſeruice: he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accompted and eſteemed, moſt happie and bleſſed. Alſo in wiſhing manner, he would his end ſhould be lamented to his praiſe, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuance of mans life, by ſaying:

Let not my death without lamenting paſſe,
but rather let my friends bewaile the ſame: VVhoſe grieuous teares, and cries of out alas,
may oft reſound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good hap, then moſt happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinſfolks, but the whole city alſo, and many a thouſand perſons beſides, did bitterly bewaile the loſſe of him. For all the women of ROME did mourne for him in black, and did moſt pitifully lament his death, as euery one of thē had loſt either father, brother or husband.

True it is, that I couet goods to haue:
but yet ſo got as may me not depraue.

Solon ſaieth this, becauſe vengeance followed ill gotten goods. And Publicola tooke great heed, not onely to get his goods moſt iuſtly, but had regarde that thoſe which he had, he ſpent moſt honeſtly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was iuſtly reputed the wiſeſt man, we muſt needs confeſſe alſo that Publicola was the happieſt. For what the one deſired for the greateſt and moſt perfect good, a man can haue in this world: the other hath wunne it, kept it, and vſed it all his life time, vntill the hower of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done like vnto Solon, ſhewing himſelfe a perfect example and looking glaſſe, where men may ſee how to gouerne a popular ſtate: when he made his Conſulſhip voide of all pride and ſtately ſhew, and became himſelfe affable, courteous, and beloued of euerie body. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes. As when he ordained, that the people only ſhould haue authoritie to chooſe and create all common officers and magiſtrates, and that they might appeale from any iudge to the people: as Solon when he ſuffered them to appeale vnto the iudges of the people. In deed Publicola did not create any new Senate, as Solon did: but he did augment the firſt number, with as many perſons almoſt as there were before. He did alſo firſt erect the office of Quæſtores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Becauſe the chiefeſt magiſtrate, if he were an honeſt man, ſhould not for ſo light an occaſion be taken, from the care of better and more waightie affaires: and if he were wickedly giuen and ill diſpoſed, that he ſhould haue no ſuch meane or occaſion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treaſure of the citie in his hands, and to command what he liſt. Moreouer in hating the tyrantes, Publicola therein was farre more ſharpe and terrible. For Solon in his lawes puniſhed him that went about to make himſelfe a tyrant, yet after he was conuicted thereof by lawe: but Publicola ordained that they ſhould kill him, before the lawe did paſſe on him, that ſought to be King. And where Solon iuſtly and truly vaunteth himſelfe, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole conſent of the citizens: yet he did notwithſtanding refuſe it. This vaunte and glorie is as due vnto Publicola: who finding the dignitie of a Conſull tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauourable for the people, not taking vpon him all the authoritie he might lawfully haue done. And it ſeemeth that Solon knew before him, what was the true and direct way to gouerne a common weale vprightly. For he ſaieth in one place:

Publicola erected the office of Quæſtores.

Both great and ſmall of power, the better will obaye:
if we too litle or too much, vpon them do not lay.

The diſcharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie. For litle preuaileth lawe to make equalitie among citizens, when debts do hinder the poore people to enioy the benefit thereof. And where it ſeemeth that they haue moſt libertie, as in that they may be choſen iudges and officers, to ſpeake their opinion in the counſell, and giue their voices alſo: there in deed are they moſt bound and ſubiect, becauſe they do but obaye the rich, in all they doe commaund. But yet in this acte there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted. That commonly diſcharging of debts, was wont to breed great tumults and ſeditions in common weales: And Solon hauing vſed it in a very good time (as the Phiſitian ventring a dangerous medecine) did appeaſe the ſedition already begun, and did vtterly quenche through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wiſdome and vertue, all the infamie and accuſation that might haue growne of that acte. As for their firſt entrie into the gouernment, Solons beginning was farre more noble. For he went before, and followed not another: and himſelfe alone without any others helpe, did put in execution the beſt, and more part of all his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes end and death much more glorious and happie. For Solon before he dyed, ſaw all his commonwealth ouerthrowne: but Publicolaes commonweale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broile of ciuill warres began againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wodden tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his way immediatly out of the citie of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in ROME gouerning the ſtate, did throughly ſtabliſh and confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon hauing wiſely foreſeene Piſiſtratus practiſes, aſpiring to make him ſelfe King: he could neuer let him for all that, but was himſelfe ouercome and oppreſſed with the tyranny he ſaw ſtabliſhed in his owne ſight, and in deſpight of him. Where Publicola ouerthrew and did put downe a mightie Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly ſtabliſhed: his vertue and deſire being equall with Solons, and hauing had beſides fortune fauourable, and ſufficient power to execute his vertuous and well diſpoſed minde. But as for warres and marſhall deedes, there is no compariſon to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plataian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS vnto Solon, as we haue written it: where Publicola being generall of an army, and fighting himſelfe in perſon, hath wonne many great battels. And as for matters of peace and ciuill gouernment, Solon neuer durſt preſent himſelfe openly to perſuade the enterpriſe of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfait madneſſe, and as a foole to make ſport. Where Publicola taking his aduenture from the beginning, ſhewed himſelfe without diſſimulation, an open enemie to Tarquine, and afterwards he reuealed all the whole conſpiracie. And when he had bene the only cauſe and author of puniſhing the traitours, he did not only driue out of ROME the tyrants ſelues in perſon, but tooke from them alſo all hope of returne againe. Who hauing alwaies thus nobly and valiantly behaued himſelfe, without ſhrinking back, or flying from ought that required force, a manly courage, or open reſiſtance: did yet ſhew himſelfe diſcreet, where wiſdome was requiſite, or reaſon and perſwaſion needfull. As when he cunningly wanne king Porſena, who was a dreadfull enemie vnto him, and inuincible by force: whom he handled in ſuch good ſort, that he made him his friend. Peraduenture ſome might ſtand in this and ſay: that Solon recouered the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, which they would haue loſt. Publicola to the contrary, reſtored the lands vnto Porſena againe, which the ROMAINES had conquered before, within the countrie of THVSCAN. But the times in which theſe things were done, are alwaies to be conſidered of. For a wiſe gouernour of a Realme, and politick man, doth gouerne diuerſely according to the occaſions offred, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale. And many times, in letting go one thing, he ſaueth the whole: and in loſing a litle, he gaineth much. As Publicola did, who loſing a litle peece of another mans countrie, which they had vſurped, ſaued by that meanes all that was aſſuredly his owne. And wheras the ROMAINES thought he ſhould do very much for them, to ſaue their citie onely, he got them moreouer, all the goods that were in their enemies campe, which did beſiege them. And in making his enemie iudge of his quarrell, he wanne the victorie: winning that moreouer, which he would gladly haue giuen to haue ouercome, and haue ſentence paſſe on his ſide. For the king their enemy did not only make peace with them, but did alſo leaue them all his furniture, prouiſion, and munition for the warres: euen for the vertue, manhood, and iuſtice, which the great wiſedome of this Conſull perſwaded Porſena to beleeue to be in all the other ROMAINES.

Themiſtocles.

ΑΘΗΝΑΙΟΣ
ΘΕΜΙΣΤΟΚΛΗΣ

THEMISTOCLES parentage did litle aduaunce his glorie: for his father Neocles was of ſmall reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, & tribe of Leontis: of his mother an allien or ſtranger: as theſe verſes do witneſſe,

Abrotonon I am, yborne in Thracia, and yet this high good hap I haue, that into Grecia:
I haue brought forth a ſonne, Themiſtocles by name,
the glory of the Greekish blouds, and man of greateſt fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the countrie of CARIA: and they do not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpé. And Neanthes ſaieth furthermore, that ſhe was of HALICARNASSVS, the chiefeſt citie of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cauſe when the ſtrangers did aſſemble at Cynoſargos (a place of exerciſe without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themiſtocles perſuaded diuers youthes of the moſt honorable houſes, to go downe with him, and to annoint themſelues at Cynoſargos, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right & alien ſort. But ſetting a part all theſe circumſtances, he was no doubt allied vnto the houſe of the Lycomedians: for Themiſtocles cauſed the chappell of this family, which is in the village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built vp againe at his owne charges: and as Simonides ſaieth, he did ſet it forth and enriche it with pictures. Moreouer euery man doth confeſſe it, that euen from his childhood they did perceiue he was giuen to be very whote headed, ſturring, wiſe, and of good ſpirite, and enterpriſing of him ſelfe to do great things, and borne to rule weighty cauſes. For at ſuch dayes and howers as he was taken from his booke, and had leaue to play, he neuer plaied, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they alwayes found him conning ſome oration without booke, or making it alone by himſelfe, and the ground of his matter was euer commonly, either to defend, or accuſe ſome of his companions. Wherupon his ſchoolemaiſter obſeruing him, oft ſaid vnto him: ſure ſome great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boy, for it cannot be choſen but that one day thou ſhalt do ſome notable good thing, or ſome extreame miſchieſe. Therefore when they went about to teache him any thing, only to checke his nature, or to faſhion him with good maner and ciuilitie, or to ſtudy any matter for pleaſure or honeſt paſtime: he would ſlowly and careleſlie learne of them. But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning ſtate: they ſawe he would beate at it maruellouſly, and would vnderſtand more then any could of his age and cariage, truſting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cauſe, that being mocked afterwards by ſome that had ſtudied humanitie, and other liberall ſciences, he was driuen for reuenge and his owne defence, to aunſwer with great and ſtoute words, ſaying, that in deed he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a viol, nor to play of a pſalterion: but if they did put a citie into his hands that was of ſmall name, weake, and litle, he knew wayes enough how to make it noble, ſtrong, and great. Neuertheleſſe, Steſimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras ſchoole, and that vnder Meliſſus he ſtudied naturall Philoſophie. But herein he was greatly deceaued, for that he tooke no great heed vnto the time. For Meliſſus was captaine of the SAMIANS againſt Pericles, at what time he did lay ſiege vnto the citie of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themiſtocles, & Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne houſe. Therefore we haue better reaſon and occaſion to beleeue thoſe that write, Themiſtocles did determine to follow Mneſiphilus Phrearian. For he was no profeſſed Orator, nor naturall Philoſopher, as they termed it in that time: but made profeſſion of that which then they called wiſedome. Which was no other thing, but a certaine knowledge to handle great cauſes, and an indeuour to haue a good wit and iudgement in matters of ſtate and gouernement: which profeſſion beginning in Solon, did continue, and was taken vp from man to man, as a ſecte of Philoſophie. But thoſe that came ſithence, haue mingled it with arte of ſpeache, and by litle and litle haue tranſlated the exerciſe of deeds, vnto bare and curious wordes: whereupon they were called Sophiſters, as who would ſay, counterfaite wiſe men. Notwithſtanding, when Themiſtocles began to medle with the gouernment of the common weale, he followed much Mneſiphilus. In the firſt part of his youth, his behauiour and doings were very light and vnconſtant, as one caried away with a raſh head, and without any order or diſcretion: by reaſon whereof his manners and conditions ſeemed maruellouſly to change, and oftimes fell into very ill fauored euents, as himſelfe did afterwards confeſſe by ſaying: that a ragged colt oft times prooues a good horſe, ſpecially if he be well ridden, and broken as he ſhould be. Other tales which ſome will ſeeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As that his father did diſinherite him, and that his mother for very care and ſorow ſhe tooke to ſee the lewde life of her ſonne, did kill her ſelfe. For there are that write to the contrarie, that his father being deſirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, did go and ſhewe him all alongſt the ſea ſhore, the ſhipwracks and ribbes of old gallyes caſt here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and ſaid to him: thus the people vſe their gouernours, when they can ſerue no longer. Howſoeuer it was, it is moſt true that Themiſtocles earneſtly gaue himſelfe to ſtate, and was ſuddenly taken with deſire of glory. For euen at his firſt entry, becauſe he would ſet foote before the proudeſt, he ſtood at pike againſt the greateſt and mightieſt perſons, that bare the ſway and gouernment, and ſpecially againſt Ariſtides, Lyſimachus ſonne, who euer encountered him, and was ſtill his aduerſarie oppoſite. Yet it ſeemeth the euill will he conceiued toward him, came of a very light cauſe. For they both loued Steſilaus, that was borne in the citie of TIOS, as Ariſton the Philoſopher writeth. And after this iealouſie was kindled betweene them, they alwaies tooke contrarie part one againſt another, not onely in their priuate likings, but alſo in the gouernment of the commonweale. Yet I am perſuaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions, did much encreaſe the grudge and diſcorde betwixt them. For Ariſtides being by nature a very good man, a iuſt dealer, and honeſt of life, & one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor ſerue his owne glorie, but rather to the contrary, would do, would ſay, and counſell alwaies for the moſt benefit & commodity of the commonweale: was oft times enforced to reſiſt Themiſtocles, & diſappoint his ambition, being euer buſily mouing the people, to take ſome new matter in hand. For they reporte of him, that he was ſo inflamed with deſire of glory, & to enterpriſe great matters, that being but a very young man at the battel of Marathon where there was no talke but of the worthines of captaine Miltiades that had wonne the battell: he was found many times ſolitarily there alone deuiſing with himſelf: beſides, they ſay he could then take no reſt in the night, neither would go to playes in the day time, nor would keepe cōpany with thoſe whom he was accuſtomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that wondred to ſee him ſo in his muſes, & changed, and asked him what he ayled that Miltiades victory would not let him ſleepe, becauſe other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would haue made an end of all wars. Howbeit Themiſtocles was of a contrary opinion, & that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daily ſtudied how to preuent them, and how to ſee to the ſafetie of GRECE, and before occaſion offered, he did exerciſe his citie in feates of warre, foreſeeing what ſhould folow after. Wherfore, where the citizens of ATHENS before did vſe to deuide among themſelues the reuenue of their mines of ſiluer, which were in a part of ATTICA called LAVRION: he alone was the firſt that durſt ſpeake to the people, & perſwade them, that frō thenceforth they ſhould ceaſe that diſtribution among themſelues, & employ the money of the ſame in making of gallyes, to make wars againſt the ÆGYNETES. For their warres of all GRECE were moſt cruell, becauſe they were lords of the ſea, & had ſo great a number of ſhips. This perſwaſion drue the citizens more eaſily to Themiſtocles mind, than the threatning thē with King Darius, or the Perſians would haue done: who were farre from them, and not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this oportunitie taken of the hatred & ielouſie between the ATHENIANS and the ÆGINETES, made the people to agree, of the ſaid money to make an hundred gallies, with which they fought againſt king Xerxes, and did ouercome him by ſea. Now after this good beginning & ſucceſſe, he wan the citizēs by degrees to bend their force to ſea, declaring vnto them, how by land they were ſcant able to make head againſt their equals, whereas by their power at ſea, they ſhould not only defend thēſelues from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to command all GRECE. Hereupon he made them good mariners, & paſſing ſea men, as Plato ſayth, where before they were ſtout and valiant ſouldiers by land. This gaue his enemies occaſion to caſt it in his teeth afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, and had brought them to the banke & the ower: and ſo he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inueyed againſt him in that, as Steſimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his wil, by bringing this ſea ſeruice to paſſe, whether therby he did ouerthrow the iuſtice of the cōmon weale or not, I leaue that to the philoſophers to diſpute. But that the preſeruation of all GRECE ſtood at that time vpon the ſea, & that the gallies only were the cauſe of ſetting vp ATHENS againe: Xerxes himſelfe is a ſufficient witnes, beſides other proofes that might be brought therof. For his armie by land being yet whole, & vnſet on, when he ſaw his armie by ſea broken, diſpearſed, & ſunke, he fled ſtraight vpon it, confeſſing as it were that he was now too weake to deale any more with the GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenāt in GRECE, of purpoſe in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS ſhould not follow him, then for any hope he had to ouercome them. Some write of Themiſtocles, that he was a very good husband for his owne profit, & carefull to looke to his things: for he did ſpend liberally, & loued oft to make ſacrifices, and honorably to receiue & entertaine ſtrangers: wherfore he had good reaſon to be carefull to get, to defray his charges. Other to the contrary, blame him much, that he was too neere, & miſerable: for ſome ſay, he wold ſel preſents of meat that were giuen him. He did aske one Philides on a time, which had a breed of mares, a colt of gift: who denying him flatly, he was ſo angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his houſe the horſe of wood, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him vnderſtand, that he would ſhortly ſet ſtrife & quarrell betwixt him, & his neareſt kinſmen & familiar friends. It is true that he was the moſt ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a yong man, and ſcantly knowen, he earneſtly intreated one Epicles borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at that time the cunningeſt man in all ATHENS at that inſtrument, that he would come and teach his art at his houſe: and all was no more, but that many people being deſirous to heare him play, ſhold aske for his houſe & come thither to him. And one yeare when he went vnto the feaſt & aſſembly of the playes Olympicall, he would needes keepe open houſe for all commers, haue his tents richly furniſhed, and a great traine of ſeruants and all other furniture, only to contend with Cimon. This maruellouſly ſpighted the Grecians, who thought Themiſtocles expences fit for Cimons countenance, and abilitie, becauſe he was a young gentleman, and of a noble houſe: but for him that was but a new come man, & would beare a greater port, then either became his calling or abilitie, they thought it not onely vnallowable in him, but meere preſumption and vaine glorie. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedie which was playd openly: and being ſet out therein to haue won the priſe, and the Athenians being maruellous deſirous of the honour in ſuch playes, he cauſed this victorie of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate and ſet vp in a temple, with this inſcription. Themiſtocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynicus made it: Adimantus was chiefe ruler. Yet notwithſtanding he was well taken of the common people, partly becauſe he would ſpeake to euery citizen by his name, no man telling him their names: and partly alſo becauſe he ſhewed himſelfe an vpright iudge in priuate mens cauſes. As one day he aunſwered the Poet Simonides, borne in Chio, who did requeſt an vnreaſonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernor of the citie. Thou couldeſt be no good Poet, Simonides, if thou diddeſt ſing againſt the rules of muſicke: neither my ſelf a good gouernour of a citie, if I ſhould do any thing againſt the law. And mocking the ſame Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to ſpeake ill of the Corinthians, conſidering they were lords of ſo great & ſtrōg a city. Likewiſe he was not wiſe to make himſelf to be drawen, being ſo deformed & ill fauoured. But being growen in credite, and hauing won the fauour of the people, he was ſuch an enemie to Ariſtides, that in the end he made him to be expulſed and baniſhed Athens, for 5. yeres. When newes were brought that the king of Persia was onwards on his iourney & comming downe to make wars vpon the Grecians: the Athenians conſulted whom they ſhould make their generall. And it is reported, that all their cōmon counſellers which were wont to ſpeake in matters, fearing the daunger, did draw backe, ſaue an orator called Epicydes, Euphemides ſonne, very eloquent in ſpeech, but ſomewhat womaniſh, faint hearted and gredie of money, offred himſelfe to ſue for this charge, and had ſome hope to obtaine it. Wherefore Themiſtocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this man to be general of the armie, he bought out Epicydes ambitiō with ready money, & ſo made him let fall his ſute. It fell out Themiſtocles was greatly cōmended, about that was done to the interpreter, that came with the king of Persiaes ambaſſadours, & demanded the empire of the Grecians both by ſea & land, that they ſhould acknowledge obedience to the King. For he cauſed him to be taken, & put to death by a cōmon conſent, for vſing the Greeke tongue in the ſeruice & commandement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing alſo, that at his motion, Arthmius borne at Zelea, was noted of infamy, both he, his children, & all his poſteritie after him, becauſe he brought gold from the king of Persia, to corrupt & win the Grecians. But the greateſt & worthieſt act he did in thoſe parts, was this: that he pacified all ciuill wars among the Grecians, perſwading the cities to leaue off their quarrels vntill the wars were done, in the which they ſay Chileus Arcadian did helpe him more then any other man. He being now choſen generall of the Athenians, went about preſently to imbarke his citizens into gallyes, declaring to them they ſhould leaue their citie, and go meete with the barbarous King by ſea, ſo farre from the coaſt of Grece as they could: but the people did not thinke that good. Wherefore he led great numbers of ſouldiers by land, into the countrie of Tempes with the Lacedæmonians, to keepe the paſſage & entry into Thessaly, againſt the barbarous people, which countrie ſtood yet ſound to Grece, and not reuolted to the Medes. Afterwards the Grecians comming from thence without any act done, and the Thesalians alſo being won ſomewhat on the Kings ſide, for that all the whole countrie vnto Boeotia was at the deuotion & goodwill of the barbarous people: then the Athenians began to find, how Themiſtocles opinion to fight by ſea was very good. Whereupon they ſent him with their nauie to the citie of Artemisium, to keepe the ſtraight. There the other Grecians would haue had the Lacedæmonians and their admirall Eurybiades to haue had the authoritie & commandement of the reſt. But the Athenians would not ſet ſayle vnder any other admirall then their owne, becauſe theirs were the greateſt number of ſhips in the armie, and aboue all the other Grecians. Themiſtocles foreſeeing the danger that was likely to fall out amongſt themſelues, did willingly yeeld the whole authoritie vnto Eurybiades, & got the

ATHENIANS to agree vnto it: aſſuring them, that if they behaued thẽſelues valiantly in theſe wars, the other GRECIANS of their owne accord would afterwards ſubmit themſelues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the originall cauſe of the ſauing of GRECE, and did moſt aduance the honor & glory of the ATHENIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, and their friends & allyes with liberalitie. In the meane time, Eurybiades ſeeing the barbarous fleete riding at anker, all alongeſt the Ile of APHETES, with ſuch a great number of ſhips in the vaward, he began to be affraid. And vnderſtanding moreouer, there were other 200. ſayle that went to caſt about the Ile of SCIATHE, & ſo to come in: he preſently would haue retyred further into GRECE, & would haue drawen neerer vnto PELOPONNESVS, to the end their armie by ſea might be neere their army by land, as thinking it vnpoſſible to fight with king Xerxes power by ſea. Wherupon the inhabitants of the Ile of EVBOEA, fearing leaſt the GRECIANS would to the ſpoile of the enemy, they cauſed Themiſtocles ſecretly to be ſpoken withall, & ſent him a good ſũme of mony by one called Pelagõ. Themiſtocles tooke the mony, as Herodotus writeth, & gaue it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amõgſt the ATHENIANS, captain of the galley called the holy galley, that was much againſt Themiſtocles intended purpoſe: who hauing no money to pay his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with ſpeede from thence. Themiſtocles ſturred vp then his ſouldiers more againſt him then before, inſomuch as they went abord his galley, & tooke his ſupper frõ him. Architeles being maruellous angry & offẽded withal, Themiſtocles ſent him both bread & meat in a pannier, & in the bottome therof he had put a talent of ſiluer, bidding him for that night to ſup with that, & the next morning he ſhold prouide for his mariners, or els he would cõplaine, & accuſe him to the citizens that he had taken money of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbiã. Moreouer theſe firſt fights in the ſtraite of EVBOEA, between the GRECIANS, & the barbarous people, were nothing to purpoſe to end the wars betweene them. For it was but a taſte giuen vnto thẽ, which ſerued the GRECIANS turne very much, by making them to ſee by experience, & the manner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of ſhips, nor the pompe & ſumptuous ſetting out of the ſame, nor the proud barbarous ſhouts & ſongs of victorie that could ſtand them to purpoſe, againſt noble harts and valiant minded ſouldiers, that durſt grapple with them, and come to hands ſtrokes with their enemies: and that they ſhould make no reckoning of all that brauery & brags, but ſhould ſticke to it like men, and lay it on the iacks of them. The which (as it ſeemeth) the poet Pindarus vnderſtood very well, when he ſaid touching the battell of ARTEMISIVM.

vnto the libertie of Greece, by theſe aſſaults aſſayed.

For out of doubt the beginning of victorie, is to be hardie. This place ARTEMISIVM is a part of the Ile of EVBOEA, looking towards the North, aboue the citie of ESTIÆA, lying directly ouer againſt the country which ſomtimes was vnder the obedience of the PHILOCTETES, and ſpecially of the citie of OLIZON. There is a little temple of Diana, ſurnamed *Oriental*l, round about the which there are trees, and a compaſſe of pillers of white ſtone, which when a man rubbes with his hande, they ſhew of the colour and ſauour of ſaffrone. And in one of thoſe pillers there is an inſcription of lamentable verſes to this effect.

VVhen boldeſt blouds of Athens by their might had ouercome the numbers infinite of Aſia: they then in memorie, of all their deedes, and valiant victorie beganne to build, this noble monument and to Diane the ſame they did preſent, for that they had the Medes likewiſe ſubdued,
and with their bloud, their hardy hands embrued.

There is a place ſeene alſo vpon that coaſt at this day, a good way into the lande, in the middeſt whereof are great ſands full of blacke duſt as aſhes: and they thinke that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and olde ſhipwrackes. Newes being brought what had bene done in the countrie of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, and howe that Xerxes had won that entrie into GRECE by land: the GRECIANS then brought their whole army by ſea more into GRECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retire, as men whoſe hearts were lift vp with the glorie of their former valiant deedes. Now Themiſtocles paſſing by thoſe places where he knew the enemies muſt of neceſsitie fall vpon the lee ſhore for harborow: he did ingraue certaine wordes ſpoken vnto the IONIANS, in great letters in ſtone, which he found there by chaunce, or purpoſely brought thither for that purpoſe, where there was very good harbour for ſhips, and fit places alſo to lie in. Theſe were the words, that the IONIANS ſhould take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and auncesters, and ſuch as fought for their libertie: or at the leaſt they ſhould trouble the armie of the barbarous people, and do them all the miſchiefe they could, when the GRECIANS ſhould come to fight with them. By theſe wordes he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their part, or at the leaſt he ſhould make the barbarous people iealous & miſtruſtfull of them. Xerxes being already entred in the vppermoſt part of the prouince of DORICA, into the countrie of PHOCIDA, burning and deſtroying the townes and cities of the PHOCIANS: the other GRECIANS lay ſtill and ſuffered the inuaſion, notwithſtanding the ATHENIANS did requeſt them to meete with the barbarous armie in BOEOTIA, to ſaue the country of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they went by ſea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearken to it in no wiſe, & all was becauſe they were deſirous they ſhould draw to the ſtraite of PELOPONNESVS, & there they ſhould aſſemble the whole ſtrength & power of GRECE within the barre of the ſame, & make a ſtrong ſubſtantiall wall from the one ſea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this deuiſe, & were halfe diſcouraged & out of hart, to ſee themſelues thus forſaken & caſt off, by the reſt of the GRECIANS. For it was out of all ſpeech that they alone ſhould fight againſt ſo many thouſands of enemies: & therfore their only remedy was, to leaue their citie: and to get them to the ſea. The people were very vnwilling to liſten hereunto, making their reckoning it was needles to be carefull to ouercome, or to ſaue thẽſelues, hauing once forſaken the temples of their goddes, & the graues of their parents. Wherfore Themiſtocles ſeeing that neither reaſon, nor mans perſwaſion could bring the people to like his opinion: he began to frame a deuiſe (as men doe vſe ſometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with ſignes from heauen, with oracles & anſwers from the goddes. And the occaſion of Mineruaes dragon ſerued his turne for a celeſtial ſigne and token, which by good fortune did not appeare in thoſe daies in the temple as it was wont to do: & the prieſts found the ſacrifices which were daily offered to him, whole & vntouched by any. Wherefore being enformed by Themiſtocles what they ſhould doe, they ſpread a brute abroad amongeſt the people, that the goddeſſe Minerua, the protector and defendor of the citie, had forſaken it, pointing them the way vnto the ſea. And againe he wanne them by a prophecie, which commaunded them to ſaue themſelues in wals of wood: ſaying, that the walles of wood did ſignifie nothing els but ſhips. And for this cauſe he ſaid, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miſerable nor vnfortunate, becauſe it ſhould giue the name of a moſt happy victorie which the GRECIANS ſhould get there. And ſo at the laſt they following his counſell, he made this decree, that they ſhould leaue the citie of ATHENS to the cuſtodie of the goddeſſe pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country, & that all thoſe which were of age to carie any weapon ſhould get them to the gallyes: and for the reſt, that euery man ſhould ſee his wife, children, & bondmẽ placed in ſome ſure place as well as he could. After this decree was paſt & authoriſed by the people, the moſt part of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wiues and litle children, into the citie of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS receiued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they ſhould be entertained of the cõmon charge, allowing them a peece, two obulos of their money a day, and ſuffered the young children to gather frute wherſoeuer they found it: and furthermore did hire ſchoolemaſters at the charge of the cõmon wealth, to bring thẽ vp at ſchoole. He that was the penner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time, had no cõmon mony, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Ariſtotle ſayth) furniſhed euery ſouldier with eight drachmas, which was the onely meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craft deuiſed of Themiſtocles. The ATHENIANS being come downe vnto the hauen of PIRÆA, he made as though Pallas target (on the which Meduſaes head was grauen) had bene loſt, and was not found with the image of the goddeſſe: and faining to ſeeke for it, he ranſacked euery corner of the gallyes, and found a great deale of ſiluer which priuate perſons had hidden amongeſt their fardels. This money was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the ſouldiers that were ſhipped had wherewithall, to prouide them of neceſſarie things. When time came that they were to depart the hauen, and that all the city of ATHENS had taken ſea: one way it was a pitty to behold them. Another way it made all ſorts to wonder, that conſidered the boldneſſe and courage of thoſe men, which before ſent away their fathers and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at their teares, cries, ſhrikes, & imbracinges of their wiues, their children, and departures, but ſtoutly and reſolutely held on their courſe to SALAMINA. Notwithſtanding, there were many old citizens left ſtill of neceſſity in ATHENS, becauſe they could not be remoued for very extream age, which ſturred many with compaſſion toward them. There was beſides, a certaine pitty that made mens hearts to yerne, when they ſaw the poore doggs, beaſts, and cattell run vp and downe bleating, mowing, and howling out a loud, after their maſters, in token of ſorrow, when they did imbarke. Amongſt theſe, there goeth a ſtraunge tale of Xanthippus dog, who was Pericles father: which for ſorrow his maiſter had left him behinde him, did caſt him ſelfe after into the ſea, and ſwimming ſtill by the gallies ſide wherein his maſter was, hee held on to the Ile of SALAMINA, where ſo ſoone as the poore curre landed, his breath failed him, and died preſently. They ſay, at this day the place called the dogs graue, is the very place where he was buried. Theſe were ſtraunge acts of Themiſtocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS fory for the abſence of Ariſtides, & fearing leaſt of ſpite he taking part with the barbarous nation, might haue bene the ruine and deſtruction of the ſtate of GREECE, being baniſhed fiue yeares alſo before the wars by Themiſtocles procurement: that he did ſet forth a decree, that al thoſe which had bene baniſhed for a time, might returne home againe, to do, to ſay, and to giue counſel to the citizens in thoſe things, which they thought beſt for the preſeruation of GREECE. And alſo where Eurybiades being generall of the GRECIANS whole army by ſea, for the worthineſſe of the city of SPARTA, but otherwiſe a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any caſe depart from thence, & retire into the goulſe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by land aſſẽbled: that Themiſtocles withſtood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time alſo it was, that Themiſtocles made ſo notable anſwers, which ſpecially are noted and gathered together. For when Eurybiades ſaid one day vnto him. Themiſtocles, thoſe that at playes & games do riſe before the company, are whiſtled at. It is true, ſaid Themiſtocles: but thoſe that tary laſt ſo, do neuer win any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a ſtaffe in his hand lift it vp, as though he would haue ſtriken him. Strike and thou wilt, ſaid he, ſo thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wondring to ſee him ſo patient, ſuffered him then to ſay what he would. Then Themiſtocles began to bring him to reaſon: but one that ſtood by, ſaid vnto him. Themiſtocles, for a man that hath neither city nor houſe, it is an ill part to will others that haue, to forſake all. Themiſtocles turning to him, replied. We haue willingly forſaken our houſes and wals, ſaid he, cowardly beaſt that thou art, becauſe we would not become ſlaues for feare to loſe things, that haue neither ſoule nor life. And yet our city I tell thee is the greateſt of all GREECE: for it is a fleete of two hundred gallies ready to fight, which are come hither to ſaue you if you liſt. But if you will needes goe your waies and forſake vs the ſecond time: you ſhall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANS haue another free city, and haue poſſeſſed againe as much good land, as that they haue already loſt. Theſe wordes made Eurybiades preſently thinke, and feare, that the ATHENIANS would not goe, and that they would forſake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reaſon againſt Themiſtocles opinion: he could not but aunſwere him. Alas, and muſt you my maiſters talke of warres to, that are like to a Sleeue? In deede you haue a ſword, but you lacke a heart. Some write, that whileſt Themiſtocles was talking thus from his gally, they ſpied an owle flying on the right hande of the ſhippes which came to light on one of the maſtes of the gallies: and that hereupon all the other GRECIANS did agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by ſea. But when the fleete of their enemies ſhippes ſhewed on the coaſtes of ATTICA, hard by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the riuers thereabouts, as farre as any body could ſee, and that king Xerxes him ſelfe was come in perſon with all his army by land, to campe by the ſea ſide: ſo that his whole power both by land and ſea might be ſeene in ſight: then the GRECIANS had forgotten all Themiſtocles goodly perſuaſions, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONESIANS, conſidering how they might recouer the gulſe of PELOPONNESVS, and they did grow very angry, when any man wentabout to talke of any other matter. To be ſhort, it was concluded that they ſhould ſaile away the next night following, and the maiſters of the ſhippes had order giuen them to make all thinges ready for them to depart. Themiſtocles perceiuing their determination, he was maruellous angry in his minde, that the GRECIANS would thus diſperſe them ſelues a ſunder, repairing euery man to his owne city, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place, and the ſtraight of the arme of the ſea, where they lay in harbor together, did offer them: and ſo he bethought him ſelfe how this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practiſe of one Sicinus came into his minde, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken priſoner before in the warres, loued Themiſtocles very well, and was ſchoolemaiſter to his children. This Sicinus he ſecretly ſent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertiſe him that Themiſtocles (generall of the ATHENIANS) was very deſirous to become his maieſties ſeruaunt, and that he did let him vnderſtand betimes, that the GRECIANS were determined to flie: and therefore that he wiſhed him not to let them eſcape, but to ſet vppon them, whileſt they were troubled and affraide, and farre from their army by land, to the end that vpon a ſodaine he might ouerthrow their whole power by ſea, Xerxes ſuppoſing this intelligence came from a man that wiſhed him well, receiued the meſſenger with great ioy, and thereuppon gaue preſent order to his captaines, by ſea, that they ſhould imbarke their men into the other ſhippes at better leyſure, and that preſently they ſhould put out with all poſſible ſpeede, two hundred ſaile to followe the GRECIANS in the taile, to ſhut vp the foreland of the ſtraight, and to compaſſe the Iles all about, that not one of his enemies ſhippes might eſcape: and ſo it fell out. Then Ariſtides (Lyſimachus ſonne) being the firſt that perceiued it, went to Themiſtocles tent, though he was his enemy, and through his onely meanes had bene baniſhed before, as ye haue heard: and calling him out, told him how they were enuironed. Themiſtocles, who knew well enough the goodneſſe of this man, being very glad he came at that time to ſeeke him out, declared vnto him the pollicy he had vſed by the meſſage of Sicinus, praying him to put to his helpe to ſtay the GRECIANS, and to procure with him, conſidering his word had more authority among them, that they would fight within the ſtraight of SALAMINA. Ariſtides commending his great wiſedome, went to deale with the captaines of the other gallies, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credite that he ſaid, vntill ſuch time as there arriued a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine, who being ſtolen out of the hoſte of the barbarous army, brought certaine newes, that the ſtraight out of doubt was ſhut vp. So that beſides the neceſſity which did vrge them, the ſpite which the GRECIANS conceiued thereof, did prouoke them to hazard the battell. The next morning by breake of day, King Xerxes placed him ſelfe on a maruellous ſteepe high hill, from whence he might diſcerne his whole fleete, and the ordering of his army by ſea, aboue the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrow way or channell betwixt the Ile of SALAMINA, and the coaſt of ATTICA: or as Aceſtodorus ſaith, vppon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the point which they commonly call the hornes. There Xerxes ſet vp a throne of golde, and had about him many ſecretaries to write all that was done in the battell. But as Themiſtocles was ſacrificing vnto the goddes in his galley that was admirall, they brought to him three yong priſoners, faire of complexion, richly arrayed with gold and iuels, whom they ſaide were the children of Sandauce the kings ſiſter, and of prince Autarctus. So ſoone as Euphrantides the ſoothſayer had ſeene them, and at their arriuall obſerued there roſe a great bright flame out of the ſacrifice, and at the very ſelfe ſame inſtant that one on his right hand had ſneeſed: he tooke Themiſtocles by the hand, and willed him to ſacrifice all thoſe three priſoners vnto the god Bacchus, ſurnamed Omeſtes, as much to ſay, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GRECIANS ſhould not only be ſaued, but they ſhould haue the victory ouer their enemies. Themiſtocles woundred much, to heare ſo ſtraunge and terrible a commaundement of the ſoothſaier. Neuertheles, the common ſort following his cuſtome, which is, to promiſe ſafety ſooner in the greateſt dangers, & moſt deſperate caſes, by ſtrange and vnreaſonable, rather then by reaſonable and ordinary meanes: they beganne to call vpon the god with one voice, and briuging the three priſoners neare vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the ſacrifice in that ſort as the ſoothſaier had appointed. Phanias Leſbian, an excellent Philoſopher, and well ſcene in ſtories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the ſhippes of the barbarous nauy: Æſchylus the poet, in a tragedy which he intituled the Persians, knowing certainly the troth, ſaieth thus:

Xerxes king of Perſia had a thouſand ſhips.

King Xerxes had a thouſand ſhippes I know,
amongeſt the which, two hundred were (I trow)
and ſeuen: which all the reſt did ouerſaile with ſwifter courſe. This is withouten faile.

The Athenians had nine ſcore, in euery one of the which there were eighteen ſouldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the reſt armed men. Themiſtocles alſo did with no leſſe skill & wiſdome chooſe his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntil the hower was come, that of ordinary cuſtom the ſea wind aroſe, and brought in a rough tide within the channell, which did not hurt the Grecian gallies, being made low and ſnug, but greatly offended the Persian gallies, being high cargged, heauy, & not yare of ſteredge, and made them lie ſidelong to the Grecians, who fiercely ſet vpon them, hauing alwaies an eie to Themiſtocles direction, that beſt foreſaw their aduantage. At the ſame time, Ariamenes, Xerxes admirall, a man of great valure & worthieſt of the Kings brethren, beſtowed arrowes and darts as it were from the wals of a caſtle, charging the gally of Aminias Decelian, and Soſicles Pedian, which were ioyned and grappled with him, and fiercely entring the ſame, was by them valiantly receiued vpon their pikes, and thruſt ouer bord into the ſea. Whoſe body floting amongſt other ſhipwracks Artemisia knowing, cauſed to be caried to king Xerxes. Now whileſt this battell ſtoode in theſe termes, they ſay that there appeared a great flame in the element toward the city of Elevsin, and that a loude voice was heard through all the plaine of Thriasia vnto the ſea, as if there had bene a number of men together, that had ſung out aloud, the holy ſong of Iacchus. And it ſeemed by litle and litle, that there roſe a cloud in the aire from thoſe which ſang: that left the land, and came and lighted on the gallies in the ſea. Other affirmed, that they ſaw armed men, which did reach out their hands from the Ile of Ægina, towards the Grecian gallies: and they thought they were the Æacides, for whoſe helpe they all praid before the battell was begunne. The firſt man of the Athenians that tooke any of the enemies ſhips, was Lycomedes, a captaine of a gally: who hauing taken very rich furniture and flags, did afterwards conſecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would ſay, victorious. The other Grecians in the front being equally in number with the barbarous ſhips, by reaſon of the ſtraightnes of the arme of the ſea wherin they fought, and ſo ſtraightned as they could not fight but by one & one, whereby the Barbarians diſorderly laide one another abourd, that they did hinder them ſelues with their ouer multitude: & in the end were ſo ſore preſſed vpon by the Grecians, that they were conſtrained to flie by night, after they had fought and maintained battell, vntill it was very darke. So that the Grecians wan that glorious and famous victory: of the which may truely be affirmed that, as Simonides ſaieth:

The Grecians victory of the Perſians nauy by ſea.

VVas neuer yet, nor Greeke nor barbarous crew that could by ſea, ſo many men ſubdew: Nor that obtainde, ſo famous victorie
in any fight, againſt their enemie.

Thus was the victory wonne through the valiantnes and courage of thoſe that fought that battell, but eſpecially through Themiſtocles great policy and wiſdome. After this battell Xerxes being madde for his loſſe, thought to fill vp the arme of the ſea, and to paſſe his army by land, vpon a bridge, into the Ile of Salamina. Themiſtocles, becauſe he would feele Ariſtides opinion, told him as they were talking together, that he thought beſt to goe and occupy the ſtraight of Hellespont with the army by ſea, to breake the bridge of ſhippes which Xerxes had cauſed to be made: to the end, ſaid he, that we may take Asia into Evrope. Ariſtides liked not this opinion, for we haue (ſaid he) fought all this while againſt this barbarous King, who thought but to play with vs: but if we ſhut him within Greece, and bring him to fight of neceſſity to ſaue his life: ſuch an enemy that commandeth ſo great an army, will no more ſtand ſtill as a looker on, and ſet at his eaſe vnder his golden pauilion, to ſee the paſtime of the battell, but will prooue euery way, and be him ſelfe in euery place at all aſſaies to ſaue him ſelfe from ſuch a ſtraight and daunger. Thus with politicke care and foreſight, he may eaſely amend his former fault committed by negligence, and doe well enough, when he ſhall ſee his life and Kingdome both depend vppon it. Therefore Themiſtocles, I would thinke not beſt to breake his bridge at all, which he hath cauſed to bee made; but rather if wee could, to build another to it, to driue him out of EVROPE as ſoone as we could. Themiſtocles then replied: Seeing you thinke this were good to be done, we muſt all lay our heades together, to deuiſe how he may be forced to come out as ſoone as we could. They breaking off with this reſolution, Themiſtocles ſent immediately one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arſaces, that was one of the groomes of his chamber, whom he found out amongeſt the priſoners, and by him he ſent this meſſage vnto the King. That the GRECIANS hauing wonne the battell of him by ſea, had decreed in their counſell, how they would goe to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to breake the bridge of the ſhippes he had cauſed to be made there. Wherof he thought good to aduertiſe him for the good will he did beare him, and to the end he might bethinke him betimes, to get him away to the ſea within his owne dominion, and ſo paſſe backe againe into ASIA as ſoone as he could, whileſt he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to ſtay following him at the poope. The barbarous King vnderſtanding theſe newes, was ſo affraid, that he hoiſed away with all poſſible ſpeede. The further foreſight and great wiſedome of Themiſtocles, and Ariſtides, in marine cauſes, did manifeſtly appeare afterwards in the battell the GRECIANS fought before the city of PLATEA, againſt Mardonius, king Xerxes lieutenant: who hauing but a ſmall power of the King his ſoueraignes there, did yet put the GRECIANS to great diſtreſſe, and in hazard to haue loſt all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the city of ÆGINA wanne the fame for valiantneſſe aboue the reſt: and of priuat men, among the GRECIANS, Themiſtocles was iudged the worthieſt man: although it was ſore againſt their wils, becauſe they enuied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and hauing ſworne vppon the altar of their ſacrifices, that they would giue their voices after their conſciences, to thoſe they thought had beſt deſerued it: euery one gaue him ſelfe the firſt place for worthines, & the ſecond vnto Themiſtocles. The LACEDÆMONIANS caried him into SPARTA, where they iudged the honour and dignity to their admirall Eurybiades: but the wiſdome and pollicy they attributed to Themiſtocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue braunch, and the goodlieſt coche that was in their city: and moreouer they ſent three hundred of their luſty youthes to accompany him, and conduct him out of their countrey. They ſay, at the next feaſtes and aſſemblies of the playes Olympicall that were made after this victory, when Themiſtocles was once come into the ſhew place where theſe games were plaide, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all caſt their eies on him, ſhewing him to the ſtrangers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their handes did witneſſe howe much they eſteemed him. Whereat he him ſelfe tooke ſo great delight, that he confeſſed to his familiar friends, he then did reape the fruite and benefit of his ſundry and painefull ſeruices he had taken in hand, for the preſeruation of GREECE: ſo ambitious was he of nature, and couetous of honour, as we may eaſily perceiue by certaine of his deedes and notable ſayings they haue noted of him. For being choſen admirall of ATHENS, he neuer diſpatched any cauſes priuate or publicke, howſoeuer they fell out, vntill the very day of his departure, and taking ſhippe: and all becauſe that men ſeeing him rid much buſineſſe at once, and to ſpeake with ſo many perſons together, they ſhould eſteeme him to be the notabler man, and of the greater authority. Another time he walked vppon the ſands by the ſea ſide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the ſea had caſt vp vpon the ſhore: and ſeeing ſome of them that had on ſtill their chaines of golde, and bracelets, he paſſed by on his way, but ſhewed them yet to his familiar friend that followed him, and ſaide vnto him: take thou thoſe, for thou art not Themiſtocles. And vnto one Antiphates, who in his youth had bene a goodly yong boy, and at that time did ſcornefully behaue him ſelfe vnto him, making no reckoning of him: and now that he ſaw him in authority came to ſee him, he ſaide. O my young ſonne, and friend: we are both euen at one time (but too late) growen wiſe. He ſaide the ATHENIANS did not eſteeme of him in time of peace: but when any ſtorme of warres were towardes, and they ſtoode in any daunger, they ranne to him then, as they runne to the ſhadowe of a plane tree, vpon any ſodaine raine: and after fayre weather come againe, they cut away then the braunches, and boughes thereof. There was a man borne in the Ile of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, did caſt him in the teeth, that it was not for his worthineſſe, but for the noble citie wherein he was borne, that he had wonne ſuch glorie. Thou ſayeſt true ſayde he: but neither ſhould I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a SERIPHIAN, nor thou alſo if thou haddeſt bene an ATHENIAN. An other time one of the Captaines of the citie, hauing done good ſeruice vnto the common weale, made boaſt before Themiſtocles, and compared his ſeruice equall with his. Themiſtocles to aunſwere him, tolde him a pretie tale. That the working day brauled on a time with the holy day, repining againſt her, that he laboured for his liuing continually, and how ſhe did nothing but fill her bellie, and ſpend that they had gotten. Thou haſt reaſon ſaide the holy day. But if I had not bene before thee, thou hadſt not bene here now. And ſo, if I had not bene then: where had you my maſters bene now? His owne ſonne was a little too ſawſie with his mother, and with him alſo, bearing himſelfe ouer-boldly of her good will, by meanes of her cockering of him. Whereupon being merrily diſpoſed, he would ſay that his ſonne could doe more then any man in all GRECE. For, ſaieth he, the ATHENIANS commaunde the GRECIANS, I commaund the ATHENIANS, my wife commaundeth me, and my ſonne commaundeth her. Moreouer becauſe he would be ſingular by himſelfe aboue all other men: hauing a peece of land he would ſell, he willed the crier to proclaime open ſale of it in the market place, and with all he ſhould adde vnto the ſale, that his land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being ſuters to his daughter, he preferred the honeſter before the richer, ſaying: he had rather haue to his ſonne in lawe a man that lacked goods, then goods to lacke a man. Theſe were Themiſtocles pleaſant conceits and aunſwers. But after he had done all theſe things we haue ſpoken of before, he tooke in hand to builde againe the citie and walles of ATHENS, and did corrupt the officers of LACEDÆMONIA with money, to the end they ſhould not hinder his purpoſe, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other ſay when he had deceiued them by this ſubtiltie, he went vnto SPARTA as ambaſſadour, ſent thither of purpoſe vpon the complaints of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS did incloſe their citie againe with walles, who were accuſed vnto the counſell of SPARTA, by an orator called Poliarchus, who was ſent thither from the ÆGINETES, of purpoſe to proſecute this matter againſt the ATHENIANS. Themiſtocles ſtoutely denied it to them, and prayed them for better vnderſtanding of the trothe, they would ſend ſome of their men thither to ſee it. This was but a fetch onely to winne by this delaye, the ATHENIANS ſo much more time to raiſe vp their walles, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould keepe as hoſtages for ſurety of his perſonne, thoſe they ſhould ſend to ATHENS, to bring backe the report thereof: and ſo it fell out. For the LACEDÆMONIANS being enformed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but diſſembling the miſliking they had to be thus abuſed by him, ſent him away ſafe and ſound. Afterwardes he made them alſo mend and fortifie the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing conſidered the ſituation of the place, and all to encline the city to the ſea. Wherein he did directly contrary to all the counſell of the auncient kinges of ATHENS: who ſeeking (as they ſay) to withdraw their people from the ſea, and to accuſtome them to liue vppon the land, by planting, ſowing, and plowing their grounds, did deuiſe and giue out abroad, the fable they tell of the goddeſſe Pallas. And that is this, how ſhe contending with Neptune about the patronage of the countrey of ATHENS, brought forth and ſhewed to the iudges the oliue tree, by meanes whereof ſhe preuailed, and obtained the preheminence. Euen ſo Themiſtocles did not ioyne the hauen of PIRÆA, vnto the city of ATHENS, as the Comicall poet Ariſtophanes ſayeth: but rather ioyned the city vnto the hauen PIRÆA, and the land vnto the ſea. By this meanes he made the people ſtrong againſt the nobility, and brought the comminalty to waxe bolder then they were before, by reaſon the rule and authoritie fell into the handes of ſaylers, mariners, pilots, ſhippemaiſters, and ſuch kinde of ſeafaring men: ſo as the pulpit where all the oracles were made, ſtoode in the market place of PNYX, and did looke towardes the ſea. Put the thirtie tyrants that came in afterwardes, did remooue it, and turne it towardes the lande: holding opinion to be ſtrong by ſea, was it that did maintaine the authoritie of the popular ſtate. And that contrariwiſe they which liue by the labour and toyle of the earth, doe more willingly like the gouernement of Nobilitie. Themiſtocles called to minde another matter alſo of greater importance, to make the citie of ATHENS of a greater power by ſea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the fleete and nauie of the GRECIANS wintered in the hauen of PAGASES: he ſaide one day in an open aſſembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them, but it was not to be tolde openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Ariſtides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it ſpeedily. Themiſtocles then tolde Ariſtides: the thing hee had conſidered of, was to burne the Arcenall where the GRECIANS nauie lay; and to ſet on fire all their ſhippes. Ariſtides hearing his purpoſe, returned to the people, and tolde them: how nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniuſt, then that which Themiſtocles had deuiſed. The ATHENIANS then willed Ariſtides it ſhould be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their petition to the counſell of the Amphictyons (that is the generall counſell of all the ſtates of GRECE aſſembled) how the townes and cities of GRECE which had not bene parties with the GRECIANS to the league, againſt the barbarous people, ſhould be put off wholly from this counſell. Themiſtocles doubting of the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS, and the THEBANS alſo ſhould by this meanes be exempted, that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voices, and by this meanes might do what they would in this counſell: he ſpake ſo conſideratly for the cities which they would haue thus diſcharged, that he made the petitioners in the aſſembly vtterly to change their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirtie cities compriſed onely the league, and yet that ſome of them were very weake and ſmall: and how it were no reaſon, that reiecting all the reſt of GRECE, the greateſt authoritie of this counſell ſhould fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefeſt cities alone. For this cauſe chieflie the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer beare him extreame hatred, and did ſet vp Cimon all they could, to be alwayes aduerſarie oppoſite vnto him, and as it were to beard him in all matters of ſtate, and the gouernment of ATHENS. They procured him beſides the ill will and diſpleaſure of all the friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went ſayling ſtill too and fro alongſt the Iles, exacting money of the inhabitants of the ſame. And this is to be knowne by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would haue had money) and by the aunſwer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, how he had brought them two mightie gods: Loue, and Force. And they anſwered him again, that they alſo had two great goddeſſes, which kept them from giuing of him any money: Pouerty, and Impoſſibility. And to make this good alſo: Timocreon the Rhodian Poet galled him to the quicke, when he ſharpely taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were baniſhed: and how for coueteouſneſſe of money he had betraied, and forſaken his hoſte and friend. The verſes wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effect.

After this, he did more openly blaſe him to the world, when he was baniſhed and condemned: in a ſong that had beginning thus:

O Muſe, let theſe my verſes be diſperſt,
throughout all Greece, ſince they deſerue no leſſe:
and ſince the truth which is in them rehearſt,
deſerueth fame, whom no man ſhould ſuppreſſe.

They ſay the cauſe was, why this Timocreon was baniſhed: the friendſhip which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giuing them intelligence. Whereof Themiſtocles was one that iudicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themiſtocles himſelfe was accuſed afterwards of the ſame fault, Timocreon then made theſe verſes following againſt him.

Timocreon was not without his pheere,
which did confer with Medes priuely,
Since others mo, the ſelfe ſame blame might beare,
mo foxes lurke in dennes as well as I.

Beſides theſe verſes, Themiſtocles owne citizens for the ill will they bare him, were contented to heare him ill ſpoken of. Therfore while he ſought waies, to redreſſe all this: he was driuen to vſe ſuch meane, which more increaſed their hatred toward him. For in his orations to the people, he did ofte remember them of the good ſeruice he had done them: and perceyuing how they were offended withall, he was driuen to ſay. Why, are ye weary ſo oft to receiue good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him alſo, when he ſurnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Ariſtobule, as much to ſay, as the good counſeller: meaning thereby, how he had giuen graue and wiſe counſell, both vnto his city, and to all the reſt of the GRECIANS. He built this temple alſo neare his houſe, in a place called Melita, where the hang-men doe caſt the dead bodies of thoſe that were executed, and throw the ragges and halters endes of thoſe that were hanged, or otherwiſe put to death by law. There was alſo in our daies in the temple of Diana Ariſtobule, a litle image of Themiſtocles, which ſhewed plainly, that he was not only wiſe, and of a noble mind, but alſo of a great maieſty and countenance in the face. In the end the ATHENIANS baniſhed him ATHENS for fiue yeares, becauſe they would plucke downe his ouergreat courage and authority, as they did vſe to ſerue thoſe, whoſe greatnes they thought to be more, then common equality that ought to be among citizens would beare. For this manner of baniſhment for a time, called Oſtraciſmon, was no puniſhment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the enuy of the people, which delighted to plucke downe their ſtomacks that too much ſeemed to exceede in greatnes: and by this meanes they tooke away the poiſon of his malice, with diminiſhing his glory & honor. So Themiſtocles being baniſhed ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane ſeaſon, Pauſanias trechery fell out, which gaue his enemies occaſion to lye heauie on his backe. But he which became his accuſer, and was partner of the treaſon, was one called Leobotes (Alcmeons ſonne) borne in a village called AGRAVLA. Beſides this, the SPARTANS alſo did ſit on his ſkirtes, & charged him ſorely. For Pauſanias neuer beſore reuealed to Themiſtocles the treaſon he had purpoſed, although hee was his very familiar friend. But after he ſawe Themiſtocles was baniſhed, and did take his exile very vnpaciently: then Pauſanias was bolde to open his treaſon to him, to procure him to take his part, and ſhewed him the letters the king of PERSIA had written to him, and all to ſtirre him vp againſt the GRECIANS, as againſt vngratefull and vnnaturall people. Howbeit Themiſtocles ſhooke him off, and told him plainely he would be no partner of his treaſon. Notwithſtanding, hee neuer reuealed it to any liuing creature, nor diſcouered the practiſe he intended: hoping either he would haue giuen it ouer, or that ſhortly it would appeare by ſome other meane, conſidering he ſo fondly aſpired to thinges of great daunger, and without purpoſe or poſſibilitie. After Pauſanias was condemned, and had ſuffered paines of death for the ſame: they found amongeſt his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themiſtocles to be very ſore ſuſpected. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS on the one ſide cryed out of him: & his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accuſed him on the other ſide. To the which he made anſwere by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people, it was not likely that he (who ſought all the waies to rule, and was not borne to ſerue, neither had any minde thereto) would euer haue thought in his head, to ſell his owne libertie, and the GRECIANS alſo vnto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithſtanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, ſent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the ſtates of all GRECE, to be iudged by that counſell. Whereof Themiſtocles hauing intelligence in time, he did conueigh himſelfe into the Ile of CORPHV, becauſe the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certaine pleaſure in time paſt he had done them. For they being at ſute and ſtriſe with the CORINTHIANS, he tooke vp the matter betweene them, and gaue iudgement on their ſide, & condemned the CORINTHIANS to pay them twenty talents damages: & did ſet down an order, that they ſhould occupy the Ile of LEVCADE in common together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, aſwell of the one city, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whither being followed by the ATHENIANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS, he was compelled to venter himſelfe vpon a doubtfull and very dangerous hope. For he went to yeelde himſelfe into the hands of Admetus, king of the MOLOSSIANS. Who hauing heretofore made certaine requeſts vnto the ATHENIANS, and being ſhamefully denyed them by meanes of Themiſtocles (who then was at his chiefeſt height and authority) the king was maruellouſly offended with him: and it was a cleere caſe in deed, that if he could then haue layde hands on him, he would haue bene reuenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the preſent miſery of his exile, he thought he might leſſe feare the Kings olde quarrell and diſpleaſure, then the freſh hate and enuy of his countrey men. Whereupon he went vnto King Admetus, truſting to his mercy, and became an humble ſuter to him in a ſtrange extraordinary ſort. For he tooke the Kings litle young ſonne in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappell: which humble manner of ſuing the MOLLOSSIANS take to be moſt effectuall, and ſuch as they dare not deny nor refuſe. Some ſay that Queene Phthia her ſelfe, the Kings wiſe, did enforme him of this their countrey cuſtome and manner, and brought her litle ſonne alſo neare vnto the altar. Other write alſo, that it was Admetus him ſelfe that taught and ſhewed him this enforcing manner of petition, only for a cloke to excuſe himſelfe to thoſe that ſhould come to demaund Themiſtocles of him: that by duetie of religion he was ſo ſtraightly bound and reſtrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protection. In this meane time, Epicrates Acharnian found the meanes ſecretly to conuay Themiſtocles wiſe and children out of ATHENS, and did ſend them priuily vnto him: whereupon he was afterwardes accuſed, and put to death, vpon Cimons accuſation and motion, as Steſimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring thoſe matters I know not how, or making as though Themiſtocles had not remembred him ſelfe doth ſay, that Themiſtocles ſailed into SICILE, where he ſought to mary Hierons daughter, the tyrant of SIRACVSA: promiſing him if he would let him haue her, he would aſſure him to conquer all GRECE for him,and to bring them vnder his obedience.But Hieron refuſing this offer, Themiſtocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophraſtus writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdoms,that Hieron hauing ſent certain running horſes to the feaſt of games Olympicall,& hauing ſet vp a maruellous rich and ſumptuous tent there: Themiſtocles made an oration to the GRECIANS,declaring vnto them how they ſhould teare the tyrants tent in peeces, and not to ſuffer his horſes to runne with other ſwift and light horſes, and to carie away the pryſe in thoſe holy games. Thucydides againe declareth, how he went vnto the other ſea,and imbarked in the citie of PYDNE, being knowen of neuer a man in the ſhippe, vntill ſuch time as the winde beganne to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which the ATHENIANS by chaunce did beſiege at that time, where being a feard to be ſet on land, he was forced to bewray himſelfe to the maſter of the ſhippe,and the maſters mate,and wrought them, what with faire words and what with threates(by ſaying he would accuſe them to the ATHENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receiue him in, but hyred for money) ſo as he compelled them to ſayle on further, and to carie him into ASIA. As for his goods, his friendes ſaued the moſt part of them, and ſent them into ASIA to him. But for thoſe that came to light, and were confiſcate vnto the ſtate: Theopompus writeth, they did amount to the value of one hundred * talents. And Theophraſtus ſayth, but to foure ſcore talents only. So that all his goods was not worth three* talents, when he beganne to gouerne the ſtate of the common weale. When he came vnto the citie of CVMA, he perceiued that all the coaſtes by ſea were laide for him to apprehend him, and that he had many ſpials vpon him: among the which, theſe were two ſpeciall noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for mē that ſought their gaine any way they could. For the king of PERSIA had proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, two hundred talents to him that brought him Themiſtocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of ÆOLIA, called ÆGES, where no liuing body knew him, but his hoſt only, called Nicogenes: who was the richeſt man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knew all the noble men of authoritie that were about the king of PERSIA. Themiſtocles continued hidden certaine daies in his houſe: in which time, on a night after the feaſt of a ſacrifice, one Olbius, ſchoolemaiſter to Nicogenes children, by ſome ſecret working of the gods, ſuddenly fell beſides himſelfe, and began to ſing theſe verſes out alowde.

Do thou beleeue, what ſo the night thee tels
and giue thy voice, thy counſell and conceipts Vnto the night, in darkſomneſſe that dwels,

Themiſtocles dreame.

The next night following, Themiſtocles being faſt a ſleepe in his bed, dreamed that a ſnake wound it ſelfe round about his bellie, and glided vpwards to his necke, vntill it touched his face, and ſuddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his winges: and ſo at length did lift him vp into the aire, and caried him a maruellous way off, vntill he thought he ſaw a golden rodde (ſuch as Herauldes vſe to carry in their handes) whereuppon the Eagle did ſet him, and ſo was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought him ſelfe in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this deuiſe in his head, how he might bring him ſafe to the King of PERSIAES court. The barbarous nations for the moſt part (and ſpecially the PERSIANS) are of a very ſtrange nature, and maruellous iealous ouer their women, and that not onely of their wiues, but alſo of their bond women, and concubines: which they keepe ſo ſtraightly locked vp, that no man euer ſeeth them abroade at any time, but are alwaies like houſedoues kept within doores. And when they haue any occaſion to go into the countrey, they are caried in cloſe coches couered all about, that no man can looke into them. Themiſtocles was conuaied into one of theſe coches dreſt after this manner, and had warned his men to aunſwer thoſe they met by the way, that asked whom they caried: how it was a young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the countrey of IONIA, which they carried to the court for a noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampſacenian ſay, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and ſpake with his ſonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he ſpake with him ſelfe. Yet notwithſtanding it appeareth that Thucydides wordes doe beſt agree with the chronicles and tables, recording the ſucceſſion of times,

although they be of no great certaintie. Themiſtocles being come now to the ſwordes point (as it were) and to the extremitie of his daunger: did firſt preſent him ſelfe vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thouſand footmen, and ſayd vnto him. Sir, I am a GRECIAN borne, and deſire to ſpeake with the King: I haue matters of importance to open to his maieſtie, and ſuch as I know he will thankefully receiue. Artabanus aunſwered him in this manner. My friend ſir ſtraunger, the lawes and cuſtomes of men are diuerſe, and ſome take one thing for honeſt, others ſome another thing: but it is moſt honeſty for all men, to keepe and obſerue the lawes and manners of their owne countrie. For you GRECIANS haue the name to loue libertie, and equalitie aboue all things: and for vs, amongſt all the goodly lawes and cuſtomes we haue, we eſteeme this aboue the reſt: to reuerence and honour our King, as the image of the god of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and ſtate. Wherefore, if thou wilt faſhion thy ſelfe after our manner to honour the King, thou mayeſt both ſee him, and ſpeake with him: but if thou haue another minde with thee, then muſt thou of neceſſitie vſe ſome third perſon for thy meane. For this is the manner of our countrie: the King neuer giueth audience to any man, that hath not firſt honoured him. Themiſtocles hearing what he ſayd, aunſwered him againe. My lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the deſire I haue to aduaunce his glorie and power, is the onely cauſe of my preſent repaire vnto his court: therefore I meane not onely to obey your lawes (ſince it hath ſo pleaſed the goddes to raiſe vp the noble empire of PERSIA vnto this greatneſſe) but will cauſe many other people alſo to honour the King, more then there do at this preſent. Therefore let there be no ſtay, but that my ſelfe in perſon may deliuer to the King that I haue to ſay vnto him. Well, ſaied Artabanus: whom then ſhall we ſay thou art? For by thy ſpeeche it ſeemeth, thou art a man of no meane ſtate and condition. Themiſtocles aunſwered him: as for that Artabanus, none ſhall know before the King himſelfe. Thus doth Phanias report it. But Eratoſthenes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: how Themiſtocles had acceſſe vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themiſtocles being brought to his preſence, after he had preſented his humble dutie and reuerence to him, ſtood on his feete, and ſayd neuer a word, vntill the King commaunded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he aunſwered. May it pleaſe your maieſtie, ô noble King: I am Themiſtocles the ATHENIAN, a baniſhed man out of my countrie by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaireth to your highnes, knowing I haue done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I perſuade my ſelfe I haue done them far more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS back they did not follow you, whẽ the ſtate of GRECE was deliuered from thraldome, and my natiue countrie from danger, and that I knew I ſtood then in good ſtate to pleaſure you. Now for me, I finde all mens good wils agreeable to my preſent miſery and calamity: for I come determined, moſt humbly to thanke your highneſſe, for any grace and fauour you ſhall ſhew me, and alſo to craue humble pardon, if your maieſty be yet offended with me. And therefore licence me (moſt noble king) to beſeech you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witneſſes of the pleaſures I haue done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace vſe my hard fortune, as a good occaſion to ſhew your honorable vertue, rather then to ſatisfie the paſſion of your heate and choller. For in ſauing my life, your maieſty ſaueth an humble ſuter that put him ſelfe to your mercy: and in putting me to death, you ſhall rid away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Hauing ſpoke thus theſe words, he ſaid further: That the goddes by diuerſe ſignes and tokens had procured him to come to ſubmit him ſelfe vnto him, and tolde the King what viſion he had ſeene in his dreame in Nicogenes houſe: and declared alſo the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commaunded him that he ſhould goe vnto him that was called as a god, and how he thought it was the perſon of his maieſty, becauſe that god and he in troth were called both great Kings. The King hauing thus heard him ſpeake, gaue him then no preſent anſwer againe, notwithſtanding he maruellouſly wondred at his great wiſedome and boldnes. But afterwards amongeſt his familiars the King ſaide, he thought him ſelfe very happy to meete with the good fortune of Themiſtocles comming to him: and ſo beſought his great god Arimanius, that he would alwaies ſend his enemies ſuch mindes, as to baniſh the greateſt and wiſeſt men amongeſt them.

It is reported alſo he did ſacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes therfore, and diſpoſed himſelfe preſently to be merry. Inſomuch as dreaming in the night, in the middeſt of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioy: I haue Themiſtocles the Athenian. The next morning the King hauing ſent for the chiefeſt lordes of his court, he made Themiſtocles alſo to be brought before him: who looked for no goodnes at all, ſpecially when he ſaw the ſouldiers warding at the court gates, giue him ill countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and vnderſtood his name. Moreouer, Roxanes, one of the captaines, as Themiſtocles paſſed by him going to the King (who was ſet in his chayre of ſtate, and euery man keeping ſilence) ſoftly ſighing, ſayed vnto him, O thou Greekiſh ſerpent, ſubtill and malicious: the Kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Neuertheles when he came to the King, & had once againe made him a very humble and low reuerence: the King ſaluted him, & ſpake very curteouſly to him, ſaying. I am now your detter of two hundred talents, for preſenting your ſelfe. It is good reaſon I ſhould deliuer you the money promiſed him that ſhould haue brought you: but I giue you a further warrant, be bold I charge you, and ſpeake your mind freely, ſay what you thinke of the ſtate of GRECE. Themiſtocles then aunſwered him. That mens words did properly reſemble the ſtories and imagery in a peece of arras: for both in the one and in the other, the goodly images of either of them are ſeene, when they are vnfolded and layed open. Contrariwiſe they appeare not, but are loſt, when they are ſhut vp, & cloſe folded: whereupon he ſayed to the king, he muſt needes require ſome further time of aunſwer. The King liked his compariſon paſſingly well, & willed him to appoint his owne time. Themiſtocles asked a yere: in which time hauing pretily learned the Perſian tongue, he afterwards ſpake to the King himſelfe without any interpreter. So, ſuch as were no courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GRECE. But becauſe the chaunge and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noblemen imagined he had bene ſo bold to common with the King of them alſo. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, & afterwards murmured much againſt him. For indeede the King did honour Themiſtocles aboue all other ſtrangers whatſoeuer they were. On a time the King had him out a hunting with him, he made him ſee his mother, with whom he grew familiar: and by the Kings owne commaundement he was to heare the diſputations of the wiſe men of PERSIA touching ſecret philoſophie, which they call magike. Demaratus the LACEDÆMONIAN being at that time in the court of PERSIA, the king willing him to aske what gift he would, he beſought the King to grant him this fauour: to licence him to go vp & down the citie of SARDIS, with his royall hat on his head as the Kings of PERSIA do. Mithropauſtes, the Kings coſin, taking him by the hand, ſayd vnto him Demaratus, the kings hatte thou demaundeſt, and if it were on thy heade, it would couer but litle wit: Naye though Iupiter did geue thee his lightning in thy hande, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the king gaue him ſo ſharpe a repulſe for his vnreaſonable requeſt, & was ſo angrie with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgeuen him: howbeit Themiſtocles was ſo earneſt a ſuter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the reporte goeth, that the kings ſucceſſours which haue bene ſince that time, vnder whom the PERSIANS haue had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great ſtate or perſonage of GRECE into their ſeruice, they wrote vnto him, and promiſed him they would make him greater about them, then euer was Themiſtocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth alſo confirme it. For he being ſtept vp to great countenaunce and authoritie, & followed with great traines of ſuters after him by reaſon of his greatnes: ſeeing him ſelf one daye very honorably ſerued at his table, & with all ſortes of daintie meates, he turned him to his childrẽ, & ſayed vnto them. My ſonnes, we ſhould haue bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. The moſt writers do agree, that he had giuen him the reuenue of three cities for his allowāce of bread, wine & victuals: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, & MYVNTA. But Neãthes Cyzicenã, & Phanias, do adde two other cities more, PERCOTA, & PALESCEPSIA: the one to defray his charges of apparel, & the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themiſtocles going into the low countries towards the ſea, to take order againſt the practiſes of the GRECIANS: there was a PERSIAN lord called Epixies (gouernour of the high PHRYGIA) that had laid a traine to kill him (hauing of long time hired certaine murderers of PISIDIA to doe it) ſo ſoone as he ſhould come into a towne of his gouernment, called the Lyons head. But as he ſlept on a day in his houſe in the after noone, the mother of the goddes appeared vnto him, and ſayed, Themiſtocles, go not to the Lyons head, for feare thou meete with the Lyon: and for this warning, I do aſke thy daughter Mneſiptolema for my ſeruant. Themiſtocles waking ſodainely out of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddeſſe, and turning out of the high way, fetched another compaſſe about. Afterwardes hauing paſſed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beaſtes which caried his tent, fell by the way, vnfortunately in a riuer, and all his arras and tapeſtry hanginges being throughly wet, his ſeruantes were driuen to lay them out a drying, by moone light. The Piſidians that lay in wayt, and could not diſcerne by moone light that they were hangings layed out to dry, thought it had bene the very tent Themiſtocles ſelfe did lye in: whereupon they went vnto it with their ſwords drawne in their hands, hoping to haue taken him ſleeping. But when they were come thither, and began to lift vp a peece of the hãgings: ſome of the people of Themiſtocles (which kept watch) perceiuing them, ran vpon them, and tooke them. So Themiſtocles hauing eſcaped this danger, wondred greatly at the fauor of the goddeſſ which had appered vnto him. In recõpence wherof, when he was in the citie of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mneſiptolema prioreſſe of the ſame. As he paſſed by the citie of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to viſit the temples, and offerings that had bene giuen there. So he ſaw an image of a mayden in copper, in the temple of the mother of the gods, being two yardes high, which they called the Hydrophora: as much to ſay, as the watercarier. And it was a ſtatue, which himſelfe had heretofore dedicated and cauſed to be made, with the fines of thoſe that had payed forfeytures, for ſtealing or turning away the water courſe at ATHENS, at ſuch time as he was maiſter ſurueyer of the water workes and conduites there. Wherfore, whether Themiſtocles was ſory to ſee this goodly image a priſoner in the handes of the Barbarous people, or that he would ſhew vnto the ATHENIANS the greatnes of his credit and authoritie through all the Kings dominions: he ſpake to the gouernour of LIDIA, and prayed him for his ſake that he would ſend this image againe to ATHENS. But this Barbarous gouernour was very angry with his requeſt, and told him he would aduertiſe the King therof. Then Themiſtocles began to be afeard, and was driuen to ſeeke to the gouernours women and concubines, whome he got for money to intreat him, and ſo made faire weather again with the gouernour. But frõ thẽceforth, he tooke better garde of himſelfe in all his doinges, greatly fearing the enuie of the Barbarous people. For he progreſſed not vp and downe ASIA, as Theopompus writeth, but lay a long time in the citie of MAGNESIA, quietly enioying the Kings gratious gifts beſtowed on him: where he was honoured and reuerenced for one of the greateſt perſons of PERSIA, whileſt the King was els where occupied in the affairs of the high prouinces of ASIA, & had no leyſure to think vpõ thoſe of GRECE. But whẽ newes was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour and aſſiſtance of the ATHENIANS, and that the GRECIANS gallies did ſcowre the ſeas euen vnto the Ile of CYPRVS, and vnto the coaſtes of CILICIA, and that Cimon had all the ſea in ſubiection: that made him then to bend all his thoughts how to reſiſt the GRECIANS, that their greatnes might not turne to his harme. Then commiſſions went out to leauy men, to aſſemble captaines, and to diſpatch poaſtes vnto Themiſtocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings letters, ſtraightly charging him to haue an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreouer that he ſhould faythfully keepe his promiſe he had made to him. But he, to ſhewe that he neither maliced his citizens, nor was mooued with the deſire of greatnes and authoritie he might haue growne vnto in thoſe warres, or elſe for that he thought the Kings expectation would prooue to a greater matter, then he could ende or wade through, conſidering GRECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongſt the reſt had maruellous good fortune, and that it ſhould be a reproach to him to ſtaine the glorie of ſo many noble actes, ſo many triumphes, and ſo great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wiſe reſolution with himſelfe, to make ſuch an end of his life, as the fame thereof deſerued, for he made a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the goddes, & feaſted at the ſame all his friends. And after he had taken his leaue of them all, he dranke bulles bloud, as moſt men thinke (or as other ſay), poyſon, which diſpatcheth a man in foure and twentye howers, and ſo ended dayes in the citie of MAGNESIA, after he had liued threeſcore & fiue yeres, & the moſt part of them alwayes in office, and great charge. It is written, that the King of PERSIA vnderſtāding the cauſe and manner of his death, did more eſteeme him afterwards, then he did before, and that euer after he continued to vſe his friends and familiars in very good ſort. For he left children behind him, which he had of Archippa (Lyſanders daughter) of the towne of ALOPECIA: Archeptolis, polyeuctus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plato the philoſopher maketh mention, ſaying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwiſe that there was no goodnes in him. His other ſonnes that were elder, as Neocles, died being bitten with a horſe: and as for Diocles another ſonne, his grandfather Lyſander did adopt him for his ſonne. He had many daughters, of the which Mneſiptolema (which he had by a ſecond wiſe) was maried vnto her halfe brother Archeptolis, for they were not both of one venter. Another called Italia, was maried vnto one Panthides of CHIO. Sybaris, vnto Nicomedes an ATHENIAN. And Nicomacha, vnto Pharſicles, Themiſtocles nephewe: vnto whom her brethren did marry her within the cittie of MAGNESIA, after the death of their father. This Pharſicles did bring vp ASIA, which was the yongeſt of all his daughters. Furthermore his ſumptuous tumbe ſtandeth yet in the market place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocides writeth of his bones, in a booke he made to his friendes, is not to be credited, which was: that the ATHENIANS hauing found the aſhes of his bones, did caſt them vp into the ayer, as a deuiſe to ſturre vp the noble men againſt the people. And Phylarchus in his hiſtorie (much like vnto the fayned ſubtilties of a tragedie) bringeth in I cannot tell what Neocles and Demopolis, for Themiſtocles ſonnes, to moue the readers with compaſſion. Howbeit no man is ſo ſimple, but will iudge it ſtraight a very fayning and deuiſe. Diodorus the coſmographer alſo in a booke he hath written of tumbes and monuments ſayeth, by coniecture, rather then of any certen knowledge: that alongſt the hauen of PIRCEA, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a forelande in forme of an elbowe, within the which when they haue doubled the poynt, the ſea is alwaies calme, and there they finde a great and long foundation or baſe, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an alter, and that is (ſayeth he) Themiſtocles tumbe. And he ſuppoſeth that Plato the comicall poet doth witneſſe it in theſe verſes.

may viſite thee, and where it may regard,
all ſuch as ſeeke that port to be their warde.
Sometimes alſo, it may reioyce to ſee,

And furthermore, thoſe of MAGNESIA did inſtitute certen honours vnto the iſſue of Themiſtocles, which continue yet vnto this day. And in my time, another Themiſtocles alſo of ATHENS did enioy the ſame honours, with whom I was familiarly conuerſant in the houſe of Ammonius the philoſopher.

M.FVRI.CAMIL DICTA.

AMONGST many great matters which are ſpoken of this Furius Camillus, this ſeemeth moſt ſtraunge and wonderfull aboue the reſt. That he hauing borne the chiefeſt offices of charge in his countrie, and hauing done many notable and worthy deedes in the ſame: as one that was choſen fiue times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had wonne himſelf the name and title of the ſecond founder of ROME, and yet neuer came to be Conſul. But the onely cauſe thereof was, that the common weale of ROME ſtoode then in ſuch ſtate and ſort. The people were then at diſſention with the Senate. They would chuſe no more Conſuls, but other kinde of gouernours whom they called Tribuni militares: theſe did all things with like power & authoritie as the Conſuls, yet were they nothing ſo odious vnto the people, by reaſon of the number that was of them. For it was ſome hope to them that could ill beare the rule of the ſmall number of nobilitie, that the gouernment of the ſtate being put into ſixe, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eaſier, and tollerabler. Now Camillus being at that time in his beſt credit and authoritie, and in the prime and glorie of his doings, did not deſire to be made Conſul without the goodwill of the people, although whileſt he was in authoritie, there were many times Conſuls created. But to all other offices and dignities, he was called, and choſen. He behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that when he was alone, he made his authoritie common to other: and when he had companions and aſſociates, the glorie of all redounded to himſelfe alone. The cauſe whereof, was his modeſtie on the one ſide, for he commaunded euer without enuie: and his great wiſdome and ſufficiencie on the other ſide, for the which all others willingly gaue him place, and yeelded to him. The houſe of the Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the firſt that beganne to ſet himſelf forwards. For in a great battell which was fought againſt the Æques and Volſces, he being but a priuate man at armes vnder the Dictator Poſthumius Tubertus, was the firſt that riding out of the army, aduaunced himſelfe and gaue the charge. And being runne into the thigh at that time with a ſtaffe broken vpon his thigh, he plucked the trunchen out and retired not for all that: but giuing charge againe vpon the ſtouteſt of the enemies, he fought it out ſo valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chief cauſe they turned their backes. Whereupon, to requite his ſeruice done at that time (beſides other honours honours they did him ) they made him Cenſor : an office at that time of great preheminence & dignitie. In his office of Cenſorſhip, he did two notable acts. The one very honeſt: when he brought men that were not maried, to marry the womẽ whom the wars had left widows which were in number many. To this he got thẽ partly by perſuaſiõ, & partly by threatnings, to ſet roũd fines vpõ their heads that refuſed. The other very neceſſary: in that he brought the orphanes to be contributories, vnto taxes, & ſubſidies, which before payed nothing. The cauſe therof was, the continuall warres, about the which the common weale ſuſtained great charges but ſpecially about the ſiege of the citie of the VEIANS (which ſome cal VENETANIANS) that was a very ſore burden to thẽ at that time. For it was the capital citie of all THVSCAN, the which for ſtore of armour, & nũber of ſoldiers, was nothing inferiour to the cittie of ROME. For the VEIANS being growẽ to ſtomake & courage in time, by reaſõ of their wealth & proſperitie, & for the ſundry great battels they had fought againſt the RONAINES, that contẽded with them for glory & empire: and now it fel ſo out, that they finding themſelues weakned by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receiued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacocks brauery & ambitiõ, to bid them battell any more in the fielde. Howbeit the inhabitants of the cittie of VEIES hauing raiſed the walles & made very great high rãpers, began to fortifie themſelues, & made good prouiſion for armour & munition, beſides ſtore of corne, ſhotte, & other neceſſary things: they valiantly, & without feare of any thing, defended the ſiege of the ROMAINES, that cõtinued a long time, & was no leſſe hard & painful vnto thẽ that did beſiege, then it was vnto thoſe that were beſieged. For where the ROMAINES were wont beforetime to keepe their houſes in the winter ſeaſon, and the field only in the ſummer time: that was the firſt time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to build fortes, and to entrench their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies country, and to winter abroad as they were wont to lye in the campe in ſõmer. Now this ſiege had continued ſeuen yeres together. The captaines were burdened that they did not their duties, nor ſtood manfully to their charge: whereupon in the end they were diſcharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to follow the ſiege. Amõg thoſe, Camillus was one, whom then the ſecond time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithſtanding did nothing then in that ſiege, becauſe it was his happe by lot, to make warrs vpon the PHALERIANS and, the CAPENATES. Theſe people whileſt the ROMAINES were occupied other where, had inuaded their countrie and done them great harme, during the time of their warre with the THVSCANS. But Camillus hauing ouerthrowne a great number of them in the fielde, had the reſt in chaſe, and draue them to take their cittie, and did ſhut them vp within their onwe walles. The chaunce that happened at the lake of ALBANVS, about the time the THVSCAN warres were greateſt, did maruellouſly amate the ROMAINES, being no leſſe wonderfull, thẽ the moſt ſtraunge and vncredible thing that could be told by man. For they could not finde out the cauſe of it by common reaſon, nor any naturall ground: conſidering it was in the later end of Autumne, and ſommer was ended, and that there had not bene much raine, nor notable ſowth windes. And although there are many lakes, many brookes, and riuers, many ſprings, and other waters in ITALIE: yet ſome of them dried vp altogether, other ranne but faintly by reaſon of the drought, and all the riuers then were (as they are wont to be cõmonly in ſommer) very lowe, and there was ſcant any water. But the lake ALBANVS contrariwiſe, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whither out of it ſelfe, being enuironned all about with hilles and mountaines, and where the earth is good: beganne to ſwell, and riſe to euery mans ſight, without any cauſe at all (but ſecret and hidden vnto the goddes alone) and went allwayes increaſing alongeſt thoſe hilles ſides, vntill ſuch time as it came to be euen with the hight of the higheſt mountaine, gathering vpwardes ſtill without any waues or tempeſt of weather at all. This at the firſt, made poore ſheepeheardes and heardemen, keeping their cattell thereaboutes, maruellouſly afrayde. But at the lengh when the earthe and the waight of one of the hilles ( which kepte in the lake as a walle, from running ouer into the fielde ) beganne to breake by reaſon of the wayght, and great quantitie of water, that ranne ſtraight with a maruellous extreame force and violence ouer all the arable landes and groundes planted with trees, and ſo tooke his courſe into the

ſea: the ROMAINES then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wonderfully affrayde, and iudged that it was ſome ſigne and prognoſtication of ſome wonderful thing to come. And there was no other newes currante in the campe, which lay at ſiege of the cittie of VEIES: inſomuch as the very brute of it flewe ouer the walles of the cittie, vnto them that were beſieged. And as it happeneth very ofte in long ſieges, that thoſe which lye in campe do often times talke with them that are beſieged: there was a ROMAINE who fell acquainted, and commonly vſed to talke familiarly with one of the citie, who could tell of many olde and ſtraunge things done and happened, and was very skilfull aboue any other in the cittie, in the arte of diuination, or ſoothſaying. The ROMAINE then told him one day the violent breaking out of the lake ALBANVS, and perceiuing that the other after he had heard him, was as merrie as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their ſiege: he told him further, that this wonderfull chaunce was not onely happened vnto the ROMAINES at that time, but that they had beene acquainted with many other farre more ſtraunge then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to ſee if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common weale had but hard ſucceſſe, yet he would procure that his owne priuate matters might proſper wel with him. The VEIAN anſwered them, he would heare them with a good wil, & gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard ſome great ſecret. So the ROMAINE training him on ſtill from one matter to another, holding on his way, vntill he ſaw he was a good diſtance off from the gates of the cittie, he ſodainly caught hold on him, and by ſtrong hand caried him away with him, and with helpe of other ſouldiers which came running out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the captaines. The VEIAN ſeeing himſelf thus forciblie vſed, and knowing alſo that fatall deſtiny cannot be auoyded, beganne to declare vnto the ROMAINES, the auncient oracles and propheſies touching the fortune of their cittie: by which it was reported vnto them, that the cittie of VEIES ſhould neuer be taken, vntill the enemie had cauſed the water of the lake ALBANVS (which ſhould breake out) to be brought backe againe, and to turne it ſome other way from thence, that it ſhould not fall into the ſea. This was caried vnto the Senate at ROME, to be conſulted of in the counſell: & there it was determined they ſhould ſend to the oracle of Apollo, at the cittie of DELPHES, and aſke him what they ſhould do therein. So thither were ſent great and notable men, Coſſus Licinius, Valerius Politus and Fabius Ambuſtus: who hauing ended their iorney by ſea, and receiued anſwer of that they demaunded, returned home againe, and amongeſt other oracles they brought one that ſayed thus. That through negligence they had omitted ſome auncient ceremonies in the holy dayes of the Latines. And another willed them, that they ſhould by all poſſible meanes they could, keepe the water of the lake ALBANVS that it fell not into the ſea, and ſhould (if it were poſſible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they ſhould cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be drunke vp in the middeſt of the fieldes. When theſe oracles were vnderſtanded, the prieſtes prepared all things for diuine ſeruice, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After theſe things were done, the Senate in the tenth yere of the warres againſt the VEIANS, put off all thoſe which did beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horſe men, Cornelius Scipio. And before he went in hand with any thing, he made a vow vnto the goddes, that if it pleaſed them to graunt a happy ende of theſe warres, in honour of them he would celebrate great playes, and build a temple vnto the goddeſſe which the ROMAINES call Matuta: which ſeemeth to be her whom we call Leucothea, conſidering the ceremonies done in theſe ſacrifices. For they cauſe a chambermayde to enter into her temple, and there they boxe her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, and do embrace their brothers childrē rather then their owne. They make many other ceremonies, and they are much like vnto thoſe that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the miſfortunes that chaunced vnto Ino, by reaſon of her huſbands concubine. After all theſe vowes and prayers made, he entred with his armie into the FALISSIANS territories, whom he ouerthrew in a great battell, together with the CAPENATES alſo, which came to aide them. From thence he went to the ſiege of the cittie of VEIES, where perceiuing to take it by aſſault, was not to be wonne without great daunger: he beganne to vndermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and with all ſo deepe, that the enemies could perceiue nothing. Now when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an aſſaulte to the walles in all places alike about the citie at one inſtant, to bring out all the inhabitants of the citie to man the walles. Whileſt they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence: Camillus ſouldiers entred ſecretly through the mines within the caſtell, hard by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Church of all the citie, and whereunto the cittizens had moſt deuotion. They ſay that euen at that preſent time the generall of the Thuscans did ſacrifice vnto the goddes, and that his ſoothſaier hauing conſidered the intrels of the beaſts offered vp in ſacrifice, cried out aloude, that the goddes gaue the victorie vnto him, which ſhould happen to come vpon them in this ſacrifice. The Romaines which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noiſe with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were ſo aſtonied, that they fled vpon it, and ſo the Romaines tooke the intrels and caried them vnto Camillus. And theſe be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus hauing by this meanes taken the citie, and ſeeing from the toppe of the caſtell the infinite goods and riches within the citie, which the ſouldiers ſpoiled and made hauoke of, he wept for very pittie. And when thoſe that were about him tolde him he was a happie man: he lift vp his hands vnto heauen, and made this praier. O mightie god Iupiter, and you ô goddes, which ſee and iudge mens good and ill works: you know right well, that we haue not willingly (without wrong and cauſe offered vs) begunne this warre, but iuſtly, and by compulſion, to be reuenged of a citie our enemie, which hath done vs great iniuries. But if to counteruaile this our great good proſperitie, and victorie, ſome bitter aduerſitie and ouerthrowe be predeſtined vnto vs: I beſeech you then (moſt mercifull goddes) in ſparing our citie of Rome, and this her armie, you will (with as litle hurte as may be) let it all fall and light vpon my perſon alone. And as he had ſpoken theſe words, and was turning on his right hand (according to the manner of the Romaines after they haue prayed vnto the goddes) he fell downe flat before them all. The ſtanders by taking this fall for an ill token, were ſomwhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he tolde them that the thing he requeſted of the gods was happened vnto him. And that was, a little hurte, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole citie being ſpoiled and rifled, he was alſo deſirous to carie Iunos image to Rome, to accompliſh the vowe he had made. And hauing ſent for workemen for this purpoſe, he did ſacrifice firſt vnto the goddeſſe, beſeeching her to accept well of the Romaines good will, and that ſhe would willingly vouchſafe to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the citie of Rome. Some ſay, that the image aunſwered, ſhe was contented. But Liuius writeth that Camillus made this praier, as he touched the image, and that the aſſiſtants anſwered ſhe was contented, and would go with a goodwill. Yet they which do affirme, it was the image ſelfe that ſpake, do fauour this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of Rome: the which, from ſo baſe and meane beginning had impoſſibly attained vnto ſo high glory and power as it had, without the ſingular fauour of the goddes, and that hath manifeſtly appeared vnto the world, by ſundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth alſo ſuch other like wonders. As, that images haue heretofore let fall drops of ſwet from them: that they haue bene heard to ſighe: that they haue turned: and that they haue made certaine ſignes with their eyes, as we finde written in many ancient ſtories. And we could our ſelues alſo tell ſuch like wonders, which we haue heard men of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for ſuch matters, it is as daungerous to giue too much credit to them, as alſo to diſcredit them too much, by reaſon of the weakeneſſe of mans nature, which hath no certaine bounds, nor can rule it ſelfe, but runneth ſomtimes after vanity and ſuperſtition, and otherwhile alſo deſpiſeth and contemneth holy and diuine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, and not to go too farre in this, as in all other things beſides, it is the beſt. Now Camillus, whether his late enterpiſe performed, in winning a citie that ſtood out with Rome, and held ſiege with them ten yeares together, had put him into an ouerweening or conceipt of him ſelfe: or that the words of the people, which did bleſſe and praiſe him, had made him looke high, and preſume vpon himſelfe, more then became the modeſtie of a ciuill magiſtrate, and gouernour of the common weale, & one that was ſubiect to the law: he ſhewed a ſtately triumphe, ſet forth with all riche furniture, & ſpecially for that himſelfe was caried through ROME vpon his triumphant charret drawne with foure faire white courſers. This, neuer captaine nor general before him durſt vndertake to do, neither any euer after him attempted it: for they thinke it as a ſacred cariage, and onely meete for the king, and father of the gods. This bred him much enuie amongſt the cittizens, which had not bene acquainted with ſo great ſtatelineſſe. There was another occaſion alſo that made them miſlike him much: which was, becauſe he ſtood againſt the lawe put forth that they ſhould deuide the citie of ROME. For the Tribunes of the people did ſet out an Edict, that the Senate & people of ROME ſhould be deuided into two parts: and that thoſe on whom the lotte ſhould fall, ſhould abide ſtill in ROME, and the other ſhould go dwell in the new wunne citie of VEIES. Theſe were the reaſons to perſwade this: that both the one and the other ſort ſhould be richer then they were before, and ſhould more eaſily keepe their lands and goods from the inuaſion of their enemies, by meanes of theſe two great cities. The people which were multiplyed now into great numbers, and had ſerued dutifully and dangerouſlie, thought it the beſt way in the world: Therefore they ſtill cried out, and thronged with great tumult, about their pulpit for orations, praying that this lawe might be put vnto the voices of the people. But the whole Senate, and wiſeſt cittizens among them, iudging this motion of the Tribunes would be the deſtruction, and not the diuiſion of the citie of ROME: could in no wiſe abide it ſhould go any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus helpe: who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the law ſhould paſſe or no, did alwaies ſeeke new occaſions and lets, ſtill to delay and put off the matter, and ſtay the confirmation of this law. For theſe cauſes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall and apparant cauſe of the peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the tenth part of their ſpoiles: and it was not altogether without ſome reaſon, and to ſay truly the people did him much wrong to beare him ſuch malice for that. For before he went to the citie of VEIES, he made a ſolemne vowe to offer the tenth part vnto the gods, of the ſpoiles of the citie, if he wanne the ſame. But when it was taken and ſacked, whether it was that he was lothe to trouble the cittizens, or hauing a world of buſineſſe in his head, that he eaſily forgat his vowe: he ſuffered the ſouldiers to deuide the ſpoile amongſt them, and to take the benefit to themſelues. Shortly after he was diſcharged of his charge, he did enforme the Senate of his vowe. Furthermore, the ſoothſayers made report at that very time, how they knew by certaine ſignes and tokens of their ſacrifices, that the gods were offended for ſomewhat, and how they muſt of neceſſitie be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate preſently made an order, where it was vnpoſſible euery man ſhould bring in againe the ſelfe ſame things he had gotten, to make a new diuiſion of euery mans ſhare: that euery one therefore vpon his othe ſhould preſent the tenth part of his gaines he had gotten by that bootie. There was great trouble about it. They were driuen to vſe great extremitie to the poore ſouldiers (which had trauelled ſore, and taken great paines in the warres) to make them to reſtore back ſuch a colloppe out of their gaine, and the rather becauſe many of them had already ſpent it euery penny: and for this trouble, they all cryed out with open mouth againſt Camillus. But he being ſet vp, and not knowing otherwiſe how to excuſe himſelfe, was forced to bring forth as cold and as vnreaſonable an excuſe as he could make, which was: forſooth he had forgotten his vowe he had made. The people notwithſtanding were eger ſtill againſt him, ſaying: how he had vowed then to offer the tenth part of the enemies goods to the goddes, and that nowe he would performe it with the tenths of the cittizens goods. Neuertheleſſe, euery man hauing brought that he ſhould for his part: it was thought good they ſhould cauſe a maſſye cuppe of golde to be made, to ſend to the temple of Apollo at DELPHES. And ſmall ſtore of golde being in the citie of ROME, as the officers of the citie were ſearching vp and downe to get it: the women of ROME of their owne voluntarie willes without motion, agreed among themſelues, that they would depart with all the iewels they had towards the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof to honour them withall: the Senate ordained that they ſhould be praiſed openly with funerall orations at their buriall, as they did vſe at honourable and noble mens obſequies. For before that lawe, it was not the manner to praiſe women openly at their funerals. Now there were appointed three of the nobleſt men of the citie to go to carie this offering, and they ſent them out in a galley well manned, ſtored alſo with good mariners, & trimly ſet forth in all triumphing maner: howbeit both in ſtorme, and calme weather, they were in danger of their liues. For after that they had ſcaped drowning very narrowly by tempeſt, when the winde was down againe, they fell into another danger, which they eſcaped alſo beyond all hope. For hard by the Iles of Æolus, the galleys of the Liparians fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the Liparians ſawe they made no reſiſtance, and intreated them, holding vp their hands: they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only faſtened their galley vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the ſhore, they declared they were pirats, and offered to make port ſale of the men and goods, as if they had bene a lawfull priſe: and had ſold them in deed, had not the wiſedom and authoritie of Timeſitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the citie, and had great a do to perſwade them to let them go. And he did not ſo leaue them, but ſent out certaine of his owne ſhippes to accompanie them in their iourney, who did helpe them to go and performe their offering. For which curteſie of his, the Romaines afterwards did him great honour at Rome, according to his well deſeruing. The Tribunes of the people began now to ſet a foote againſt the law for the deuiding of the inhabitants of Rome vnto the citie of Veies. But the warres of the Faliſces fell out happely at that time, whereby the noble men did chooſe ſuch officers as they would. So they choſe Camillus, Tribunus militaris of the ſouldiers, and fiue other to aſſiſt him, the ſeruice in that caſe requiring a generall, that caried both authoritie and reputation among them, as an olde experienced ſouldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the Faliſces with the Romaines armie, where he laide ſiege vnto the citie of the Falerians, being very well fortified, victualed & ſtored, with all other munition of warre. Knowing therefore that it was no ſmall attempt to winne this citie, and that it would not be done in a ſhort time: he politickely ſought (whatſoeuer came of it) to keepe his countrimen occupied about ſome thing, & to ſtay them for going home, leaſt by repairing to Rome, they ſhould haue many occaſions to rebell, and raiſe ſome ciuill diſſention. For the Romaines did wiſely vſe this remedie: to diſperſe abroad like good phiſicians, the humors which troubled the quiet ſtate of their commonweale at home. But the Falerians truſting in the ſituation of their citie, which was very ſtrong in all parts, made ſo litle accompt of the ſiege: that thoſe which kept not watch vpon the walles, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the citie, without any weapon about them, and their children went to ſchoole, the ſchoolemaiſter alſo would commonly leade them abroad out of the citie a walking, to play and paſſe the time by the towne walles. For the whole citie had one common ſchoolemaiſter, as the Grecians alſo haue, which do bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, becauſe one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This ſcholemaſter ſpying his time to do the Falerians a ſhrewd turne, did accuſtomably take all his ſcholers out of the city with him, to play not farre from the walles at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the citie againe after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroade thus once or twiſe, he trained them out euery day a litle further, to make them to be bolde, perſuading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day hauing gotten all the citizens children with him, he led them within the watch of the Romaines campe, and there deliuered all his ſcholers into their hands, and praied them they would bring him vnto their generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was ſchoolemaiſter vnto all theſe children, neuertheleſſe that he did more eſteeme to haue his grace and fauour, then regard his office he had by this name and title. Camillus hearing what he ſaid, and beholding his treacherous part, he ſaid to thoſe that were about him Warre of it ſelfe ſurely is an euill thing, for in warres many iniuries and miſchieues are done: neuertheleſſe, among good men there is a law and diſcipline, which doth forbid them to ſeeke victorie by wicked and traiterous meanes, and that a noble and worthie generall ſhould make warre, and procure victorie, by truſting to his owne valiantnes, & not by anothers vileneſſe & villanie. Therfore he commanded his ſergeants to teare the clothes off the back of this vile ſcholemaſter, and to bind his hands behinde him: and that they ſhould giue the children roddes and whippes in their hands, to whippe the traitour backe againe into the citie, that had betraied them, and grieued their parents. Now when the Falerians heard newes that the ſchoolemaiſter had thus betrayed them, all the citie fell a weeping (as euery man may thinke for ſo great a loſſe) and men and women ranne together one in anothers neck, to the towne walles, and gates of the citie, like people out of their wits, they were ſo troubled. When they came thither, they ſaw their childrẽ bringing their ſcholemaiſter back againe, ſtarke naked and bound, whipping of him, and calling Camillus their father, their god, and their ſauiour: ſo that not only the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the cittizens alſo in generall, did conceiue in themſelues a wonderfull admiration and great loue, of the wiſedome, goodneſſe, and iuſtice of Camillus. So that euen preſently they called a counſell, and there it was concluded they ſhould ſend ambaſſadours forthwith vnto him, to put their liues and goods to his mercie and fauour. Camillus ſent their ambaſſadours vnto Rome, where audience being giuen vnto them by the Senate, the ambaſſadours ſayd: Becauſe the Romaines preferred iuſtice aboue victorie, they taught them to be better contented to ſubmit themſelues vnto them, then to be their owne men at liberty: confeſſing their vertue did more ouercome them, then any force or power could do. The Senate diſpatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commiſſion to do and determine as he thought good. So he hauing taken a certaine ſumme of money of the Falerians, did furthermore make peace & league with all the reſt of the Falisces: and thereupon returned back againe to Rome. But the ſouldiers grudged maruellouſly at it. For they ſtood in hope to haue had the ſacking of the citie. When there was no remedie, but they muſt needes returne home emptie handed, they began to accuſe Camillus to the reſt of the citizens, as ſoone as they came to Rome, ſaying: he loued not the common people, and how for ſpight he diſappointed their armie of the ſpoile. On the other ſide, the Tribunes of the people began to reuiue the lawe, for the deuiding of the inhabitants of Rome, and were ready to paſſe it by the voices of the people. Camillus not fearing the ill will of the commons, did boldly ſpeake, and do in open preſence, all he could againſt it. So that plainely he was the chiefeſt cauſe, that the people againſt their willes (intreate what they could) were driuen to let it alone. But withall they were ſo ſpightful againſt him, that notwithſtanding his ſorowe and misfortune for the death of his ſonne (dying of a ſickneſſe) was great: they would not of malice once take pitty or compaſſion of him. The loſſe wherof (albeit he was of a very good & courteous nature (was ſo grieuous, and made him ſo vnquiet: that being accuſed before the people, he ſturred not once out of his houſe, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his ſonne departed. He that did accuſe him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burthening him that he had ſtolne and taken away, part of the ſpoyle of the Thuscans: and ſaid they had ſeene certaine braſen gates at his houſe, which had bene brought out of Thuscan. Now the people were ſo maliciouſly bent againſt him, that euery man might ſee, if they could once take him in a trippe, vpon any aduantage whatſoeuer, they would doubtleſſe haue condemned him. Wherefore calling together his friends and ſouldiers that had ſerued vnder him in the warres, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earneſtly beſought thẽ, that they would not ſuffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through falſe and vniuſt accuſations laide againſt him, nor to be ſo ſcorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends hauing laide their heads together, and conſulted thereupon, made him aunſwer: how for his iudgement they could not remedie it, but if he were condemned, they would all ioyne together with a very goodwill, to helpe to pay his fine. But he being of minde not to beare ſuch an open ſhame and ignominie, determined in choller to leaue the citie, and to exile him ſelfe from it. And after he had taken his leaue of his wife and children, bidding them farewell: he went out of his houſe to the gates of the city, and ſaid neuer a word. When he came thither, he ſtayed ſodainly, and returning back againe, he lift vp his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers vnto the gods: that if it were of very ſpight and mallice, and not of iuſt deſeruing, that the common people compelled him thus ſhamefully to forſake the citie, that the Romaines might quickly repent them, and in the face of the world might wiſh for him, and haue neede of him. After he had made theſe prayers againſt the cittizens (as Achilles did againſt the Grecians) he went his way, & was condemcondemned for his contempt, in the ſumme of fifteene thouſande Aſſes of the ROMAINE coyne, which make of Greekiſh money, a thouſand fiue hundred Drachmas of ſiluer: for an As was a litle peece of money, wherof ten of them made a ROMAINE penny. Howbeit there was not a ROMAINE of any vnderſtanding, but beleeued certainly that ſome great puniſhmẽt would follow them incontinently, and that the wrong and iniurie they had done him would be quickly requited, with ſome moſt ſharpe & terrible reuenge, not only vnpleaſant to thinke vpon, but further moſt notable to be ſpoken of through the world. There fell out ſo ſodainly vpon it, ſuch miſchief toward the citie of ROME, and the preſent time alſo brought forth ſuch occaſion of daunger and deſtruction thereof, to their ſhame & infamie: that it was vncertaine whether it happened by chaunce, or els it was the handie worke of ſome god, that would not ſuffer vertue recompenced with ingratitude, to paſſe vnreuenged. Their firſt token that threatned ſome great miſchiefe to light vpon them, was the death of Iulius, one of the Cenſors: for the ROMAINES doe greatly reuerence the office of a Cenſor, and eſteeme it as a ſacred place. The ſecond token that happened a litle before Camillus exile, was: that one Marcus Cæditius, a man but of meane qualitie, and none of the Senatours (but otherwiſe a faire conditioned honeſt man, and of good conſcience) told the Tribuni militares of a thing that was to be well conſidered of. For he ſayde that the night before, as he was going on his way in the newe ſtreete, he heard one call him aloud: and returning backe to ſee what it was, he ſawe no liuing creature, but onely heard a voyce bigger then a mans, which ſayd vnto him. Marcus Cæditius, goe thy way to morrow morning to the Tribuni militares, and bid them looke quickly for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were merie at the matter, and made but a ieaſt at his warning, and ſtraight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Nowe as touching the GAVLES. They came (as they ſay) of the CELTÆ, whoſe countrie not being able to maintaine the multitudes of them, they were driuen to goe ſeeke other countries to inhabite in: and there were amongſt them many thouſands of young men of ſeruice and good ſouldiers, but yet more women and litle children by a great number. Of theſe people, ſome of them went towardes the North ſea, paſſing the mountaines RIPHEI, and did dwell in the extreme partes of EVROPE. Other of them remained betweene the mountaines PIRENEI, & the greateſt mountaines of the ALPES, neere vnto the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they continued a long time, vntill they fortuned in the ende to taſte of the wine, which was firſt brought out of ITALY vnto them. Which drinke they found ſo good, and were ſo delighted with it, that ſodainely they armed themſelues: and taking their wiues and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe ſeeke out the countrie that brought forth ſuch frute, iudging all other countries in reſpect of that, to be but wilde and barren. It is ſayd, that the firſt man which brought wine vnto them, and that did procure them to paſſe into ITALY, was a noble man of THVSCAN called Arron, and otherwiſe of no ill diſpoſed nature: howbeit he was ſubiect to this misfortune following. He was tutor vnto an orphan child, the richeſt that was at that time in all the countrie of THVSCAN, and of complexion was wonderfull fayre: he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons houſe of a childe, and though he was growen to mans ſtate, yet he would not go from him, fayning he was ſo well, & to his liking. But in deede the cauſe was, that he loued his miſtreſſe (Arrons wife) whõ ſecretly he had enioyed a long time, and ſhe him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the ende, loue hauing ſo poſſeſſed them both, that neither part could withdraw from other, much leſſe colour that they had long enioyed: the yong man ſtole her away from him, and kept her ſtill by force. Arron put him in ſute, but he preuayled not: for Lucumo ouerweyed him with friends, money, giftes, and charges. But he tooke it ſo grieuouſly, that he left his country: and hauing heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALY. So they conquered at their firſt comming all that countrie which the THVSCANS helde in old time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, and ſtretched out in length from one ſea vnto the other which enuironeth ITALY, as the names themſelues doe witneſſe. For they call yet that ſea which looketh vnto the North, the Adriaticke ſea: by reaſon of a citie built ſometime by the THVSCANS, which was called Adria. The other, which lieth directly ouer againſt the South, is called the THVSCAN ſea. All that countrie is well planted with trees, and hath goodly pleaſant paſtures for beaſtes and cattell to feede in, & is notably watered with goodly running riuers. There was alſo at that time eighteene fayre great cities in that countrie, all of them very ſtrong and well ſeated, aſwell for to enrich the inhabitants thereof by trafficke, as to make them to liue delicately for pleaſure. All theſe cities the GAVLES had won, and had expulſed the THVSCANS, but this was done long time before. Now the GAVLES being further entred into THVSCAN, did beſiege the citie of CLVSIVM. Thereupon the CLVSIANS ſeeking aide of the ROMAINES, beſought them they would ſend letters and ambaſſadours vnto theſe barbarous people in their fauour. They ſent vnto them three of the beſt and moſt honorable perſons of the citie, all three of the houſe of the Fabians. The GAVLES receiued them very courteouſly, becauſe of the name of ROME: and leauing to aſſault the citie, they gaue them audience. The ROMAINE ambaſſadours did aske them, what iniurie the CLVSIANS had done vnto them, that they came to make wars with them. Brennus king of the GAVLES, hearing this queſtion, ſmiled, and anſwered them thus. The CLVSIANS do vs wrong in this: they being but few people together, & not able to occupie much land, do notwithſtanding poſſeſſe much, and will let vs haue no part with them, that are ſtrangers, and out of our countrie, and ſtand in neede of ſeat and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you ROMAINES in olde time, by thoſe of ALBA, by the FIDENATES, and the ARDEATES: and not long ſithence, by the VEIANS, and the CAPENATES: & partly by the FALISCES & the VOLSCES: againſt whom ye haue taken, & do take armes, at all times. And as oft as they wil let you haue no part of their goods, ye impriſon their perſons, robbe & ſpoile their goods, and deſtroy their cities. And in doing this, ye do them no wrong at all, but follow the oldeſt law that is in the world, which euer leaueth vnto the ſtronger, that which the weaker cannot keepe and enioy. Beginning with the goddes, and ending with beaſts: the which haue this propertie in nature, that the bigger and ſtronger haue euer the vantage of the weaker & leſſer. Therfore, leaue your pittie to ſee the CLVSIANS beſieged, leaſt you teach vs GAVLES to take compaſſion alſo of thoſe you haue oppreſſed. By this anſwere the ROMAINES knew very well, there was no way to make peace with king Brennus. Wherefore they entred into the citie of CLVSIVM, and incouraged the inhabitants to ſalie out with them vpon theſe barbarous people: either becauſe they had a deſire to proue the valiantneſſe of the GAVLES, or elſe to ſhew their owne courage and manhood. So the citizens went out, & skirmiſhed with them hard by the walles: in the which one of the Fabians, called Quintus Fabius Ambuſtus, being excellently well horſed, and putting ſpurres to him, did ſet vpon a goodly bigge perſonage of the GAVLES, that had aduaunced himſelfe farre before all the troupe of his companions. He was not knowen at the firſt encounter, aſwell for the ſodaine meeting and skirmiſhing together, as for that his gliſtering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had ſlaine the GAVLE, and came to ſtrip him: Brennus then knew him, and proteſted againſt him, calling the goddes to witneſſe, how he had broken the law of armes, that comming as an ambaſſadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemie. Hereupon Brennus foorthwith left skirmiſhing, and raiſing the ſiege from CLVSIVM, marched with his armie vnto ROME gates. And to the end the ROMAINES might know, that the GAVLES were not well pleaſed for the iniurie they had receiued: to haue an honeſt colour to beginne warres with the ROMAINES, he ſent an Herauld before to ROME, to demaund liuerie of the man that had offended him, that he might puniſh him accordingly. In the meane time, he himſelf came marching after, by ſmall iourneyes to receiue their aunſwere. The Senate hereupon aſſembled, and many of the Senators blamed the raſhnes of the Fabians: but moſt of all, the prieſts called Faciales. For they followed it very earneſtly, as a matter that concerned religion & the honor of the goddes: declaring how the Senate, in diſcharge of all the reſidue of the citie of the offence committed, ſhould lay the whole waight and burden of it vpon him alone, that only had done the fact. Numa Pompilius, the iuſteſt and moſt peaceable of all the Kings of ROME that had bene, was he that firſt erected the Colledge of theſe Fæciales, and did ordeine that they ſhould be the keepers of peace, and the iudges to heare and allow all the cauſes, for the which they ſhould iuſtly beginne any warres. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate in the end turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the whole will and iudgement of the people, before whom theſe prieſts Faciales did alſo accuſe Fabius Ambuſtus. The people made ſo little account of their propounded religion, and honour of the goddes in that caſe: that in ſteede of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemie, they did chooſe him for one of the Tribunes of the ſouldiers with his brothers. The GAVLES vnderſtanding this, were ſo furious & angry thereat, that they would no longer linger their iorneis, but marched with al ſpeed vnto ROME. The people that dwelt by the high waies where they ſhould paſſe by, were maruellouſly affrayd to ſee the multitude of them, & their braue and vniuerſall furniture: and beginning to doubt the furie of their rage, they imagined firſt of all that they would deſtroy all the champion countrie before them, and afterwards would take all the ſtrong cities. They cōtrariwiſe did take nothing at all out of the fields, neither did any hurt or diſpleaſure vnto any bodie: but paſſing by their cities, cryed out they went to ROME, and would haue no wars but with the ROMAINES, and how otherwiſe they deſired to be friends with al the world. Theſe barbarous people marching on in this wiſe towards ROME, the Tribunes of the ſouldiers brought their armie to the field to encounter them. They were no leſſe in number then the GAVLES, for they were fortie thouſand footmen. Howbeit moſt part of them were raw ſouldiers, that had neuer ſerued in the warres before. They were very careles of the goddes, and diſſolute in matters of religion: for they paſſed neither for good ſignes in their ſacrifices, neither to aske counſell of their ſoothſayers, which the ROMAINES were religiouſly wont to do, before they gaue any battell. To make the matter worſe, the number of the captaines hauing power & authoritie alike, did aſmuch (or more then the reſt) diſorder and confound their doings. For oft times before, in farre leſſer matters and daungers then theſe, they did vſe to chuſe ſpeciall officers that had ſole and ſoueraine authoritie, which they called Dictators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in dangerous times to haue but one head and generall, to commaund all and to haue ſupreme authoritie of iuſtice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliuer account of his doings to any. The iniury alſo which they had too vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great miſchiefe & inconuenience then vpon them. For the captaines after him, durſt no more cōmand the people roughly, but euer after did flatter them much. When their armie was now brought into the field, they encamped thēſelues by a litle riuer called Allia, about the eleuenth ſtone frō ROME, and not farre from the place where the ſame riuer falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous armie to them, who ouerthrew them in battell, by their diſorder & lack of gouernment. For the left point or wing of their battell was broken off at the firſt by the GAVLES, who charged them ſo furiouſly, that they draue them hedlong into the riuer. The right wing then retiring out of the plaine, before they had any charge giuen, and hauing gotten certaine hilles hard by them: they had litle hurt, & moſt of them ſauing thēſelues, did recouer ROME againe. The reſt that eſcaped after the enemies were wearie of killing, fled by night vnto the citie of VEIES, thinking ROME had bene loſt, & all the citie put to the ſword. This ouerthrow was on the longeſt day in ſommer, the moone being at the full: and the day before fortuned the great ſlaughter of the Fabians, of the which were ſlaine by the THVSCANS in one day 300. all of a name. The very day it ſelfe was afterwards called Alliade, of the name of the litle riuer, by the which the ſecond ouerthrow was giuen. But for the difference of daies, that ſome of them are naturally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the Philoſopher had reaſon to reproue the Poet Heſiodus, for making ſome daies good, & ſome daies ill, as though he vnderſtood they were not all of one nature: we haue written & declared our opinion therof in other places. Yet, becauſe the matter deliuereth preſent occaſion to ſpeake of the ſame, peraduenture it wil not be amiſſe to alleage a few examples of it only. It fortuned the BOEOTIANS on a time to win two honorable victories, on the firſt day of the moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombaeon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did ſtil reſtore the GRECIANS to their libertie. The firſt was the battell of LEVCTRES. The ſecond was the battell of GERASTE, which was 200. yeares before, when they ouercame LATTAMIAS, & the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battell by the GRECIANS, the 6. day of Auguſt, at the iorney of MARATHON. The third day, at the battell of PLATEES. And on the ſelfe ſame day, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fiue and twentieth day, at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wanne the battell by ſea, neere vnto the

Ile of Naxos, vnder the charge and gouernment of Chabrias, about the full of the moone, in the moneth of Auguſt. And on the twentith of the ſame moneth, they wanne the battel of Salamina: as we haue written more amply in our hiſtorie of difference of dayes. The moneth of Aprill alſo brought to the barbarous people many notable loſſes. For Alexander the great, ouercame the generall of the king of Persia, at the fielde of Granica, in the ſaide moneth. The Carthaginians alſo were vanquiſhed in Cicile by Timoleon, on the ſeuen and twentieth day thereof. On which day alſo it is thought the citie of Troy was taken: as Ephorus, Calliſthenes, Damaſtes, and Phylarchus, haue written in their hiſtories. Now contrariwiſe. The moneth of Iuly, which the Boeotians call Panemus, hath not bene gratious to the Grecians. For on the ſeuenth day of the ſame, they were ouethrowen by Antipater at the battell of Cranon, which was their vtter deſtruction. They had before alſo loſt a battell the ſame moneth, neere vnto the citie of Chæronea, by king Phillippe. On the ſame day alſo, and in the very ſelfe moneth and yere, thoſe which came into Italy with king Archidamus were ſlaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the country. The Carthaginians alſo feare the ſeuen & twentieth day of the ſame moneth, as the day which had before time brought them into many great and ſorowfull calamities. Contrarily alſo, I know very wel, how about the feaſt of myſteries, the citie of Thebes was deſtroied by Alexander, & that the Athenians were compelled to receiue a gariſon of ſouldiers into their citie, about the twentieth day of Auguſt, at which time they made the holy proceſſion of the myſteries of Iacchus. And on the ſelf day the Romaines loſt their armie, & their general Cæpio, who was ſlaine by the Cimbres. And how afterwards vnder the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, and the Armenians. And that Attalus, & Pompey alſo, died both on the ſelf ſame day they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, vnto whom after like reuolutions of time, there happened notable chaunces of good or ill. But to returne againe vnto our hiſtorie. The day of this ouerthrow, is one of thoſe which the Romaines take for one of the vnfortunateſt dayes that euer came vnto them. And by reaſon of that day, they reckon two other dayes of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred through feare & ſuperſtition, which ſpreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) vpon ſuch ſiniſter misfortunes. But for this matter, we haue written it more largely & exquiſitly in the booke we made, of the ceremonies & cuſtomes of the Romaines. Now after this battell loſt, if the Gavles had hottely purſued the chaſe of their flying enemies, nothing could haue ſaued Rome from being taken, and the inhabitants therof from being put vnto the ſword. For the Romaines that fled from the battell, brought ſuch a feare vpō thoſe that receiued them, & filled the whole citie of Rome with ſuch grief & trembling: that they wiſt not what to do. The barbarous people again, beleeuing litle their victorie was ſo great as it was, fell to make good cheere for ſo great a ioy receiued, and deuided among them the ſpoyle of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaue they time & leaſure by this meanes, to the multitude of people that fled out of Rome, to ſeeke them ſome place of ſafety: & to ſuch as remained ſtill, they left good hope to ſaue themſelues, & to make ſome prouiſion for defence. Therupon they all fortified themſelues within mount Capitoll, & ſtoring it with all kind of victual, armour, & munition, they wholy did forſake the reſt of the citie. But the firſt worke they tooke in hand was this. They did bring into their ſaid fort, part of their ſacred reliques: and the profeſſed Veſtals brought thither alſo their holy fire & al other their holy monuments. Some writers ſay, that they had nothing els in keeping, but the ſempiternall fire, & were ſo conſecrated by king Numa, who did firſt inſtitute, that the fire ſhould be worſhipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the moſt motiue & quickeſt ſubſtance that is of all naturall things: notwithſtanding, that generation alſo is a mouing, or at the leaſt not done without motion. For we ſee, that all other ſubſtance which lacketh heate, remaineth idle, and without action, and ſturreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craueth the force and heate of fire: as the ſoule it ſelfe recouering heate, beginneth ſomewhat to moue, and diſpoſeth it ſelfe to doe, and ſuffer ſome thing. Wherefore Numa being (as they ſay) a man of great learning and vnderſtanding, who for his wiſedome was reported to talke many times with the Muſes, did conſecrate the ſame as a moſt ſacred thing, and commaunded that they neuer ſhould ſuffer that fire to goe out, and but keepe it, as they would preſerue

the liuely image of the eternall God, the only King and maker of the world. Other ſay, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and ſacred things, ſignifying a kind and maner of purification, which opinion the GRECIANS hold alſo: howbeit behind the ſame fire, there were certain hidden things, which in no caſe any might ſee, but thoſe holy Veſtall Nuns. Many alſo hold an opinion, that the Palladium of TROY, (as much to ſay, as Pallas image) is hidden alſo there, which was brought by Æneas into ITALY. Other doe report alſo, that Dardanus, at that time when he firſt beganne to build the city of TROY, brought thither the holy images of the goddes of SAMOTHRASIA, and he did offer them vp there: and how Æneas after the city was taken, did ſteale them away, and kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALIE. Some other alſo, that take vppon them to know more therein then the common ſort do, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and ſtandeth open, the other is full and faſt locked vp, howbeit they are not to be ſeene but by theſe holy Nunnes. Other thinke alſo, that theſe imaginers inuented that they ſpake of their owne heads, becauſe the Veſtall Nunnes did caſt all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the temple of Quirinus: and therefore that very place carieth the ſurname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the moſt precious things they had, and fled alongeſt the riuer. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying alſo, and hauing brought away his wife and litle children, and other houſhold ſtuffe he had in a cart, by chance he lighted vpon the Veſtall Nunnes in the way. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued theſe holy Nuns (carying the bleſſed reliques & iewels in their armes, dedicated vnto the ſeruice of the gods) all alone, and that they were weary with going a foote: he cauſed his wife and his children to come out of the cart, & tooke down all his goods alſo, and willed them to get them vp, & flie into ſome city or towne of GREECE. Thus, me thought I could not wel paſſe ouer with ſilence, Albinus reuerence and deuotion he ſhewed vnto the goddes, in ſo dangerous a time and pinche of extremity. Furthermore the prieſts of other goddes, and the moſt honorableſt old men of the city of ROME (that had bene Conſuls before time, or had paſt the honour of triumph) had not the heart to forſake ROME: but putting on all their moſt holy robes and veſtmentes did vow, and as it were willingly ſacrificed them ſelues vnto the fortune that ſhould befall them for the ſafety of their countrey. And vſing certaine words and prayers which their high Biſhop Fabius had taught them, they went euen thus apparelled into the great market place, & did ſit them downe there, in chaires of iuory, expecting the good will and pleaſure of the gods what ſhould become of them. But within three daies after, Brennus came to ROME with his army: who finding the gates of the city all open, and the wals without watch, he doubted ſome deuiſe in it, and feared ſome priuy ambuſh had bene laid, as one hardly beleeuing to haue found the ROMAINS of ſo baſe a mind, as to forſake their city. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, & tooke the ſame litle more then three hundred and three ſcore yeares after it was firſt builded: if it be true at the leaſt there hath remained any certaine chronicles of thoſe times vnto this preſent day, conſidering the trouble and confuſion of that time hath made many things more vncertaine, then that, doubtfull vnto vs. But ſo it was, that the rumor ran to GREECE incontinently how ROME was taken, but yet withall ſomwhat doubtfully and vncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) ſaieth in a certaine booke he wrote of the ſoule, that there was newes come from the Weſt part, that an army which came from the HYPERBORIANS had taken a city of GREECE called ROME, ſituated in that countrey neare the great ſea. But I wõder not that Heraclides (who hath written ſo many other fables and lies) did amplifie the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding to of his owne deuiſe, of the HYPERBORIANS, & by the great ſea. It is a moſt true tale, that Ariſtotle the Philoſopher had certain knowledge it was takẽ by the GAVLS: howbeit he ſaith alſo it was recouered again afterwards by one called Lucius: where indeed it was, by Marcus Camillus, & not by Lucius But all this in maner is ſpokẽ by coniecture. Moreouer Brennus being entred ROME, did appoint part of his ſouldiers to beſiege thoſe which were gottẽ into moũt Capitol. And he with the reſidue of his army, marched on towards the market place, where when he ſaw the ancient Senators ſet ſo grauely in their chaires & ſpake neuer a word, nor offered once to riſe, though they ſaw their enemies come armed againſt them, neither chaunged countenance nor colour at all, but leaned ſoftly on their ſtaues they had in their handes, ſeeming to be nothing afraide nor abaſhed, but looked one vpon another, he maruellouſly wondred at it. This their ſo ſtrange manner at the firſt did ſo dampe the GAVLES, that for a ſpace they ſtoode ſtill, and were in doubt to come neare to touch them, fearing leaſt they had bene ſome goddes: vntill ſuch time as one of them went boldly vnto Marcus Papyrius, and laid his hand faire and ſoftly vpō his long beard. But Papyrius gaue him ſuch a rappe on his pate with his ſtaffe, that he made the bloud run about his eares. This barbarous beaſt was in ſuch a rage with the blow, that he drew out his ſword & ſlew him. The other ſouldiers alſo killed all the reſt afterwards: & ſo the GAVLS continued many daies ſpoyling and ſacking all things they found in the houſes, and in the end did ſet them all a fire, and deſtroied them euery one, for deſpite of thoſe that kept the fort of the Capitoll, that would not yeeld vpon their ſummons, but valiantly repulſed them when they ſcaled the wals. For this cauſe they raſed the whole city, and put all to the ſword that came in their handes, young and old, man, woman, and childe. Now this ſiege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very ſtoutly, victuals beganne to grow ſcant in the campe of the GAVLES, in ſomuch as they were driuen of force to ſeeke it abroad without the city. Hereupon they deuided them ſelues, whereof ſome remained ſtill with the King at the ſiege of the Capitoll: and the reſt went a forraging and ſpoyling all the champion countrey and villages there aboutes, ſcattered as it were by bands and cōpanies, ſome here, ſome there, fearing nothing, nor paſſing vppon watch or ward, they liued in ſuch ſecurity of their victory. Howbeit the greateſt company amongeſt them, went by fortune towards the city of ARDEA where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a priuate man, medling with no matters of ſtate from the time of his exile, vntill that preſent time. But then he began not to bethinke him ſelfe as a man that was in ſafety, and might haue eſcaped the handes of his enemies, but rather ſought to deuiſe and finde out all the meanes he could to ſubdue them if occaſion were ſo offered. Whereupon, conſidering that the inhabitaunts of ARDEA were enough in number to ſet vpon them, although faint hearted, and cowardly, by reaſon of the ſlouth and negligence of their gouernors and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the warres: hee began to caſt out theſe words among the young men. That they ſhould not thinke the ROMAINS misfortune fell vpon them, through the valiantnes of the GAVLES, nor that their calamity (who had refuſed good counſaile) had happened vnto them by any worke or act of the GAVLES, hauing done nothing for their part to make them cary away the victory: but that they ſhould thinke it was no other thing, but fortune alone, that would needes ſhew her power. Therefore, that it were now a notable and honourable enterpriſe (although ſomewhat dangerous) to driue theſe ſtraungers and barbarous people out of their countrey: conſidering that the only end of their victory was, but to deſtroy and conſume as fire, all that fell into their handes. Wherefore if they would but onely take a good luſty heart and corage vnto them, he would with opportunity and place, aſſure them the victory without any danger. The young men were pleaſed with theſe words of life and comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter alſo vnto the magiſtrats and counſellours: and hauing drawen them by perſwaſion vnto this enterpriſe, he armed all that were of age to cary armour, and would not ſuffer a man to go out of the city, for feare leaſt the enemies (which were not farre off) ſhould haue intelligence of the ſame. Now after the GAVLES had run ouer all the champion countrey, and were loden with all ſorts of ſpoiles, they did encampe them ſelues negligently in open fields, and neuer charged watch nor ward: but hauing their full cariage of wine laid them downe to ſleepe, and made no noiſe at all in their campe. Camillus being aduertiſed thereof by his ſeuerall ſkoutes, cauſed the ARDEANS with as litle noiſe as might bee, forthwith to go out into the fields: and hauing marched ſomewhat roundly the diſtance betweene the city and the cāpe of the GAVLS, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his ſouldiers make great ſhouts & cries, & the trūpets to be ſounded on euery ſide, to put a fear in their enemies, who yet with all the loud noiſe they made, could hardly be made to wake, they were ſo deadly drunke. Yet there were ſome notwithſtanding, that for feare to be taken tardy, did buſtle vp at this ſodaine noiſe: and comming to them ſelues, fell to their weapons to reſiſt Camillus, which were ſlaine by and by. The reſt, and the greateſt nũber of them lay here and there ſcattered in the middeſt of the field without any weapon dead a ſleepe, ſtark drunke with wine, and were put to the ſword and neuer ſtrake ſtroke. Thoſe that fled out of the cãpe that night (which were but few in number) were ouerthrowen alſo the next day, by the horſe men which followed and killed them, as they tooke them ſtraggling here and there in the fields. The brute of this victory was blowen abroad incontinently through all the towns and villages there abouts, which cauſed many yong men to come and ioyne them ſelues to Camillus: but ſpecially the ROMAINES deſired the ſame, that had ſaued them ſelues in the city of VEIES, after the battell loſt at ALLIA, who made their mones amongeſt them ſelues there, ſaying. O goddes what a captaine hath fortune taken from the city of ROME? What honour hath the city of ARDEA by the valiantnes and worthy deedes of Camillus: and in the meane ſeaſon his naturall city that brought him forth, is now loſt and vtterly deſtroyed? We, for lacke of a captaine to leade vs, are ſhut vp here within others wals, and do nothing but ſuffer ITALIE in the meane ſpace to go to ruine and vtter deſtruction before our eies. Why then doe we not ſend to the ARDEANS for our captaine? or why do we not arme our ſelues, to go vnto him? For he is now no more a baniſhed man, nor we poore citizens: ſince our city is poſſeſſed with the foraine power of our hateful enemies. So they all agreed to this counſell, and ſent vnto Camillus to beſeech him to be their captaine, and lead them. But he made aunſwer, he would in no caſe conſent vnto it, vnleſſe they that were beſieged in the Capitoll had lawfully firſt confirmed it by their voices. For thoſe (ſaid he) ſo long as they remain within the city, do repreſent the ſtate and body thereof. Therefore if they commanded him to take this charge vpon him, he would moſt willingly obey them: if otherwiſe they miſliked of it, that then he would not meddle againſt their good wils and commaundement. They hauing receiued this aunſwer, there was not a ROMAINE amongſt them, but greatly honored & extolled the wiſdome & iuſtice of Camillus: But now they knew not how to make thẽ priuy vnto it, that were beſieged in the Capitoll: for they ſaw no poſſibility to cõuay a meſſenger to them: conſidering the enemies were lords of the city, and laid ſiege to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius amongſt the yong men (a man of a meane houſe, but yet deſirous of honour and glory) that offered himſelfe very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he tooke no letters to cary to them that were beſieged, for feare leaſt they might be intercepted, and ſo they ſhould diſcouer Camillus intention: but putting on an ill fauoured gown vpon him, he conuaied certaine peeces of corcke vnder it, and trauelling at noone daies kept on his way without feare vntill he came to ROME, bringing darke night with him. And becauſe he could not paſſe ouer the bridge, for that the barbarous people kept watch vpon it: he wrapped ſuch clothes as he had about his necke) which were not many, nor heauy) & tooke the riuer, & ſwimming with theſe corcks he had brought, at the length he got ouer to the other ſide where the city ſtood. Then taking vp thoſe lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not, ſeeing fire, & hearing noiſe in other places, he wẽt to the gate Carmentale, wher he foũd more ſilence then in other places: on the which ſide alſo, the hill of the Capitoll was more ſteep & vpright, by reaſon of the great rocks that were hard to clime vp vpon. But he digged & crept vp ſo lõg amongſt thẽ, that he got vp with great paine vnto the wall of the fortres, on the which ſide alſo the enemy kept no watch: & ſaluting the watch of the Capitol, he told thẽ what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them, & brought him to the magiſtrats that ruled then. Who cauſed the Senate to aſſemble preſently, to whõ he told the news of Camillus victory, which they had not heard of before: & therewith alſo he did declare vnto them, the determination of the ROMAIN ſouldiers that were abroad, which was, to make Camillus their captain & generall, & did perſwade them alſo to grant him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad whõ the citizens gaue their conſents to obay. When they heard this al that were within the Capitol, conſulted therupon amongſt themſelues, & ſo did chuſe Camillus Dictator, & returned the meſſenger Pontius Cominius backe againe, the ſelfe ſame way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe was like vnto his cõming thither: for the enemies neuer ſaw him. And ſo he broght report to them that were abroad, of the Senats decree & conſent, wherof they were all maruellous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of general vpon him, & found there were twẽty thouſand good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further aide alſo of their allies and confederates, and prepared daily to goe and ſet vpon the enemies. So was Camillus choſen now Dictator the ſecond time, and went into the city of VEIES where he ſpake with the ROMAINE ſouldiers that were there, and leauied a great number of the allies beſides, to go fight with the enemies as ſoone as he could. But whileſt Camillus was thus a preparing, certaine of the barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chaunce on that ſide of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: ſpied in diuers places the printes of his feete and hands, as he had griped & gotten hold, ſtill digging to get vp, and ſaw the weeds & hearbs alſo growing vpon the rockes, and the earth in like manner flat troden downe. Whereupon they went preſently vnto the King to let him vnderſtand the ſame: who forthwith came to view the place. And hauing conſidered it well, he did nothing at that time: but when a darke night was come, he called a company of the lighteſt GAVLES together, and that vſed moſt to dig in mountaines, and ſaid vnto them. Our enemies them ſelues doe ſhew vs the way how to take them, which we could not haue found out but by them ſelues. For they hauing gone vp before vs, doe giue vs eaſily to vnderſtand, it is no impoſſible thing for vs to clime vp alſo. Wherefore we were vtterly ſhamed, hauing already begun well, if we ſhould faile alſo to end well: and to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were eaſie for one man alone, by cligging to clime vp to the height thereof: much leſſe is it hard for many to get vp one after another, ſo that one doe helpe another. Therefore Sirs, I aſſure you, thoſe that do take paines to get vp, ſhalbe honorably rewarded, according to their iuſt deſert. When the King had ſpoken theſe words vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it luſtily euery man to get vp: and about midnight, they began many of them to dig, and make ſteps vp to the rocke one after another, as ſoftly as could poſſibly, with catching hold the beſt they could, by the hanging of the rocke, which they found very ſteepe, but neuertheles eaſier to clime, then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the formoſt of them being come to the top of the rocke, were now ready to take the wall, and to ſet vpon the watch that ſlept: for there was neither man nor dog that heard them. It chanced then there were holy geeſe kept in the temple of Iuno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: but victuals being very ſtraight and ſcant at that time euen to find the men, the poore geeſe were ſo hard handled, & ſo litle regarded, that they were in manner ſtarued for lacke of meat. This fowle in deede naturally is very quicke of hearing, and ſo is ſhe alſo very fearefull by nature: and being in maner famiſhed with their hard allowance, they were ſo much the more waking and eaſier to be afraid. Vpon this occaſion therfore, they heard the comming of the GAVLES, and alſo began to run vp & down and cry for feare: with which noiſe they did wake thoſe that were within the caſtle. The GAVLES being bewraied by theſe fooliſh geeſe, left their ſtealing vpon them, and came in with all the open noiſe and terror they could. The ROMAINES hearing this larum, euery man tooke ſuch weapon as came firſt to his hand, and they ran ſodainely to reſcue that place from whence they vnderſtoode the noiſe: among thoſe, the formoſt man of all was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Conſul, who had a luſty body, and as ſtout a heart. His hap being to meete with two of the GAVLES together, as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knocke him on the head, he preuented him, and ſtrake off his hand with his ſword, and clapt his target on the others face ſo fiercely, that he threw him backward downe the rocke: and comming afterwards vnto the wall with others that ran thither with him, he repulſed the reſt of the GAVLES that were gotten vp, who were not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMAINS hauing eſcaped this danger, the next morning they threw the captaine down the rocks frō the caſtell, who had charge of the watch the night before: and gaue Manlius in recompence of the good ſeruice he had done, a more honourable then profitable reward, which was this. Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the country wheat, which they call Far, and the fourth part of the meaſure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile: and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of euery man by the day. After this repulſe, the GAVLES beganne to be diſcouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them, and durſt no more forage abroade in the fieldes for feare of Camillus: and partly alſo for that the plague came amongeſt them, being lodged amongeſt heapes of dead bodies, lying in euery place aboue ground without buriall,

The Gaules vexed with the plague at Rome and amongſt burnt houſes deſtroyed, where the aſhes being blowne very high by the winde and vehemency of heat, did giue a drie piercing aire, that did maruellouſly poiſon their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greateſt cauſe of all their miſchiefe was, the chaunge of their wonted dyet. Who comming out of a freſh countrie, where there were excellent pleaſant places to retire vnto, to auoide the diſcommoditie of the parching heate of the ſommer, were now in a naughtie plaine countrie for them to remaine in, in the latter ſeaſon of the yeare. All theſe things together did heape diſeaſes vpon them, beſides the long continuance of the ſiege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the ſeuenth moneth) by reaſon whereof there grew a maruellous death in their campe, through the great numbers of them that died dayly, and lay vnburied. But notwithſtanding all the death and trouble of the GAVLES, the poore beſieged ROMAINES were nothing holpen the more, the famine ſtill did grow ſo faſt vpon them. And becauſe they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were growne almoſt vnto a deſpaire: and ſend vnto him they could not, the GAVLES kept ſo ſtraight watch vpon them in the citie. Whereupon both parties finding themſelues in hard ſtate, firſt the watch of either ſide began to caſt out words of peace amongſt themſelues: and afterwards by cõſent of the heads, Sulpitius, Tribune of the ſoldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the ROMAINES ſhould pay a thouſand pound weight of golde, and that the GAVLES ſhould incontinently after the receipt of the ſame, depart out of their citie, and all their territories. This decree being paſſed by othe from both, the golde was brought. And when it came to be weyed, the GAVLES at the firſt priuily began to deale falſely with them: but afterwards they openly ſtaied the ballance, and would not let them wey no more, whereat the ROMAINES began to be angrie with them. Then Brennus, in ſcorne and mockerie, to deſpight them more, pluckt off his ſword, girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the golde was weied. Sulpitius ſeeing that, aſked him what he meant by it. Brennus anſwered him: what can it ſignifie elſe, but ſorow to the vanquiſhed? This worde euer after ranne as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouthes. Some of the ROMAINES tooke this vile part of theirs in ſuch ſcorne, that they would needes take the golde from them againe by force, and ſo returne into their holde, to abide the ſiege ſtill, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrarie, and thought it beſt with pacience to put vp this ſcorne of theirs, and not to thinke it was a ſhame to pay more then they had promiſed: but onely to pay it by compulſion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to thinke it rather neceſſary, then honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aſwell amongſt themſelues, as with the GAVLES: Camillus came to ROME gates with his armie, and vnderſtanding all what had paſſed betweene them, he commaunded the reſt of the armie to marche faire and ſoftly after him in good order, and he in the meane ſeaſon with the beſt choiſe men he had, went before with all ſpeed. Aſſoone as the other ROMAINES within the citie had ſpyed him, they ſhowted out for ioye, and receiued him euery one with great reuerence, without any more words, as their ſoueraigne captaine and prince, who had power ouer them all. And Camillus taking the golde out of the ſcales, gaue it vnto his men, and commaunded the GAVLES preſently to take vp their ſcales, and to get them going: for, ſaieth he, it is not the ROMAINES maner to keepe their countrey with golde, but with the ſworde. Then Brennus began to be hoate, and tolde him it was not honourablie done of him, to breake the accorde that had paſſed betweene them before by othe. Whereunto Camillus ſtoutly anſwered him againe, that accorde was of no validitie. For he being created Dictator before, all other officers and magiſtrates whatſoeuer, and their actes, by his election were made of no authoritie: and ſeeing therefore they had dealt with men, that had no power of themſelues to accorde to any matter, they were to ſpeake to him, if they required ought. For he alone had abſolute authoritie to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or elſe to puniſh them, and make their bodies aunſwer the damages and loſſe his countrey had by them ſuſtained. Theſe words made Brennus madde as a marche hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their ſwords of all ſides, and laide luſtely one at another as they could, within the houſes, and in open ſtreets, where they could ſet no battell in order. But Brennus ſodainly remembring himſelfe that it was no euen matche for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had loſt many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of ROME with all his army, & went to encampe himſelfe about a threeſcore furlong from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the citie of the GABIANS. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, & ſhewed at his campe by the breake of day. The ROMAINES hauing taken heart againe vnto them, did luſtily giue them battell: the ſame continued long, very cruell & doubtfull, vntill the GAVLES at the length were ouerthrowne, and their campe taken with great ſlaughter. As for thoſe that did eſcape the furie of the battell, they were killed, ſome by the ROMAINES ſelues, who hottely followed the chaſe after the battell broken: the reſidue of them, and the greateſt part, were ſlaine by thoſe of the cities and villages neere abouts, that did ſet vpon them as they fled ſcatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the city of ROME ſtrangely againe recouered, that was before ſtrangely wun and loſt, after it had continued ſeauen moneths in the hands of the barbarous people. For they entred ROME about the fifteenth day of Iuly: and they were driuen out againe, about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camillus triumphed as beſeemed him, and as one that had ſaued and deliuered his countrie out of the hands of their enemies, and ſet ROME againe at libertie. Thoſe that had bin abroade all the time of this ſiege, came into ROME againe, following his triumphing chariot: and thoſe that had bene beſieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue died by famine) went and preſented themſelues before him, and each one embraced other, in weeping wiſe for ioy. The prieſts and miniſters of the temples alſo, preſented their holy iewels, whole and vndefaced, which ſome of them had buried in the ground within the citie ſelfe: and others ſome had caried away with them, when they fled out of ROME. All theſe the people did as gladly ſee, as if the gods themſelues had returned home againe into their citie. After they had ſacrificed vnto the gods, & rendred them moſt humble thanks, & had purged their citie, as they had bene taught by men experienced in thoſe matters for ſatisfaction of the gods: Camillus began againe to builde vp the temples that were there before, harde by the which he built another new one alſo to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Ceditius heard the voice warne him of the comming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the prieſts great paine and trauaile, the ſcituations of theſe temples were with much a do found out againe. But when they were to builde againe all the reſt of the citie, that was wholly burnt, and deſtroyed to the grounde: the people had no minde to it, but euer ſhrinked backe, to put any hande to the worke, for that they lacked all things neceſſarie to beginne the ſame. Furthermore, weighing their late and long ſuſtained trouble and miſeries, they were fitter to take their eaſe and reſt, then to beginne new labour and toyle, to kill their hearts and bodies altogether. For, neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reache to the charge of it. Wherefore diſpoſing their mindes to dwell in the citie of VEIES, Which remained whole, vntouched, and furniſhed of all things to receiue them: they deliuered to the pratling Orators (whoſe tongues did neuer ceaſe to ſpeake placentia to the people) trimme occaſion to ſet this matter abroache. So they gaue good eare, and were willing to heare certaine ſeditious words ſpoken againſt Camillus, which were theſe. That for his priuate ambition he would depriue them of a citie well furniſhed already, and would againſt their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houſes, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, how he would make them to raiſe vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the people might call him, not onely captaine and generall of the ROMAINES, but the founder of ROME alſo, and ſo drowne Romulus honourable title thereof. The Senate conſidering of this matter, and fearing ſome tumult among the people: they would not ſuffer Camillus to leaue his Dictatorſhip before the end of the yeare, notwithſtanding no man euer enioyed that office aboue ſixe moneths. Then Camillus for his part did much endeuour himſelfe, to comfort and appeaſe the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their aunceſtours, and put them in minde alſo of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and ſanctified by King Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongſt many other tokens drawne out of holy and diuine things, he forgate not to bring for example, the head of a man found new and freſh, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as if that place by fatall deſtenie had bene once choſen to be the head and chiefe of all ITALIE. And moreouer, that the holy fier of the goddeſſe Veſta (which ſince the warres had bene kindled againe by the holy Veſtall Nunnes) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forſake their naturall citie, beſides the great ſhame and diſhonour it would be vnto them, to ſee it inhabited in time to come by vnknowne ſtrangers, or elſe to be left a common field and paſture, for beaſts and cattell to graze in. Such ſorowfull examples and griefes, the honeſt naturall borne cittizens, did euer blowe into the peoples eares, aſwell priuately, as openly. The people againe to the contrarie, did make their hearts to yerne for pittie, when they laide before their eyes their penurie, and pouertie they ſuſteined: and beſought them alſo not to enforce them to gather and ioyne together againe the broken peeces of a ſpoiled citie (as of a ſhipwrack that had caſt them naked into the ſea, hauing onely ſaued bare life and perſons) ſince that they had another citie neere at hand and ready to receiue them. So Camillus counſell was, that the Senate ſhould conſult vpon this matter, and deliuer their abſolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this counſell, he himſelfe brought forth many probable reaſons, why they ſhould not leaue in any caſe, the place of their naturall birth and countrey: and ſo did many other Senatours in like caſe, fauouring that opinion. Laſt of all, after theſe perſwaſions, he commaunded Lucius Lucretius (whoſe manner was to ſpeake firſt in ſuch aſſemblies) that he ſhould ſtand vp and deliuer his opinion, & that the reſt alſo in order as they ſat, ſhould ſay their mindes. So euery man keeping ſilence, as Lucretius was ready to ſpeake, at that preſent time there paſſed by their counſell houſe, a captaine with his bande that warded that day, who ſpake aloude to his enſigne bearer that went formoſt, to ſtay, and ſet downe his enſigne there: for, ſaid he, here is a very good place for vs to warde in. Theſe words being heard vp into the Senate houſe, euen as they ſtood all in a doubt and maze what would be the reſolution of this matter: Lucretius began to ſay, that he moſt humbly thanked the gods, and allowed of the captaines iudgement, and ſo euery one of the reſt in their order, ſaid as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull change and alteration of minde ſodainly among the common people: for euery man did perſwade and encourage his fellow liuely to put his hand to this worke. Inſomuch as tarying for no diuiſion or appointing out of ſtreetes, nor ſetting out euery man his place he ſhould build in: they fell to worke of all hands, euery one choſing that place he liked beſt, and was moſt commodious for their building, without any other order or diuiſion amongſt them. Whereupon, they running to this building on a head, the ſtreets were confuſed on heaps together, & their houſes all built out of order and vniformitie. For the report goeth, that the whole citie (aſwell common as priuate buildings) was built vp new againe in a yeare. But the ſurueiors, to whom Camillus had giuen charge to finde out all the holy places where the temples had bin ouerthrowne: as they went about mount Pallatine, they came by chance to the place, where the chappell of Mars had ſtood, which the GAVLES had wholy burnt and deſtroyed, as they had done all the reſt. They making cleane the place, and ſurueying euery corner, did finde by chance Romulus augures crooked ſtaffe hidden vnder a great mount of aſhes. This ſtaffe is crooked at one of the ends, and they call it Lituus, which ſoothſayers do vſe to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will beholde the flying of birdes to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this arte, did vſe this ſtaffe: and after he was taken away from all mens ſights, the prieſts tooke it, and kept it as a holy relique, ſuffering no creature to laye hands on it. Now they found this ſtaffe whole and vnbroken, where all things elſe were conſumed and periſhed by fire, they were in a maruellous ioy thereat. For they interpreted this to be a ſigne of the euerlaſting continuance of the citie of ROME. But before they could make an ende of all their building, there grew a new warre againe vpon them. For at one very inſtant, all the ÆQVES, the VOLSCES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and maine into the territories of the ROMAINES. The THVSCANS alſo went then and beſieged SVTRIVM, that was in league and amitie with the ROMAINES. The Tribuni militares got them ſtraight to the field with their armie, and encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES beſieged them ſo ſtraightly, that their army ſtood in great danger to be ouerthrowne, and they were driuen to ſend to ROME for a new ſupply. Thereupon the ROMAINES did chooſe Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occaſion of this warre is reported two manner of waies: whereof I will declare the firſt, which I do conceiue to be but a tale. They ſay the LATINES ſent vnto the ROMAINES, to demaund ſome of their free maides in mariage: which they did either to make a quartell of warre, or elſe as deſirous indeed, to ioyne both the peoples againe by new mariages. The ROMAINES were amazed very much at this, and ſore troubled, as not knowing how to aunſwer them, they were ſo affraid of warres. For they were yet ſcant new ſetled at home, and dreaded much leaſt this demaund of their daughters, was but a ſommons made to giue them hoſtages, which they finely cloaked vnder the name of alliance in mariage. Some ſay that there was at that time a bonde maide called Tutola, or as ſome ſay, Philotis, that went vnto the Senate, and counſelled them they ſhould ſend her away with ſome other faire maides ſlaues, dreſſed vp like gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuiſe, and choſe ſuch a number of bonde maides as ſhe deſired to haue, and trimming them vp in fine appatell, begawded with chaines of golde and iewels, they ſent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not farre from the citie. When night was come, the other maides hid their enemies ſwords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) did clime vp to the top of a wilde Fig tree, from which ſhe ſhewed a burning torche vnto the ROMAINES, hauing made ſhift to hange ſomwhat behinde her, to keepe the light from ſight of the enemies. For this ſignall the Senate of ROME had ſecretly appointed her to ſet vp, which was the cauſe that the iſſuing out of the ſouldiers being commaunded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being preſſed by their captaines, they called one another, and there was a great a do to put them in order of battell. Thus they went to take their enemies ſleeping, who nothing miſtruſting the ſame, were ſlaine the moſt part of them within their campe. This was done on the fift day of the moneth called then Quintilis, and now is named Iuly: at which time they do yet celebrate a certaine feaſt in remembrance of that acte. For firſt of all, going out of the city, they call aloude many of their fellowes names which are moſt common: as Caius Marcus, and Lucius, ſhewing thereby how one of them called another after that ſort, as they went in great haſt out of the citie. Afterwards all the maide ſeruants of the citie being trimly apparelled, go playing vp and downe the towne, pleaſantly ieaſting with thoſe they meete: and in the ende they make as though they fought together, in token that they did helpe the ROMAINES at that time to deſtroy the LATINES. Then they are feaſted, ſitting vnder bowers made with wilde figge tree boughes: and this feaſt day is called, Nonæ Capratinæ, by reaſon of the wilde figge tree (as ſome thinke) from the top whereof, the bond maide ſhewed to the ROMAINES the burning torche. For the ROMAINES call the wilde figge tree, Caprificus. Other ſay, that all theſe things are done and ſpoken, in remembrance of the miſchance that happened vnto Romulus, when he was taken out of their ſight, the ſame day without the gates of the citie, at which time there roſe a ſodaine miſt and darke cloude. Or as ſome other ſay, that then was the eclypſe of the ſunne: and they holde opinion that the day was named Nonæ Capratinæ, becauſe Capra in the ROMAINE tongue, ſignifieth a goate. Romulus vaniſhed out of mens ſights, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neere vnto the place which is called goat marſh, as we haue mentioned more at large in his life. The ſecond occaſion & beginning of this war (according to the opinion of moſt writers) was, that Camillus being choſen Dictator the third time, & knowing that the Trib. militares with their army were ſtraightly beſieged by the LATINES & VOLSCES: he was enforced to arme all the olde men, who for very age were priuiledged from further ſeruice in wars. And hauing fetched a great compaſſe about mount Martian, becauſe he would not be ſeene of his enemies, he came to lodge his campe behinde them, where he raiſed fiers, to make the ROMAINES know that were beſieged, how he was come: which as ſoone as they perceiued, they tooke to them courage againe, and determined to fight. But the LATINES & VOLSCES kept within their campe, & did entrenche and fortifie themſelues with a wall of wood, which they laid a croſſe, becauſe they ſaw they were beſet both before & behind: & determined to tary the releefe of a new ſupply, aſwel of their own, as of ſome further aide beſides frõ the THVSCANS, which thing Camillus perceiuing, & fearing leaſt they ſhould ſerue him, as he had already handled thẽ by cõpaſſing of him again behind: he thought it neceſſarie to preuent this. So conſidering the incloſure and fortification of their campe was all of wood, and that euery morning commonly, there came a great winde from the ſide of the mountaines, he made prouiſion of a number of fire brandes. And leading out his armie into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one part of them to giue charge vpon the enemies on the one ſide, with great noyſe and ſhouting: and he with the other part determined to raiſe fire on the contrarie ſide, from whence the winde ſhould come, looking for oportunitie to doe the ſame. When he ſaw the ſunne vp, and the winde beginning to whiſtle, blowing a good gale from the ſide of the hils, and that the skirmiſh was begunne on the other ſide: then he gaue a ſignall vnto the companie he led with him, to ſet vpon the enemies, and made them throw into the incloſure of their campe, diuers pots and dartes with fire, ſo that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this incloſure of wood, and trees laide ouerthwart, did rayſe ſtraight an exceeding great flame in the aire, & ſtill got way inwards into the LATINES camp. Whereupon the LATINES being vnprouided of preſent remedie to quench the flame, and ſeeing their campe a fire all about their eares: they gathered themſelues together at the firſt in a very ſmall roome. Neuertheleſſe, they were inforced in the end to get them into the field, and there they found their enemies readie armed, and in battell ray. So as few of thoſe eſcaped that came into the field, and their fellowes that remained within their campe, were burnt to death with fire, vntill the ROMAINES themſelues came to quench it for greedines of their ſpoile and goods. When all this was done, Camillus left his ſonne in the campe, to keepe the priſoners & ſpoiles: and he himſelfe, with the reſt of the armie, went to inuade his enemies country, where he tooke the citie of ÆQVES. Then after he had ouercome the VOLSCES, he led his armie preſently from thence vnto the citie of SVTRIVM. For he had not yet heard of their misfortune. Therefore he haſted himſelf to aide them, becauſe he thought they were yet beſieged by the THVSCANS. But ſuch was their hard fortune, that they had alreadie yeelded vp their citie by compoſition, & ſaued no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backs. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the way as they were wandring abroad, lamenting their miſerie, with their wiues and litle yong children: whoſe miſery went to the very hart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable ſtate. Furthermore, whē he ſaw the ROMAINES weepe for pitie alſo, to ſee the mone that theſe vnfortunate people made vnto him, and that it grieued them heartily to behold their great miſchaunce: he determined with himſelfe not to deferre reuenge, but preſently to goe the ſelfe ſame day before the citie of SVTRIVM, imagining that he ſhould find the THVSCANS out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good cheere, becauſe they had newly taken a wealthy rich citie, where they had left neuer an enemie in the ſame to hurt them, neither feared any abroad to come neere to aſſault them. And in deede it fell out rightly as he geſſed. For he had not only paſſed through the territories of the citie, without any intelligence giuen to the enemies within the ſame: but he was come to the verie gates, and had taken the walles, before they heard any thing of his comming, by reaſon they neither kept watch nor warde, but were diſpearſed abroad in the citie, in euery houſe, eating and drinking drunke together. Inſomuch as when they knew their enemies were alreadie within the citie, they were ſo ful fraught with meate and wine, that the moſt of their wits ſerued them not ſo much as to flie, but taried vntill they were ſlaine or taken, like beaſts in the houſes. Thus was the citie of SVTRIVM twiſe taken in one day. And it chaunced that thoſe which had wonne it, loſt it: and thoſe which had loſt it, recouered it againe by Camillus meanes. Who deſerued both the honour and entrie of triumph into ROME: the which wanne him no leſſe good will and glorie, then the two firſt before had done praiſe, and gotten fame. For euen his greateſt enemies that moſt ſpighted and enuied his former noble actes, aſcribing them rather to fortune that fauoured him, then to his valiantneſſe or worthineſſe: were forced now by this deede of his to confeſſe, that his wiſedome and valiantneſſe deſerued praiſe and commendation to the skies. Camillus of all his enemies had one moſt bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the firſt man that gaue the GAVLES the repulſe that night they had entered the walles of the Capitoll, and had thought to haue taken it: whereupon they gaue him the ſurname of Capitolinus. He aſpiring to be the chiefe of the citie, and finding no direct way to exceede the glorie of Camillus, tooke the broad high way of them that practiſe tyrannie. For hee beganne to flatter the common people, and ſpecially thoſe that were indebted: he tooke vpon him to defende their cauſes, and pleaded their caſe at the barre againſt their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debters out of the creditours handes and caried them away by force, that for lacke of abilitie to pay, were by rigour of the lawe condemned to be bond-ſlaues. But by this practiſe, in ſhort time he got him a maruellous number of ſuch needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honeſt citizens were affraide of the inſolent partes they played, and of the continuall troubles and tumultes they daily ſtirred vp in the market place. Therefore ſuſpecting the worſt in this caſe, they did chooſe Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who cauſed the ſaide Manlius immediatly to be apprehended, and committed him to priſon. Whereupon the people beganne to chaunge their apparell: which they were neuer wont to doe, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing leaſt ſome commotion would riſe hereupon, they did ſet him at libertie againe. He being thus out of priſon, was no whit the better, nor wiſer thereby, but did ſtill ſtirre vp the commons, more boldly and ſeditiouſly, then before. Then was Camillus choſen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accuſed in his time of office. But when this matter came to pleading, the ſight of the Capitoll troubled his accuſers much. For the very place it ſelfe where Manlius had repulſed the GAVLES by night, & defended the Capitoll, was eaſily ſeene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing: and he himſelfe pointing with his hand, ſhewed the place vnto the goddes, and weeping tenderly he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fighting for their ſafety. This did moue the iudges hearts to pitie, ſo as they knew not what to do, but many times they did put ouer the hearing of his caſe vnto another day, and neither would they giue iudgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifeſt proofes: neither could they vſe the ſeueritie of the law vppon him, becauſe the place of his ſo notable good ſeruice was euer ſtill before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cauſe of delay of iuſtice, did make the place of iudgement to be remoued without the citie, into a place called the wood Petelian, from whence they could not ſee the Capitoll. And there the accuſers gaue apparent euidence againſt him: & the iudges conſidering all his wicked practiſes, conceaued a iuſt cauſe to puniſh him, as he had deſerued. So they gaue ſentence of death againſt him: that he ſhould be caried to the mount Capitoll, and there to be throwne downe hedlong the rockes thereof. Thus, one, and the ſelfe place was a memorie of his notable good ſeruice, and alſo a memoriall of his miſerable and vnfortunate end. Beſides all this, they raſed his houſe, and built in the ſame place a temple to the goddeſſe they call Moneta: and made a lawe alſo, that no Patrician from thenceforth ſhould dwell any more in the mount Capitoll. Camillus after this, being called againe to take the office of Tribunus militaris the ſixth time: he ſought to excuſe him ſelfe aſwell for that he ſaw he was well ſtept in yeares, as alſo for that he feared fortunes ſpight, or ſome miſhappe, after he had obteined ſuch glorie for his noble actes and ſeruice. Howbeit the moſt apparent cauſe of his excuſe, was his ſickneſſe, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allow no excuſe by any meanes, but cryed out, they did not deſire he ſhould fight a foote nor a horſe backe, but that he ſhould onely giue counſell, and commaund: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, againſt their enemies the PRÆNESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who ioyning together, did inuade the confines of the ROMAINES friendes. So he led his army out immediatly to the field, and camped as neere the enemie as he could: being minded for his part to draw the wars out in length, that he might fight afterwardes (if neede required) when he had recouered ſtrength. But Furius contrarily coueting glorie, was wholly bent to hazard the battell, whatſoeuer perill came of it: and to this end he ſturred vp, and incouraged the captaines of euery priuate band. Wherfore Camillus fearing leaſt they ſhould thinke, for ill will he bare the yong men, that he went about to hinder and take away the meanes to winne their honour, and to doe ſome noble act: ſuffered Furius againſt his will to put his men in order of battell, and he in the meane ſeaſon by reaſon of his ſickneſſe, remained with a few about him in the campe. So went Lucius vpon a head to preſent battell to the enemie, and ſo was he as headily alſo ouerthrowen. But Camillus hearing the ROMAINES were ouerthrowen: ſicke as he was vpon his bedde, got vp, and taking his houſholde ſeruantes with him, he went in haſte to the gates of the campe, and paſſed through thoſe that fled, vntill he came to meete with the enemies that had them in chaſe. The ROMAINES ſeeing this that were alreadie entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and thoſe that fled alſo without, when they ſaw him, they gathered together, and put themſelues againe in array before him, and perſwaded one another not to forſake their Captaine. So their enemies hereupon ſtaied their chaſing, and would purſue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his armie into the field, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victorie hard, he entred amongeſt them that fled into their campe pelmel, or hande ouerhead, and ſlew the moſt part of them euen there. After this victorie, he was aduertiſed howe the THVSCANS had taken the citie of SVTRIVM, and had put to the ſword all the inhabitants of the ſame, which were the ROMAINES citizens. Whereupon he ſent to ROME the greateſt part of his armie, and keeping with him the lighteſt and luſtieſt men, went and gaue aſſault vnto the THVSCANS, that now were harbored in the citie of SVTRIVM. Which when he had wonne againe, he ſlew part of them, and the other ſaued themſelues by flight. After this, he returned to ROME with an exceeding ſpoyle, confirming by experience, the wiſedome of the ROMAINES, who did not feare the age nor ſickneſſe of a good captaine that was expert and valiant: but had choſen him againſt his will, though he was both olde and ſicke, and preferred him farre before the younger and luſtier that made ſute to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THVSCVLANIANS were reuolted they ſent Camillus thither againe, willing him of fiue other companions to take out one he liked beſt, euery of the which deſired to be choſen, and made their ſute vnto him for the ſame. But he refuſing all other, did chuſe againe Lucius Furius beyonde all expectation of men, ſeeing not long before he needes would againſt his will hazard battell, in which he was ouerthrowen. Howbeit Camillus, hauing a deſire (as I thinke) to hide his fault and ſhame he had receaued: did of courteſie preferre him before all other. Now the THVSCVLANIANS hearing of Camillus cōming againſt them, ſubtilly ſought to colour the fault they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the fields, ſome to plowe, other to keepe the beaſtes, as if they had bene in beſt peace: and did ſet the gates of the citie wide open, ſent their children openly to ſchoole, their artificers wrought their occupation in their ſhops, the men of hauiour and honeſt citizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, and the officers and gouernours of the citie went vp and downe to euery houſe, commaunding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMAINES, as if they had ſtood in no feare at all, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit all theſe fine fetches could not make Camillus beleeue, but that they had an intent to rebell againſt the ROMAINES: yet they made Camillus pittie them, ſeeing they repented them of that they had determined to doe. So he commaunded them to goe to ROME to the Senate, to craue pardon for their fault: and he himſelfe did helpe them, not only to purge their citie of any intent of rebellion, but alſo to get them the priuiledge and freedome of ROME. And theſe be the chiefeſt actes Camillus did in the 6. time of his tribuneſhippe. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great ſedition in the citie, betwene the common people, and the Senate. For he would in any caſe that of the two Conſuls, which were choſen yerely, the one of them ſhould be a commoner, and not that both of them ſhould be of the auncient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were choſen, but the election of the Conſuls, the people ſtayed: ſo that the common wealth went to decaie: and declined to greater troubles, then euer it did before, for lacke of gouernment. But to ſuppreſſe this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was ſore againſt his will, becauſe it miſliked the people much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing ſerued vnder him in many warres and battels, might boldly, and truely ſay vnto him: that he had done more notable actes by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace. Yet was he created Dictator in deſpight, to rule the people, and of enuie in the noble men towardes them. Thus neceſſitie did vrge him, either by force to ſuppreſſe the people, if he were the ſtronger in this diſſention: or els that he himſelfe ſhould be ſuppreſſed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithſtanding, preparing to preuent this miſchiefe, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the paſſing of their

Camillus created Dictator the fourth time law by voyces of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations ſet vpon poſtes, that the ſame very day he would muſter the people, and all was but to drawe them from the market place into the field of Mars, and did ſet great penalties vpon thoſe that ſhould be lacking at the muſters, and would preſume to diſobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrary part, did withſtande his threates, and ſware they would condemne Camillus ſelfe in fiftie thouſand Drachmas of ſiluer, if he did not let the people alone, but would goe about to diſturbe them for giuing their voyces to ſuch law, as they liked of. Camillus perceiuing this, and fearing to be condemned, and baniſhed once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being nowe an old man, and one that had done ſo many great and notable actes, or elſe for that he thought him ſelfe not ſtrong enough to withſtand the force of the people: he kept his houſe that day, ſayning himſelfe to be ſicke, and certaine other dayes following, and in the ende he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate choſe in his place another Dictator, who named the ſame Licinius Stolo generall of the horſe men, that was the author and furtherer of all this ſedition: and beſides did ſuffer him to preferre another law, and to paſſe it by voyces of the people, that aboue all other lawes, did moſt trouble the Patricians. Which law did forbid any citizen of ROME, to haue, or occupie aboue fiue hundred iugera, which amount to 330. acres and a halfe, 12. pole, and 121. partes of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloft, and of great eſtimation at that time: for that he had in deſpight of the Senate eſtabliſhed this law. Howbeit ſhortly after it was found out, that himſelfe had more number of acres then his owne lawe permitted. By reaſon whereof, he receiued the iuſt puniſhment of his owne deuiſed forfaiture. Yet the moſt weightie matter of all this diſſention that beganne firſt, and moſt of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Conſuls, remained ſtill vndetermined. But while theſe matters were thus in talke, the ROMAINES had certain intelligence, how the GAVLES were departed once againe from the Adriatick ſea, & were cōming with a great power ſtraight vnto ROME: vpon report of which newes, the warres followed immediatly. For the GAVLES deſtroyed the champion countrie as they went: and the poore countrie men that could not recouer ROME, were ſcattered here & there amongeſt the mountaines. The feare of this did ſomwhat appeaſe the diſſention. The people then aſſembling with the Senate, and the baſer ſort with the noble, did all with one voyce and aſſent chuſe Camillus Dictator the fift time. He was now a very old man, lacking litle of foure ſcore yeares: but neuertheleſſe, conſidering the neceſſity and preſent daunger, without framing any excuſe, or ſtarting as he had before, he vndertooke the charge. Now that he had taken it vpon him, he preſently leauied men, and prepared his armie. And knowing very well how the fierceneſſe of theſe barbarous GAVLES conſiſted, in downe right blowes with their ſwordes, with which they would ſtrike off heads and ſhoulders of men at a blow, mangling them like butchers, without any caſt or ſkill of fight: hee cauſed iron ſallets, and morians to be made for the moſt of his men, as ſmoothly wrought on the out ſide as could be, that their ſwords lighting on them, ſhould either ſlide off, or breake. Moreouer, he cauſed their ſhields to haue bars made about them of copper, becauſe the wood ſelfe was not able to abide ther blowes. Furthermore, he did teach his ſouldiers to carie long iauelines or punchion ſtaues, wherewith they might wound their enemies lifting vp their ſwords to ſtrike them. Now when the GAVLES were come neere ROME, hauing pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Anian, and being full loden and ſtuffed with all kinds of ſpoyle and booties: then Camillus brought his armie alſo into the field, and went to lodge on a little hill which was eaſie to get vpon, where there were many litle caues, ſo that the moſt of his armie was all hidden and couered, and thoſe that were ſeene, ſeemed to be retired thither into thoſe high places for an aduantage, and of feare. Camillus to increaſe this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder: did ſuffer them to come and ſpoyle euen to the foot of the hill where he was lodged, and ſtirred not once out to trouble them, but kept himſelf quiet in his campe and well fortified. Vntill ſuch time as he ſpied occaſion of aduantage, that the beſt part of their armie were ſcattered here and there, a forraging all about the fields: and thoſe which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drinking as they vſed careleſly at all houres. Then Camillus ſent very early before day, his lighteſt armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in comming out of their campe, and to let them in any caſe from putting their men in order of battell: and he at the breake of day, came downe into the plaine, and did ſet his other men being well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and luſty fellowes, and were not as the barbarous people thought, few, and fearefull. This at the very firſt diſcouraged the hearts of the GAVLES maruellouſly, becauſe they thought them ſelues diſhonored, that the ROMAINES ſhould charge them firſt. Afterwardes alſo Camillus vantguard did ſet vppon the GAVLES, and that on a ſodaine, before they had leyſure to put them ſelues in battell, or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chaunce. In the end alſo, Camillus came vpon the necks of them, with all his whole force, and army together: againſt whom they ranne notwithſtanding, holding vp their naked ſwordes aloft in their handes. But the ROMAINES thruſting with their armed iauelings, receiued their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby ſo rebated the edges of their ſwordes (their blades being very ſharpe and thinne ground, and of ſo ſoft a temper) that they bowed againe, and ſtoode crooked vnreaſonably: and furthermore, hauing pierced their ſhieldes through with their punching ſtaues, the GAVLES armes were ſo clogd and wearied with them, the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their ſwordes and ſhieldes, and flying in, cloſed with the ROMAINES, and caught hold of their iauelings, thinking by plaine force to haue wreſted them out of their handes. Howbeit they perceiuing then the GAVLES were naked, fell ſtraight to their ſwordes: and ſo was the ſlaughter of their firſt rankes very great. The other fled ſcatteringly here and there, all about the plaine: becauſe Camillus had cauſed all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and poſſeſſed. Neither did they retire towardes their campe, for that it was vnfortified, and alſo knew well enough it would be eaſily taken. This battell (as they ſay) was thirteene yeares after their taking of ROME before. But after that field, the ROMAINES courages were good enough againſt theſe barbarous GAVLES, whom they ſtoode in feare of before: thinking the firſt time they came, that they had not ouercome them by force, but by reaſon of the plague that fell amongeſt them, or through ſome other ſtraunge chaunce. For they did ſo feare them at that time, that they made a law, how their prieſtes ſhould be exempted from warres, ſo it were not againſt the GAVLES. This ouerthrow was the laſt marſhall act Camillus did in the warres. For, the taking of the city of VELITRES, was an accident depending vpon this iourney: becauſe they yeelded ſtraight vnto him, without ſtriking any ſtroke. But the ſeditiouſneſſe of the people of ROME about gouernment, and the chooſing of the yeare Conſuls, was the hardeſt matter he euer had in hand. For they returning home to ROME ſtrong, and of great power, by their late obtained victory: would in any caſe haue one of the Conſuls to be choſen of a commoner, which was directly againſt their ancient cuſtome. But the Senate ſtoutly withſtood it, and would not ſuffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authority, which was great then, that they ſhould maintaine and continue their auncient dignity, and prerogatiue of their nobility. But as Camillus was ſet in his chaire in the market place, where he heard and diſpatched cauſes: there came a ſergeant to him, ſent from the Tribunes of the people, who commaunded him to follow him, and there withall laide violent handes vppon him, as hee would haue caried him away by force. This made ſuch a terrible tumult and vprore, that the like was neuer ſeene before in the market place. For Camillus friendes draue the ſergeant backe behind the chaire. The common people cried out againe to the ſergeant from beneath, pull him out of his chaire. This ſo amazed Camillus, that he knew not wel what to ſay to the matter. Notwithſtanding, he would not reſigne vp his office, but taking thoſe Senators he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept. And there, before he would goe into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, and made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would pleaſe them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and ſo made a ſolemne vow and promiſe (if theſe tumultes and troubles might bee pacified) that hee would builde a temple of Concord. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diuerſity of opinions among them: yet in the end, the eaſieſt way did cary it, and that was to graunt the common peoples deſire, that a commoner ſhould be choſen Conſull with a noble man. The Dictator hauing openly publiſhed to the people the Senates decree, confirming their deſire: the common people were ſo ioyfull, that at that preſent they let fall all their malice againſt the Nobility and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his houſe, with great ſhouts of ioy, and clapping of hands. The next morning all the people being aſſembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of concord ſhould be built at the common wealths charge (according to the vow Camillus had made) in ſuch a place, as it might be ſeene from the market place ſelfe, where all the aſſemblies for matters of counſell were made. And further, it was ordered that one day more ſhould be added to the feaſts of the LATINES: and that from thenceforth they ſhould ſolemnize foure feſtiuall daies, and ſhould preſently make generall ſacrifices vnto the goddes, in euery temple of the city, to giue them thankes: and in tokē of ioy, they ſhould all weare garlands vpon their heads for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were choſen two Conſuls, Marcus Æmilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or commoners. And this was the laſt act that euer Camillus did. For the next yeare after the plague was in ROME, and tooke away an infinite number of people that died, beſides many magiſtrates and officers of the citie that departed: among whom, Camillus alſo left his life. Who notwithſtanding he had liued a long time, and had ended a reaſonable courſe of life: yet he was as ready to die, and as patiently tooke his death, as any man liuing could haue done. Moreouer, the ROMAINS made more mone & lamentation for his death alone, then for al the reſt the plague had already conſumed.

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

CÆSAR ſeing in ROME one day certaine rich and wealthy ſtraungers, hauing litle dogs and munkeys in their armes, and that they made maruellous much of them, he asked them if the women in their country had no children: wiſely reproouing them by this queſtion, for that they beſtowed their natural loue and affection vpon brute beaſts, which they ſhould with all kindneſſe and loue beſtow vpon creatures. Nature in like caſe alſo, hauing planted in our mindes a naturall deſire to learne and vnderſtand, we are in reaſon to reproue thoſe that vainely abuſe this good deſire, fondly diſpoſing it ſing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable : and to caſt behinde them in the meane ſeaſon thinges honeſt and neceſſary to be learned. For as touching our outward ſenſe, which with paſſion receiueth impreſſion of the thing it ſeeth, peraduenture it will be neceſſary to conſider indifferently the thing ſeene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull vnto him: but ſo fareth it not with our vnderſtanding, for euery man may at his pleaſure turne and diſpoſe that to the thing he taketh delight in, the reaſon whereof we muſt alwaies imploy to the beſt part, and that not only to conſider and looke vpon the thing, but alſo to reape the benefit and commodity of the thing we ſee. For like as the eie is moſt delighted with the lighteſt and freſheſt colours: euen ſo we muſt giue our minds vnto thoſe ſightes, which by looking vpon them do draw profit and pleaſure vnto vs. For ſuch effects doth vertue bring: that either to heare or read them, they do print in our hearts an earneſt loue and deſire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we eſteeme, neither are we alwaies diſpoſed to deſire to do the thinges we ſee well done: but contrary oftentimes, when we like the worke, we miſlike the workeman, as cōmonly in making theſe perfumes and purple colours. For both the one & the other do pleaſe vs well: but yet we take perfumers and diers to be men of a meane occupation. Therfore Antiſthenes anſwered one very wiſely, that told him Iſmenias was an excellent player of the flute. But yet he is a naughty mā, ſayd he: otherwiſe he could not be ſo cunning at the flute as he is. Euen ſo did Philip king of MACEDON ſay to his ſonne Alexander the great on a time: that at a certaine feaſt had ſung paſſing ſweetly, and like a maiſter of muſicke. Art thou not aſhamed ſon to ſing ſo well? It is enough for a King to beſtow his leiſure ſomtime to hear muſitians ſing, & he doth much honor to the Muſes to heare the maſter of the ſcience otherwhile, when one of them ſingeth to excell another. But he that perſonally ſhall beſtow his time, exerciſing any meane ſcience: bringeth his paines he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a witneſſe againſt himſelfe, to proue that he hath bene negligent to learne thinges honeſt and profitable. And there was neuer any yong gentleman nobly borne, that ſeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the city of PISA) deſired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for ſeeing of Iuno in the city of ARGOS: nor that deſired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleaſure ſomtime to read their works. For it followeth not of neceſſity, that though the worke delight, the workeman muſt needs be prayſed. And ſo in like caſe, ſuch thinges doe not profite thoſe which behold them, becauſe they doe not moue affection in the hearts of the beholders to follow them, neither doe ſtirre vp affection to reſemble them, and much leſſe to conforme our ſelues vnto them. But vertue hath this ſingular property in all her actions: that ſhee maketh the man that knoweth her to affect her ſo, that ſtraight he liketh all her doings, and deſireth to follow thoſe that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only deſire to haue them in poſſeſſion: but of vertue, we chiefely loue the deeds. Wherefore we are contented to haue goods from other men : but good deeds we would other ſhould haue from vs. For vertue is of this power, that ſhe alureth a mans mind preſently to vſe her, that wiſely conſidereth of her, & maketh him very deſirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderſtanding and knowledge of vertuous deedes, which ſodainely bringeth vnto him a reſolute deſire to do the like. And this is the reaſon, why me thought I ſhould continue ſtill to write on the liues of noble men, & why I made alſo this tenth booke: in the which are contained the liues of Pericles and Fabius Maximus, who maintained wars againſt Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many ſundry vertues, and ſpecially in curteſie and iuſtice: and for that they could patiently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were maruellous profitable members for their country. But, if we haue ſorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you ſhall eaſily iudge that read our writings of their liues. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the towne of CHOLARGVS, and one of the beſt and moſt ancient families of the city of ATHENS, both by his father and mother. For Xantippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA in the ~~iourney~~ battle of Mycala) maried Agariſte that came of Cliſthenes, he who draue out of ATHENS Piſiſtratus ofſpring, and valiantly ouerthrew their tyranny. Afterwardes he eſtabliſhed lawes, and ordained a very graue forme of gouernment, to maintaine his citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariſt dreamed one night that ſhe was brought to bed of a Lion: and very ſhortly after ſhe was deliuered of Pericles, who was ſo well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, ſauing that his head was ſomewhat too long and out of proportion to the reſt of his body. And this is the only cauſe why all the ſtatues and images of him almoſt, are made with a helmet of his head: becauſe the workmen as it ſhould ſeeme (and ſo it is moſt likely) were willing to hide the blemiſhe of his deformity. But the ATTICAN Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to ſay, headed like an onion. For thoſe of ATTICA doe ſometime name that which is called in the vulgar tongue Scilla, that is to ſay, an onion of Barbarie: Schinos. And Cratinus the Comicall Poet in his comedy hee entituled Chirones, ſayd:

Olde Saturne he, and dreadfull dire debate
begotten haue, betweene them Carnally,
this tyrant here, this heauy iolting pate,
in court of goddes ſo tearmed worthely.

And againe alſo in that which he nameth Nemeſis, ſpeaking of him, he ſaieth:

Come Iupiter, come Iupiter,
Come iolt-head, and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him alſo, ſayeth in a place:

Sometimes he ſtands, amazed when he perceiues,
that hard it were, ſufficiently to know,
in what eſtate, his gouernment he leaues.
And then will he, be ſeldome ſeene by low,
ſuch heauie heapes, within his braines do grow.
But yet ſometimes, out of that monſtrous pate,
he thundreth faſt, and threatneth euery ſtate.

And Eupolis in a comedy which he intituled Demi: being very inquiſitiue, and asking particularly of euery one of the Orators (whom he fained were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the laſt man vnto him, he ſaide:

Truely thou haſt now brought, vnto vs here that dwell, the chiefe of all the captaines, that come from darkſome hell.

Pericles ſtudies and teachers.

And as for muſicke, the moſt authors write, that Damon did teach him muſicke, of whoſe name (as men ſay) they ſhould pronounce the firſt ſyllable ſhort. Howbeit Ariſtotle ſaieth, that he was taught muſicke by Pythoclides. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderſtanding, and ſubtill in matters of gouernment: for, to hide from the people his ſufficiency therein, he gaue it out he was a muſitian, and did reſort vnto Pericles as a maſter wreſtler, or fenſer: but he taught him how he ſhould deale in matters of ſtate. Notwithſtanding, in the end he could not ſo cunningly conuay this matter, but the people ſaw his harping and muſicke, was only a viſer to his other practiſe: wherefore they did baniſhe him ATHENS for fiue yeares, as a man that buſily tooke vpon him to change the ſtate of thinges, and that fauoured tyranny. And this gaue the Comicall Poets matter to play vpon him finely, among which Plato in a comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him:

O Chiron, tell me firſt: art thou indeede the man,
which did inſtruct Pericles thus? make aunſwer if thou can.

Zenon Eleatean.

He was ſometime alſo ſcholler to the Philoſopher Zenon, who was borne in the city of ELEA, and taught naturall philoſophy, as Parmenides did: but his profeſſion was to thwart and contrary all men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his diſputation, which were ſo intricate, that his aduerſary replying againſt him, knew not how to aunſwer him, nor to conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliaſius witneſſeth in theſe words:

Zenon was ſubtill ſure, and very eloquent,
and craftily could winde a man, by way of argument,
if ſo he were diſpoſed, his cunning to deſcrie,
or ſhew the ſharpneſſe of his wit, to practiſe pollicy.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was moſt familiar and conuerſaunt with him, and did put in him the maieſtie and grauitie he ſhewed in all his ſayings,and doings, who did farre excell the common courſe of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be ſhort, he it was that did faſhion his manners, altogether to carie that graue countenance which he did. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nûs, as much to ſay, as vnderſtanding. Either becauſe they had his ſingular wit and capacitie in ſuch great admiration, being growne to ſearch out the cauſe of naturall things: or that he was the firſt man, who did aſcribe the diſpoſition and gouernement of this world, not vnto fortune or fatall neceſſitie, but vnto a pure,ſimple,and vnderſtanding minde, which doth ſeparate at the firſt mouing cauſe, the ſubſtance of ſuch like parts as are medled and compounded of diuerſe ſubſtances, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruellous much of Anaxagoras, who had fully inſtructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of thoſe ſpecially that worke aboue in the ayre and firmament.For he grew not only to haue a great minde and an eloquent tongue,without any affectation, or groſſe countrie termes: but to a certaine modeſt countenance that ſcantly ſmiled,very ſober in his gate, hauing a kinde of ſound in his voyce that he neuer loſt nor altered, and was of very honeſt behauiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that croſſed him,and many other ſuch like things, as all that ſaw them in him,and conſidered them,could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof, the report goeth, there was a naughty buſie fellow on a time,that a whole day together did nothing but raile vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous words he could vſe. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a worde againe, diſpatching in the meane time matters of importance he had in hand, vntill night came, that he went ſoftly home to his houſe,ſhewing no alteration nor ſemblance of trouble at all,though this lewd varlet followed him at the heeles,with words of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his owne doores,being darke night,he commaunded one of his men to take a torche, and to bring this man home to his houſe. Yet the Poet Ion ſaieth, that Pericles was a very proude man, and a ſtately,and that with his grauitie and noble minde, there was mingled a certaine ſcorne and contempt of other: and contrarilie, he greatly praiſeth the ciuillitie, humanitie,and courteſie of Cimon,becauſe he could faſhion himſelfe to all companies. But letting paſſe that which the Poet Ion ſaid: who would that vertue ſhould be full of tragicall diſcipline, bringing in with it,a certaine ſatyricall diſcourſe to mooue laughter. Now Zennon contrariwiſe did counſell all thoſe, that ſaid Pericles grauitie was a preſumption, and arrogancie: that they ſhould alſo follow him in his preſumption. For, to counterfaite in that ſort things honeſt and vertuous, doth ſecretly with time breed an affection and deſire to loue them, and afterwards with cuſtome euen effectually to vſe and follow them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras companie,did not onely profit himſelfe in theſe things, but he learned beſides to put away all ſuperſtitious feare, of celeſtiall ſignes and impreſſions ſeene in the ayre. For to thoſe that are ignorant of the cauſes thereof, ſuch ſights are terrible, and to the godly alſo fearefull, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, becauſe they haue no certaine knowledge of the reaſon that naturall Philoſophie yeeldeth,which in ſtead of a fearfull ſuperſtition, would bring a true religion accompanied with aſſured hope of goodneſſe. Some ſay a man brought Pericles one day from his farme out of the countrie, a Rammes head that had but one horne, and that the prognoſticator Lampon conſidering this head, that had but one ſtrong horne in the middeſt of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the ſignification thereof. That being two tribes and ſeuerall factions in the citie of ATHENS touching gouernement, the one of Pericles,and the other of Thucydides: the power of both ſhould be brought into one, and ſpecially into his part, in whoſe houſe this ſigne did happen. Further, it is ſaid that Anaxagoras being preſent, did cauſe the Rammes head to be clouen in two peeces, and ſhewed vnto them that ſtood by, that the braine of this Ramme did not fill the panne of his naturall place, but incloſed it ſelfe in all parts, being narrowe like the pointe of an egge, in that parte where the horne tooke his firſt roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruellouſlie eſteemed at that preſent by all thoſe that ſtood by: but ſo was Lampon, ſoone after that Thucydides was driuen away, and that the gouernment of the whole commonweale fell into the hands of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall Philoſopher and the prognoſticator did rightly meete together in troth: the one directly telling the cauſe, and the other the end of the euent as it fell out. For the profeſſion of the one, is to know how it commeth: and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to foretell what it betokeneth. For where ſome ſay, that to ſhew the cauſe, is to take away the ſignification of the ſigne: they do not conſider that in ſeeking to aboliſh by this reaſon the wonderfull tokens and ſignes in the ayre, they do take away thoſe alſo which are done by arte. As the noiſe of baſons, the lights of fire by the ſea ſide, and the ſhadowes of needles or points of dyals in the ſunne: all which things are done by ſome cauſe and handiworke, to be a ſigne and token of ſome thing. But this argument peraduenture may ſerue better in another booke. And now againe to Pericles.

Whileſt he was yet but a young man, the people ſtood in awe of him, becauſe he ſomwhat reſembled Piſiſtratus in his countenance: and the ancienteſt men of the citie alſo were much afeard of his ſoft voyce, his eloquent tongue, and ready vtterance, becauſe in thoſe he was Piſiſtratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very riche and wealthie, and of one of the nobleſt families of the citie, and thoſe were his friends alſo that caried the onely ſway and authoritie in the ſtate: whereupon, fearing leaſt they would baniſh him with the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon, he would not medle with gouernement in any caſe, although otherwiſe he ſhewed himſelfe in warres very valiant and forward, and feared not to venter his perſon. But after that Ariſtides was dead, that Themiſtocles was driuen away, and that Cimon being euer in ſeruice in the warres as generall in forraine countries, was a long time out of GRECE: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of the poore communaltie, aboue the ſmall number of Nobilitie and riche men, the which was directly againſt his nature.

Pericles firſt beginning to deale in the commonwealth

For of himſelfe he was not popular, nor meanly giuen: but he did it as it ſhould ſeeme) to auoide ſuſpicion, that he ſhould pretend to make him ſelfe King. And becauſe he ſaw Cimon was inclined alſo to take part with the Nobilitie, and that he was ſingularly beloued and liked of all the honeſter ſort: he to the contrarie enclined to the common people, purchaſing by this meanes ſafetie to himſelfe, and authoritie againſt Cimon.

So he preſently began a new courſe of life, ſince he had taken vpon him to deale in matters of ſtate: for they neuer ſawe him afterwards at any time go into the citie, but to the market place, or to the Senate houſe. He gaue vp going to all feaſts where he was bidden, and left the entertainment of his friends, their company and familiaritie. So that in all his time wherein he gouerned the commonweale, which was a long time, he neuer went out to ſupper to any of his friends, vnleſſe it were that he was once at a feaſt at his nephew Eury-ptolemus mariage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremonie was a doing, when they offer wine to the goddes, and ſo he roſe from the table. For theſe friendly meetings at ſuch feaſts, do much abaſe any counterfaite maieſtie or ſet countenance: and he ſhall haue much a do to keepe grauitie and reputation, ſhewing familiaritie to euery knowne friend in ſuch open places. For in perfect vertue, thoſe things truely are euer moſt excellent, which be moſt common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto ſtrangers, then their dayly conuerſation is to their friends. Pericles nowe to preuent that the people ſhould not be glutted with ſeeing him too oft, nor that they ſhould come much to him: they did ſee him but at ſome times, and then he would not talke in euery matter, neither came much abroade among them, but reſerued him ſelfe (as Critolaus ſaied they kept the SALAMINIAN galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importance.

And in the meane ſeaſon, in other matters of ſmall moment, he dealt by meanes of certaine orators his familiar friends, amongſt whom Ephialtes (as they ſay) was one: he who tooke away the authoritie and power from the courte of Areopagus, and did giue too much libertie to the people, as Plato ſayed. Vpon which occaſion, as the Comicall poets ſay, he became ſo ſtoute and head ſtrong, that they could no more holde him backe, then a young vnbrideled colte: and tooke ſuch a courage vpon him, that he would obay no more, but inuaded the Ile of EVBOEA, and ſet vpon the other Ilands. Pericles alſo becauſe he would faſhion a phraſe of ſpeache, with a kinde of ſtile altogether agreeable to the manner of life and grauitie he had taken vpon him: he gaue himſelfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, ſhadowing his reaſons of naturall philoſophie, with artificiall rethoricke. For hauing obteined a deepe vnderſtanding by ſtudying of Philoſophie, and a ready way effectually to ende any matter, he vndertooke to prooue (beſides that nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacitie, as the diuine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ſerue his purpoſe) he did ſo artificially compaſſe it with eloquence, that he farre paſſed all the orators in his time. And for this cauſe was he (as they ſay) ſurnamed Olympius, as much to ſay, as heauenly or diuine. But ſome are of opinion he had that ſurname, by reaſon of the common buildings and ſtately workes he raiſed vp in the citie of ATHENS, that did much ſet forth the ſame. Other thinke it was giuen him for his great authoritie and power he had in gouernment, aſwell in warres, as in peace. But it is no maruell that this glorie was giuen him, conſidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the commedies the Poets cauſed to be plaied in thoſe times (in which there were many wordes ſpoken of him, ſome in earneſt, ſome in ſporte and ieaſt) do witneſſe that he had that ſurname giuen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundered and lightened in his oration to the people, and that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an aunſwer Thucydides, Mileſius ſonne, ſhould pleaſantly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydides was a noble man, and had long time contended againſt Pericles in matters of the commonweale. Archidamus, king of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Pericles wreſtled beſt. Thucydides made him aunſwer. When I haue giuen him an open fall before the face of the world, he can ſo excellently denie it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all, and perſwadeth them the contrarie of that they ſawe. Notwithſtanding he was euer very graue and wiſe in ſpeaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to ſpeake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the gods, that nothing might eſcape his mouthe, but that he might conſider before whether it would ſerue the purpoſe of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnleſſe it be ſome fewe lawes he made, and but very few of his notable ſayings are brought to light, ſaue onely theſe. He ſaid on a time that they muſt take away the citie of ÆGINA, becauſe it was a ſtrawe lying in the eye of the hauen PIRÆA. And another time, he ſaid that he ſaw the warres a farre off, comming from PELOPONNESVS. Another time, as he tooke ſhip with Sophocles (his companion in commiſſion with him as generall of the armie) who commended a faire young boye they met as they came to the hauen: Sophocles, ſaid he, a gouernour muſt not onely haue his hands, but alſo his eyes cleane. And Steſimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the praiſe of thoſe that were ſlaine in the warre of SAMOS: he ſaid they were immortall as the gods. For we do not ſee the goddes (ſaid he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happineſſe they enioy, we do coniecture they are immortall: and the ſame things are in thoſe that dye in ſeruice, and defence of their countrie. Now where Thucydides doth write the gouernment of the commonweale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobilitie, and yet had apparaunce of a popular ſtate: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, becauſe one alone did rule and gouerne the whole ſtate. And many other ſay alſo, he was the firſt that brought in the cuſtome to deuide the enemies lands wunne by conqueſt among the people, and of the common money to make the people ſee playes and paſtimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this cuſtome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing painefully with ſwet of their browes: became now to be very vaine, ſumptuous, and riotous, by reaſon of theſe things brought vp then. The cauſe of the alteration dooth eaſily appeare by thoſe things. For Pericles at his firſt comming, ſought to winne the fauour of the people, as we haue ſaid before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne. But comming farre ſhort of his wealth and abilitie, to carie out the porte and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poore, keeping open houſe to all commers, clothing poore olde people, breaking open beſides all incloſures and pales through all his lands, that euery one might with more libertie come in, and take the frutes thereof at their pleaſure: and ſeeing himſelfe by theſe great meanes out gone farre in goodwill with the common people, by Demonides counſell and procurement (who was borne in the Ile of IOS) he brought in this diſtribution of the common money, as

The good deeds of Cimon

Ariſtotle writeth. And hauing wonne in a ſhort time the fauour and goodwill of the common people, by diſtribution of the common treaſure, which he cauſed to be deuided among them, aſwell to haue place to ſee theſe playes, as for that they had reward to be preſent at the iudgements, & by other ſuch like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, did inueigh againſt the courte of the Areopagites, whereof he neuer was any member.

Pericles large diſtribution diminiſhed, the Areopagits authoritie.

For it neuer came to be his hap to be yeerely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the ſacrifices, nor maiſter of the warres: all which were offices choſen in auncient time by lot. And further, thoſe on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued themſelues well in their office, they were called forwards, and raiſed to be of the body of this courte of the Areopagites. Pericles now by theſe meanes hauing obtained great credit and authoritie amongſt the people, he troubled the Senate of the Areopagites in ſuch ſort, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and in time made Cimon to be baniſhed ATHENS, as one that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS, and contraried the commonwealth, and authoritie of the people.

Notwithſtanding he was the nobleſt and richeſt perſon of all the citie, and one that had wonne ſo many glorious victories, and had ſo repleniſhed ATHENS with the conquered ſpoiles of their enemies, as we haue declared in his life: ſo great was the authoritie of Pericles amongſt the people.

The Oſtraciſmon.

Now the baniſhment wherewith he was puniſhed (which they called Oſtraciſmon) was limited by the lawe for tenne yeares. In which ſpace the LACEDÆMONIANS being come downe with a great armie into the countrie of TANAGRA, the ATHENIANS ſent out their power preſently againſt them. There Cimon willing to ſhew the ATHENIANS by his deedes, that they had falſely accuſed him for fauouring the LACEDÆMONIANS: did arme himſelfe, and went on his country mens ſide, to fight in the companie of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a baniſhed man. And this was the cauſe that Pericles fought that day more valiantly then euer he did, and he wanne the honour and name to haue done more in the perſon of himſelfe that day, then any other of all the armie. At that battell alſo, all Cimons freinds, whom Pericles had burdened likewiſe to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings, dyed euery man of them that day. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driuen Cimon away, and wiſhed he were reſtored, after they had loſt this battell vpon the confines of the countrie of ATTICA: becauſe they feared ſharpe warres would come vpon them againe at the next ſpring.

Which thing when Pericles perceiued, he ſought alſo to further that the common people deſired: wherefore he ſtraight cauſed a decree to be made, that Cimon ſhould be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduiſed that peace ſhould be made betweene both cities: for the LACEDÆMONIANS did loue Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithſtanding do write, that Pericles did neuer paſſe his conſent to call him home againe, before ſuch time as they had made a ſecret agreement amongſt themſelues (by meanes of Elpinice, Cimons ſiſter) that Cimon ſhould be ſent out with an armie of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of PERSIA his dominions, & that Pericles ſhould remaine at home with the authoritie of gouernment within the citie. This Elpinice (Cimons ſiſter) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at ſuch time as he was accuſed before the iudge of treaſon. For Pericles was one of the committees, to whom this accuſation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, & beſought him not to do his worſt vnto her brother. Pericles anſwered her merily. Thou art too old Elpinice, thou art too old, to go through with theſe matters.

Yet when his matter came to iudgement, and that his cauſe was pleaded: he roſe but once to ſpeake againſt him (for his owne diſcharge as it were) and went his way when he had ſaid, doing leſſe hurt to Cimon, then any other of his accuſers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuſeth Pericles that he had cauſed the orator Ephialtes to be ſlaine by treaſon (that was his friend, and did alwaies counſell him, and take his part in all kinde of gouernment of the commonweale) onely for the iealouſie and enuie he did beare to his glorie? I can but muſe why Idomeneus ſhould ſpeake ſo ſlanderouſlie againſt Pericles, vnleſſe it were that his melancholy humour procured ſuch violent ſpeach: who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameleſſe, yet he was euer nobly minded, and had a naturall deſire of honour, in which kinde of men ſuch furious cruell paſſions ſions are ſeeldome ſeene to breede. But this orator Ephialtes being cruell to thoſe that tooke part with the Nobilitie, becauſe he would ſpare or pardon no man for any offence whatſoeuer committed againſt the peoples authoritie, but did follow and perſecute them with all rigour to the vttermoſt: his enemies laide waite for him by meanes of one Ariſtodicus TANAGRIAN, and they killed him by treaſon, as Ariſtotle writeth. In the meane time Cimon died in the Ile of CYPRVS, being generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS by ſea. Wherefore thoſe that tooke part with the Nobilitie, ſeeing Pericles was now growen very great, and that he went before all other citizens of ATHENS, thinking it good to haue ſome one to ſticke on their ſide againſt him, and to leſſen thereby ſomewhat his authoritie, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raiſed vp againſt him, one Thucydides, of the towne of ALOPECIA, a graue wiſe man, and father in law to Cimon. This Thucydides had leſſe skill of warres then Cimon, but vnderſtood more in ciuill gouernment then he, for that he remained moſt part of his time within the citie: where continually inueighing againſt Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people, in ſhort time hee had ſtirred vp a like companie againſt the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer ſort (which they call Nobilitie) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their eſtate and dignitie was abſcured, and troden vnder foote. Moreouer hee did ſeparate them from the people, and did aſſemble them all as it were into one bodie, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and did put (as a man will ſay) a counterpeaſe into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little ſecret grudge only betwene theſe two factions, as an artificiall flower ſet in the blade of a ſword, which made thoſe ſhew a litle, that did leane vnto the people: and the other alſo ſomwhat that fauored the Nobilitie. But the contention betweene theſe two perſons, was as a deepe cut, which deuided the citie wholy in two factions: of the which the one was called the Nobilitie, and the other the communaltie. Therefore Pericles giuing yet more libertie vnto the people, did all thinges that might be to pleaſe them, ordeining continuall plaies and games in the citie, many feaſtes, bankets, and open paſtimes to entertaine the commons with ſuch honeſt pleaſures and deuiſes: and beſides all this, he ſent yerely an armie of three ſcore gallies vnto the warres, into the which he put a great number of poore citizens that tooke paie of the ſtate for nine moneths of the yere, and thereby they did learne together, and practiſe to be good ſea men. Furthermore he ſent into the countrie of CHERRONESVS, a thouſand free men of the citie to dwell there, and to deuide the landes amongeſt them: fiue hundred alſo into the Ile of NAXOS: into the Ile of ANDROS, two hundred & fiftie: into THRACIA, a thouſand to dwell with the BISALTES: & other alſo into ITALY, when the citie of SYBARIS was built againe, which afterwardes was ſurnamed the citie of the THVRIANS. All this he did to rid the citie of a number of idle people, who through idleneſſe beganne to be curious, and to deſire chaunge of things, as alſo to prouide for the neceſſitie of the poore townes men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall citizens of ATHENS neere vnto their ſubiectes and friendes, they ſerued as a garriſon to keepe them vnder, and did ſuppreſſe them alſo from attempting any alteration or chaunge. But that which delighteth moſt, & is the greateſt ornament vnto the citie of ATHENS, which maketh ſtrangers moſt to wonder, and which alone doth bring ſufficient teſtimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the auncient power, riches, and great wealth of GRECE, to be true and not falſe: are the ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the citie of ATHENS. For it is the onely act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies moſt to ſpight him, and which they moſt accuſed him for, crying out vpon him in all counſelles and aſſemblies: that the people of ATHENS were openly defamed, for carying away the readie money of all GRECE, which was left in the Ile of DELOS to be ſafely kept there. And although they could with good honeſtie haue excuſed this fact, ſaying that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the ende to lay it vp in a more ſtronger place, where it ſhould be in better ſafetie: yet was this too ouergreat an iniurie offered vnto all the reſt of GRECE, & too maniſeſt a token of tyrannie alſo, to beholde before their eyes, how we doe employ the money, which they were inforced to gather for the maintenance of the warres againſt the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and ſetting forth our citie, like a glorious woman, all to be gauded with golde and precious ſtones, and how we doe make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull & infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrarie, and declared vnto the ATHENIANS that they were not bound to make any account of this money vnto their friends and allies, conſidering that they fought for their ſafetie, and that they kept the barbarous people farre from GRECE, without troubling them to ſet out any one man, horſe, or ſhippe of theirs, the money onely excepted, which is no more theirs that paide it, then theirs that receiued it, ſo they beſtowe it to that vſe they receiued it for. And their citie being alreadie very well furniſhed, and prouided of all thinges neceſſary for the warres, it was good reaſon they ſhould employ and beſtow the ſurplus of the treaſure in things: which in time to come (and being throughly finiſhed) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he ſaide that whileſt they continue building, they ſhould be preſently rich, by reaſon of the diuerſitie of workes of all ſortes, and other thinges which they ſhould haue neede of: and to compaſſe theſe things the better, and to ſet them in hande, all manner of artificers and workemen (that would labour) ſhould be ſet a worke. So ſhould all the townes men, and inhabitants of the citie, receiue paie and wages of the common treaſure: and the citie by this meanes ſhould be greatly beautified, and much more able to maintaine it ſelfe. For ſuch as were ſtrong, and able men of bodie, and of yeares to carie weapon, had paie and entertainement of the common wealth, which were ſent abroad vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as craftes men, and labourers: hee would alſo they ſhould haue part of the common treaſure, but not without they earned it, and by doing ſomewhat. And this was his reaſon, and the cauſe that made him occupie the common people with great buildings, and deuiſes of workes of diuerſe occupations, which could not be finiſhed of long time: to the end that the citizens remaining at home, might haue a meane and way to take part of the common treaſure, and enrich themſelues, as well as thoſe that went to the warres, and ſerued on the ſea, or els that lay in garriſon to keepe any place or fort. For ſome gained by bringing ſtuffe: as ſtones, braſſe, yuory, gold, ebbany, and cypres. Other got, to worke and faſhion it: as carpenters, grauers, founders, caſters of images, maſons, hewers of ſtone, diers, goldſmithes, ioyners working in iuorie, painters, men that ſet in ſundry colours of peeces of ſtone or wood, and turners. Other gained to bring ſtuffe, and to furniſh them: as marchants, marriners, and ſhipmaſters, for things they brought them by ſea. And by land other got alſo: as cart-makers, carriers, carters, cord-makers, ſadlers, coller-makers, and pyoners to make waies plaine, and miners, and ſuch like. Furthermore, euery ſcience and craft, as a captaine hauing ſouldiers, had alſo their armie of the worke men that ſerued them, labouring truely for their liuing, who ſerued as prentiſes and iorney men vnder the workemaſters: ſo the worke by this meanes did diſperſe abroad a common gaine to all ſorts of people and ages, what occupation or trade ſoeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to riſe in greatneſſe and ſumptuouſneſſe, being of excellent workmanſhip, and for grace & beautie not comparable: becauſe euery workeman in his ſcience did ſtriue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greateſt in ſight, and to be moſt workemanly done in ſhew. But the greateſt thing to be wondred at, was their ſpeede & diligence. For where euery man thought thoſe workes were not likely to be finiſhed in many mens liues and ages, and from man to man: they were all done and finiſhed, whileſt one onely gouernour continued ſtill in credite and authoritie. And yet they ſay, that in the ſame time, as one Agatarchus boaſted him ſelfe, that he had quickly painted certaine beaſtes: Zeuxis another painter hearing him, aunſwered. And I contrarily doe reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For cōmonly ſlight and ſodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe colours, nor giue perfect beautie to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence & labour in making of the worke, maketh the colours to continue for euer. For this cauſe therefore the workes Pericles made, are more wonderfull: becauſe they were perfectly made in ſo ſhort a time, and haue continued ſo long a ſeaſon. For euery one of thoſe which were finiſhed vp at that time, ſeemed then to be very auncient touching the beautie thereof: and yet for the grace & continuance of the ſame, it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done and finiſhed, there is ſuch a certaine kind of flouriſhing freſhnes in it, which letteth that the iniurie of time cannot impaire the ſight therof:

As if euery one of thoſe foreſaid workes, had ſome liuing ſpirite in it, to make it ſeeme young and freſh: and a ſoule that liued euer, which kept them in their good continuing ſtate. Now the chiefe ſurueyour generall of all theſe workes, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent worke-maſters in euery ſcience and occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthénon (as a man would ſay, the temple of the virgine, and is ſurnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery way) was built by Ictinus, & Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleuſin (where the ſecret ceremonies of the myſteries were made) was firſt founded by Corœbus, who raiſed vp the firſt pillers in order, ſtanding beneath on the ground, and did ſet them vp vnto the maſter chaptrels. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of XYPETA, turned the arches ouer, and then did ſet the pillers in order alſo which are aboue: and Xenocles of the towne of CHOLARGEA, was he that made the lanterne or toppe of the ſteeple which couereth the ſanctuarie: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles himſelfe giue order for the building of it, was done by Callicrates, who vndertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this worke, to ſee howe ſlowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, ſaying:

Pericles long a goe, did end this worke begunne: and build it high, with glorious wordes, if ſo it had bene done.
But as for deedes (in deede) he built nothing at all,
but let it ſtand: as yet it ſtands, much liker for to fall.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for muſicke, where they heare all muſitians play, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with diuers ſeates & degrees, and many ranges of pillers, but the toppe of the roofe is altogether round, which is ſomewhat hanging downeward round about of it ſelfe, comming together into one point. And it is ſaide that this was made after the patterne and faſhion of king Xerxes royall pauilion, and that Pericles was the firſt deuiſer and maker of it. Wherefore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the THRACIANS, doth play very pretily vpon him, ſaying:

The Odeon.

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter ſurnamed,
(and onyons hed) which hath in his great noddle finely framed,
The plot of Odeon, when he deliuered was from baniſhment, and daungers deepe, wherein he long did paſſe.

Pericles was the firſt that made maruellous earneſt labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the feaſt called Panathenæa, they would ſet vp games for muſicke. And he him ſelfe being choſen ruler of theſe games, as iudge to reward the beſt deſeruer: ordained the manner the muſitians ſhould euer after keepe in their ſinging, playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other inſtruments of muſicke. So the firſt games that euer were for muſicke, were kept within the Odeon: and ſo were the other after them alſo, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the caſtle was made and finiſhed within the ſpace of fiue yeres, vnder the charge of Meneſicles, that was maſter of the workes. And whileſt theſe gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chaunce, which declared very well that the goddeſſe Minerua did not miſlike the building, but that it pleaſed her maruellouſly. For one of the moſt painefulleſt workemen that wrought there, fell by miſchaunce from the height of the caſtle to the ground, which fall did ſo ſore bruſe him, and he was ſo ſicke withall, that the phiſitians and ſurgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very ſory for his miſchaunce, the goddeſſe appeared to him in his ſleepe in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he did eaſily heale the poore bruſed man, and that in ſhort time. And this was the occaſion why he cauſed the image of the goddeſſe Minerua (otherwiſe called of health) to be caſt in braſſe, and ſet vp within the temple of the caſtle, neere vnto the altar which was there before, as they ſay. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the baſe: Who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reaſon of the good will Pericles bare him, he commaunded all the other workemen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill ſpoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias receiued the gentlewomen of the citie into his houſe, vnder colour to goe ſee his workes, and did conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this brute, the Co-

micall poets taking occaſion, did caſt out many ſlaunderous ſpeeches againſt Pericles, accuſing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and lieutenant in the warres: and burdened him further, that Pyrilampes, one of his familiar friends alſo, brought vp fowle, & ſpecially peacocks, which he ſecretly ſent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we muſt not wonder at theſe Satyres, that make profeſſion to ſpeake ſlaunderouſly againſt all the worlde, as it were to ſacrifice the iniuries and wronges they caſt vpon honorable and good men, to the ſpight and enuie of the people, as vnto wicked ſpirites: conſidering that Steſimbrotus THASIAN durſt falſely accuſe Pericles of deteſtable inceſt, and of abuſing his owne ſonnes wife. And this is the reaſon, in my opinion, why it is ſo hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of auncient things, by the monuments of hiſtoriographers: conſidering long proceſſe of time, doth vtterly obſcure the truth of matters, done in former times. For euery written hiſtorie ſpeaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of thinges, whereof it maketh mention: ſometime for hate and enuie, ſometime for fauour or flatterie, doth diſguiſe and corrupt the trueth. But Pericles perceiuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations did ſtill crie out vpon him, that he did vainely waſte and conſume the common treaſure, and that he beſtowed vpon the workes, all the whole reuenue of the citie: one day when the people were aſſembled together, before them all hee asked them, if they thought that the coſt beſtowed were too much. The people aunſwered him: a great deale too much.

Well, ſaid he then, the charges ſhalbe mine (if you thinke good) and none of yours: prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely. When Pericles had ſaide ſo, the people cried out aloude, they would none of that (either becauſe that they wondred at the greatneſſe of his mind, or els for that they would not giue him the onely honour and praiſe to haue done ſo ſumptuous and ſtately workes) but willed him that he ſhould ſee them ended at the common charges, without ſparing for any coſt.

But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, and putting it to an aduenture which of them ſhould baniſh other, with the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon: Pericles got the vpper hand, and baniſhed Thucydides out of the citie, & therewithall alſo ouerthrew the contrarie faction againſt him.

Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the citie againe to vnitie & concord, he found then the whole power of ATHENS in his hands, and all the ATHENIANS matters at his diſpoſing. And hauing all the treaſure, armour, gallyes, the Iles, and the ſea, and a maruellous ſeigniorie and Kingdome (that did enlarge it ſelfe partly ouer the GRECIANS, and partly ouer the barbarous people) ſo well fortified and ſtrengthened with the obedience of nations ſubiect vnto them, with the friendſhip of Kings, and with the alliance of diuers other Princes and mightie Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to change his manners, and from that he was wont to be toward the people, and not ſo eaſily to graunt to all the peoples willes and deſires, no more then as it were to contrarie windes. Furthermore he altered his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernment which he vſed vntill that time, as too delicate & too effeminate an harmony of muſicke, and did conuert it vnto an imperious gouernment, or rather to a kingly authoritie: but yet held ſtill a direct courſe, and kept himſelfe euer vpright without fault, as one that did, ſaid, and counſelled that, which was moſt expedient for the common weale. He many times brought on the people by perſwaſions and reaſons, to be willing to graunt that he preferred vnto them: but many times alſo, he draue them to it by force, and made them againſt their wils doe that, which was beſt for them. Following therin the deuiſe of a wiſe phiſitian: who in a long and chaungeable diſeaſe, doth graunt his pacient ſometime to take his pleaſure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate ſort: and another time alſo, he doth giue him a ſharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioy ſo great an empire: many times misfortunes doe chaunce, that fill them full of ſundry paſſions, the which Pericles alone could finely ſteere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: brideling with the one, the fierce and inſolent raſhnes of the common people in proſperitie, and with the other comforting their griefe and diſcouragement in aduerſitie.

Wherin he manifeſtly proued, that rethoricke and eloquence (as Plato ſaith) is an arte which quickneth mens ſpirites at her pleaſure, and her chiefeſt skill is, to knowe how to moue paſſions and affections throughly, which are as ſtoppes and ſoundes of the ſoule, that would be plaide vpon with a fine fingered hand of a cunning maiſter. All which, not the force of his eloquence only brought to paſſe, as Thucidides witneſſeth: but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had of his great worthines, becauſe he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetouſnes in him. For, when he had brought his city not onely to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authority exceeded many Kings and tyraunts, yea euen thoſe which by their wils and teſtaments might haue left great poſſeſſions to their children: he neuer for all that encreaſed his fathers goods and patrimony left him, the value of a grote in ſiluer. And yet the hiſtoriographer Thucydides doth ſet forth plainely enough, the greatnes of his power. And the Comicall poets alſo of that time doe report it maliciouſly vnder couert words, calling his familiar friends, the new Piſiſtratides: ſaying, how they muſt make him ſweare and proteſt he would neuer be King, giuing vs thereby to vnderſtand, that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular gouernment. And Teleclides (amongeſt other) ſayeth that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the reuenue of the towns and cities vnder their obedience, and the townes them ſelues, to binde the one, and to loſe the other, and to pull downe their wals, or to build them againe at his pleaſure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance: they gaue all their force, treaſure, and authority, and all their goods wholly into his handes. But this was not for a litle while, nor in a geere of fauour, that ſhould continue for a time: but this held out forty yeares together, he being alwaies the chiefe of his city amongſt the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, and the Thucydides. For after he had preuailed againſt Thucydides, and had baniſhed him: he yet remained chiefe aboue all other, the ſpace of fifteene years. Thus hauing attained a regall dignity to cōmaund all, which continued as aforeſaid, where no other captaines authority endured but one yeare: he euer kept himſelfe vpright from bribes and money, though otherwiſe he was no ill husband, and could warely looke to his owne. As for his landes and goods left him by his parents, that they miſcaried not by negligence, nor that they ſhould trouble him much, in buſying himſelfe to reduce them to a value: he did ſo husband them, as he thought was his beſt and eaſieſt way. For he ſold in groſſe euer the whole yeares profite and commodity of his landes, and afterwardes ſent to the market dayly to buie the cates, and other ordinary prouiſion of houſhold. This did not like his ſonnes that were men growen, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberal in his houſe, for they complained of his ouerhard and ſtraight ordinary, becauſe in ſo noble and great a houſe as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meate, but all things receiued into the houſe, ranne vnder accompt, and were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, Steward of his houſe, a man very honeſt and skilfull in ordering his houſhold prouiſion: and whether Pericles had brought him vp to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not vnknowen. But theſe things were farre contrary to Anaxagoras wiſedome. For he deſpiſing the world, and caſting his affection on heauenly things: did willingly forſake his houſe, and ſuffered all his lande to runne to layes and to paſture. But (in my opinion) great is the diuerſity betweene a contemplatiue life, and a ciuill life. For the one employeth all his time vpon the ſpeculation of good and honeſt things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no neede of any exteriour helpe or inſtrument. The other applying all his time vpon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men: he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an inſtrument not onely neceſſary, but alſo honeſt. As, looke vppon the example of Pericles: who did relieue many poore people. And Anaxagoras ſpecially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of ſtate at that time, hauing no leyſure to thinke vpon Anaxagoras, he ſeeing himſelfe old and forſaken of the world, laid him downe, and couered his head cloſe, determining to ſtarue himſelfe to death with hunger. Pericles vnderſtanding this, ranne preſently to him as a man halfe caſt away, and praide him as earneſtly as he could, that hee would diſpoſe him ſelfe to liue, being not onely ſory for him, but for him ſelfe alſo, that he ſhould loſe ſo faithfull and wiſe a counſeller, in matters of ſtate and gouernment. Then Anaxagoras ſhewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, thoſe that will ſee by the light of a lampe, muſt put oile to it, to make the light burne. Now beganne the Lacedæmonians to grow iealous, of the greatnes of the Athenians, wherfore Pericles to make the Athenians hearts greater, and ſo draw their mindes to great enterpriſes: ſet downe an order they ſhould ſend ambaſſadours to perſwade all the Grecians (in what part ſoeuer they dwelt in Europe, or Asia, as well the litle as the great cities) to ſend their deputies vnto Athens, to the generall aſſembly that ſhould be holden there, to take order for the temples of the goddes which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the ſacrifices they had vowed for the preſeruation of Greece, when they gaue battel vpon them: and touching ſea matters alſo, that euery man might ſaile in ſafety where he would, and that al might liue together in good peace and loue, one with another. To perform this commiſſion, twenty perſons were ſent of this ambaſiate, euery one of them being fifty yeares of age and vpward. Whereof fiue of them went to the Dorians, dwelling in Asia, and to the inhabitants of the Iles, euen vnto the Iles of Lesbos, & of the Rhodes. Fiue other went through all the country of Hellespont, and of Thracia, vnto the city of Bizantium. Other fiue were cõmanded to go into Boeotia, into Phocides, & through all Peloponnesus, and from thence by the countrey of the Locrians, into the vpland countrey adioyning to it, vntill they came into the countrey of Acarnania, and of Ambracia. And the other fiue went firſt into the Ile of Euboea, and from thence vnto the Oetæians, and through all the gulfe of Malea, vnto the Phtiotes, vnto the Achaians, and the Thessalians: declaring to all the people where the came, the Athenians commiſſion, perſwading them to ſend vnto Athens, and to be preſent at the counſell which ſhould be holden there, for the pacification and vnion of all Greece. But when all came to all, nothing was done, and the ſayd cities of Greece did not aſſemble, by practiſe of the Lacedæmonians (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the firſt refuſall that was made of their ſummons, was at Peloponnesus. This haue I written to make Pericles noble corage to be knowen, and how profound a wiſe man he ſhewed him ſelfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was choſen generall in the warres, he was much eſteemed, becauſe he euer tooke great regard to the ſafety of his ſouldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he ſaw might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing daungerous: and moreouer, he neuer prayſed them for good generals, neither would he follow them that had obtained great victories by hazard, howſoeuer other did eſteeme or commend them. For he was wont to ſay, that if none but him ſelfe did leade them to the ſhambles, as much as lay in him, they ſhould be immortall. And when he ſaw Tolmides, the ſonne of Tolmæus (truſting to his former victories, & the praiſe and commendation of his good ſeruice) did prepare vpon no occaſion, and to no purpoſe, to enter into the countrey of Boeotia, and had procured alſo a thouſand of the luſtieſt and moſt valiant men of the city, to be contented to goe with him in that iourney, ouer and aboue the reſt of the army he had leauied: he went about to turne him from his purpoſe, and to keepe him at home, by many perſwaſions he vſed to him before the peoples face, and ſpake certaine wordes at that time, that were remembred long after, and theſe they were. That if he would not beleeue Pericles counſell, yet that he would tary time at the leaſt, which is the wiſeſt counſeller of men. Theſe wordes were pretily liked at that preſent time. But within few dayes after, when newes was brought that Tolmides ſelfe was ſlaine in a battell he had loſt, neare vnto the city of Coronea, wherein periſhed alſo, many other honeſt and valiant men of Athens: his words ſpoken before, did then greatly encreaſe Pericles reputation and good will with the common people, becauſe he was taken for a wiſe man, and one that loued his citizens. But of all his iourneis he made, being generall ouer the army of the Athenians: the iourney of Cherronesus was beſt thought of and eſteemed, becauſe it fell out to the great benefit and preſeruation of al the Grecians inhabiting in that country. For beſides that he brought thither a thouſand citizens of Athens to dwell there (in which doing he ſtrengthned the cities with ſo many good men) he did fortifie the barre alſo, which did let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drew from one ſea to another: ſo that he defended the countrey againſt all the inuaſions and piracies of the Thracians inhabiting there abouts, and deliuered it of extreame warre, with the wich it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongeſt them, who onely liued vpon piracy and robbing on the ſeas. So was he likewiſe much honored and eſteemed of ſtrangers, when he did enuironne all Peloponnesus, departing out of the hauen of Peges, on the coaſt of Megara, with a fleet of a hundred gallies For he did not only ſpoile the towns all alongſt the ſea ſide, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the maine land, farre from the ſea, with his ſouldiers he had in the gallies, he draue ſome of them to retire within their walles, he made them ſo afraid of him: and in the country of Nemea, he ouercame the Sicyonians in battell, that taried him in the field, and did erect a piller for a notable marke of his victory. And imbarking in his ſhippes a new ſupply of ſouldiers which he tooke vp in Achaia, being friends with the Athenians at that time: he paſſed ouer to the firme land that lay directly againſt it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the riuer of Achelous, he inuaded the countrey of Acharnania, where he ſhut vp the Oeneades within their walles. And after he had laide waſt and deſtroyed all the champion countrey, he returned home againe to Athens: hauing ſhewed him ſelfe in this iourney, a dreadfull captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the ſafety of his ſouldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iourney(by chaunce or otherwiſe) vnto the ſouldiers vnder his charge. And afterwardes, going with a great nauy maruellous well appointed vnto the realme of Pontus, he did there gently vſe and intreate the cities of Greece, and graunted them all that they required of him: making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the ſame alſo, to know the great force & power of the Athenians, who ſailed without feare all about wher they thought good, keeping all the coaſtes of the ſea vnder their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the Sinopians thirteene gallies, with certaine number of ſouldiers vnder captaine Lamachus, to defend them againſt the tyraunt Timeſileus: who being expulſed and driuen away with thoſe of his faction, Pericles cauſed proclamation to be made at Athens, that ſixe hundred free men of the city, that had any deſire to go, without compulſion, might goe dwell at Sinopa, where they ſhould haue deuided among them, the goods and lands of the tyraunt and his followers. But he did not follow the fooliſh vaine humors of his citizens, nor would not yeelde to their vnſatiable couetouſneſſe, who being ſet on a iolity to ſee them ſelues ſo ſtrong, and of ſuch a power, and beſides, to haue good lucke, would needs once againe attempt to conquer Egypt, and to reuolte all the countries vpon the ſea coaſts, from the empire of the king of Persia: for there were many of them whoſe mindes were maruellouſly bent to attempt the vnfortunat enterpriſe of entring Sicilia, which Alcibiades afterwards did much pricke forward. And ſome of them dreamed beſides, of the conqueſt of Thuscan, and the empire of Carthage. But this was not altogether without ſome likelihood, nor without occaſion of hope, conſidering the large boundes of their Kingdome, and the fortunat eſtate of their affaires, which fell out according to their owne deſire. But Pericles did hinder this going out, and cut off altogether their curious deſire, employing the moſt part of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: iudging it no ſmall matter to keepe downe the Lacedæmonians from growing greater. For he was alwaies an enemy to the Lacedæmonians, as he ſhewed him ſelfe in many things, but ſpecially in the warre he made, called the holy warre. For the Lacedæmonians hauing put the Phocians from the charge of the temple of Apollo, in the city of Delphes, which they had vſurped, and hauing reſtored the Delphians again vnto the ſame: ſo ſoone as they were gone thence, Pericles went alſo with another army, and reſtored the Phocians in again. And whereas the Lacedæmonians had cauſed to be grauen in the forehead of a Wolfe of braſſe, the priuiledge the Delphians had graunted them, to be the firſt that ſhould make their demaundes of the oracle: he hauing attained the like priuiledge of the Phocians, made his image alſo to be grauen on the right ſide of the ſame image, of the braſen Wolfe. Now how wiſely Pericles did gouerne Greece by the power of the Athenians, his deedes doe plainely ſhew. For firſt of all, the countrey of Euboea did rebell, againſt whom he brought the army of the Athenians. And ſodainly in the necke of that, came newes from another coaſt, that the Megarians alſo were in armes againſt them: and how they were already entred into the countrey of Attica with a great army, ledde by Pliſtonax King of Lacedæmon. This occaſion drew him homeward againe, and ſo he marched backe with ſpeede into his countrey, to make preparation to encounter his enemies,that were already entred into the territories of Attica. He durſt not offer them battell, being ſo great a number of valiant ſouldiers: but hearing that king Pliſtonax was yet but a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counſell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counſell & direct him) he ſought priuily to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had won him ſoone with his money, he perſwaded him to draw backe the Peloponneſians out of their country of Attica: and ſo he did. But when the Lacedæmonians ſaw their army caſſed, and that the people were gone their way, euery man to his owne city or towne: they were ſo mad at it, that the King was condemned in a great ſumme. The king being vnable to anſwer his fine, which was ſo extreame great: he was driuen to abſent himſelfe from Lacedæmon. Cleandrides on the other ſide, if he had not fled in time, euen for ſpite had bene condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, that afterwards ouercame the Athenians in Sicilia, in whom it ſemed nature bred couetouſnes, as a diſeaſe inheritable by ſucceſsion from the father to the ſonne. For he being ſhamefully conuicted alſo, for certaine vile parts he had plaide, was likewiſe baniſhed from Sparta: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lyſander. And Pericles deliuering vp the accoũt of his charge, and ſetting downe an article of the expenſe of tenne talents he had employed, or ſhould employ in needefull cauſes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking queſtion how, nor which way, nor whether it was true that they were beſtowed. Now there are certaine writers (among whom the philoſopher Theophraſtus is one) who write that Pericles ſent yearly vnto Sparta ten talents, with the which he entertained thoſe that were in authoritie there, becauſe they ſhould make no wars with them: not to buie peace of them, but time, that he might in the meane ſeaſon, with better commodity, and that leyſure, prouide to maintaine the wars. After that, as the army of the Peloponneſians were out of the countrey of Attica, he returned againe againſt the rebels, and paſſed into the Ile of Euboea with fifty ſayle, and fiue thouſand footemen well armed: and there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes againſt him, and draue away the Hyppobotes, who were the moſt famous men of all the Chalcidians, as well for their riches, as for their valiauntnes. He draue away alſo all the Heſtiæians, whom he chaſed cleane out of all the countrey, and placed in their city, onely the citizens of Athens. And the cauſe why he dealt ſo rigorouſly with them was, becauſe they hauing taken a galley of the Athenians priſoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians for thirty yeares: he proclaimed open wars againſt thoſe of the Ile of Samos, burdening them, that they being commaunded by the Athenians, to pacifie the quarrels which they had againſt the Mileſians, they would not obay. But becauſe ſome hold opinion, that he tooke vppon him this warre againſt Samos, for the loue of Aſpaſia: it ſhall bee no great digreſsion of our ſtory, to tell you by the way, what manner of woman ſhe was, and what a maruellous gift and power ſhe had, that ſhe could entangle with her loue the chiefeſt rulers and gouernours at that time of the common weale, & that the philoſophers themſelues did ſo largely ſpeake and write of her. Firſt of all, it is certaine that ſhe was borne in the city of Miletum, and was the daughter of one Axiochus: ſhe following the ſteppes and example of an old curtiſan of Ionia, called Thargelia, gaue her ſelfe only to entertaine the greateſt perſons and chiefeſt rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being paſſing faire, and carying a comely grace with her, hauing a ſharpe wit and pleaſaunt tongue: ſhe had the acquaintaunce and friendſhippe of the greateſt perſons of all Greece, and wanne all thoſe that did haunt her company, to be at the king of Perſiaes commaundement. So that ſhe ſowed through all the cities of Greece, great beginnings of the faction of the Medes: for they were the greateſt men of power and authority of euery city that were acquainted with her. But as for Aſpaſia, ſome ſay that Pericles reſorted vnto her, becauſe ſhe was a wiſe woman, and had great vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernment. For Socrates him ſelfe went to ſee her ſometimes with his friends: and thoſe that vſed her company alſo, brought their wiues many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine about her were to entertaine ſuch as would warme them by their fire. Æſchines writeth, that Lyſicles a graſier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbiſh nature, came to be the chiefe man of Athens, by frequenting the company of Aſpaſia,

Aſpaſia, after the death of Pericles. And to Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleaſantly written, yet in that, this ſtorie is written truely: that this Aſpaſia was repaired vnto by diuers of the Athenians, to learne the art of rethorike of her. Yet notwithſtanding it ſeemeth moſt likely that the affection Pericles did beare her, grew rather of loue, then of any other cauſe. For he was maried vnto a kinſewoman of his owne, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom ſhe had Callias, ſurnamed the rich: and had afterwards by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her company, he gaue her with her owne good will and conſent vnto another, and maried Aſpaſia whom he dearely loued. For euer when he went abroad, and came home againe, he ſaluted her with a kiſſe. Whereupon in the auncient comedies, ſhe is called in many places, the new Omphale, and ſometimes Deianira, and ſometimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainely calleth her whore in theſe verſes:

Callias the rich

Pericles maried Aſpaſia the famous curtiſan.

His Iuno ſhe him brought, Aſpaſia by name, which was in deede an open whore, and paſt all kind of ſhame.

And it ſeemeth that he had a baſtard: for Eupolis in a comedie of his called Demoſij, bringeth him in, asking P*ironides* thus:

I pray thee: is my baſtard ſonne yet aliue?

And then P*yronides* anſwered him:

A perfect man long ſince, he ſurely had bene found,
if that this lewde and naughtie whore, his vertue had not drownd.

To conclude, this Aſpaſia was ſo famous, that Cyrus (he that fought againſt king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of Persia) called Aſpaſia his beſt beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milito & was borne in Phocides, being Hermotimus daughter. And Cyrus being ſlaine in the field, Aſpaſia was caried to the King his brother, with whom afterwards ſhe was in great fauour. As I was writing this life, this ſtorie came in my minde: and me thought I ſhould haue dealt hardly, if I ſhould haue left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe. P*ericles* was charged that he made warres againſt the Samians, on the behalfe of the Milesians, at the requeſt of Aſpaſia: for theſe two cities were at warres together, for the citie of Priena, but the Samians were the ſtronger. Now the Athenians commanded them to lay a ſide their armes, and to come and pleade their matter before them, that the right might be decided: but they refuſed it vtterly. Wherefore P*ericles* went thither and tooke away the gouernment of the ſmall number of Nobilitie, taking for hoſtages, fiftie of the chiefeſt men of the citie, and ſo many children beſides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of Lemnos. Some ſay euery one of theſe hoſtages offered to giue him a talent: and beſides thoſe, many other offered him the like, ſuch as would not haue the ſoueraigne authoritie put into the hands of the people. Moreouer P*iſſuthnes* the Persian, lieutenant to the King of Persia, for the good will he bare thoſe of Samos, did ſend P*ericles* ten thouſand crownes to releaſe the hoſtages. But Pericles neuer tooke pennie: and hauing done that he determined at Samos, and eſtabliſhed a popular gouernment, he returned againe to Athens. Notwithſtanding, the Samians rebelled immediatly after, hauing recouered their hoſtages againe by meanes of this Piſſuthnes that ſtale them away, and did furniſhe them alſo with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returning againſt them once more, hee found them not idle, nor amazed at his comming, but reſolutely determined to receiue him, and to fight for the ſeigniorie by ſea. So there was a great battell fought betweene them, neare the Ile of Tracia. And Pericles wanne the battell: hauing with foure and fortie ſaile only nobly ouercome his enemies, which were three ſcore and ten in number, whereof twenty of them were ſhips of warre. And ſo following his victorie forthwith, he wan alſo the port of Samos, and kept the Samians beſieged within their owne citie: where they were yet ſo bolde, as they would make ſalies out many times, and fight before the walles of the citie. But when there arriued a new ſupplie of ſhippes bringing a greater aide vnto Pericles: then were they ſhut vp of all ſides. Pericles then taking three ſcore gallies with him, lanched out into the ſea, with intent (as ſome ſay) to goe meete certaine ſhippes of the Phoenicians (that came to aide the Samians) as farre from Samos as he could: or as Steſimbrotus ſayeth, to goe into Cyprus; which me thinketh is not true. But whatſoeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For

Samena a kind of a ſhippe.

Meliſſus (the ſonne of Ithagenes, a great Philoſopher) being at that time general of the SAMIANS: perceiuing that fewe ſhippes were left behinde at the ſiege of the citie, and that the captaines alſo that had the charge of them were no very expert men of warre, perſwaded his citizens to make a ſalie vpon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANS ouercame: the ATHENIANS were taken priſoners, and they ſuncke many of their ſhippes. Now they being lordes againe of the ſea, did furniſh their citie with all manner of munition for warres, whereof before they had great want. Yet Ariſtotle writeth that Pericles ſelfe was once ouercome in a battell by ſea by Meliſſus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be euen with the ATHENIANS for the iniurie they had receiued of them before: did brande them in the forehead with the ſtampe of an owle, the owle being then the ſtampe of their coyne at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN priſoners before with the ſtampe of Samæna. This Samæna is a kinde of a ſhippe amongeſt the SAMIANS, low afore, and well laide out in the midde ſhippe, ſo that it is excellent good to riſe with the waues of the ſea, and is verie ſwift vnder ſaile: and it was ſo called, becauſe the firſt ſhippe that was made of this faſhion, was made in the Ile of SAMOS, by the tyrant Polycrates. It is ſaid that the Poet Ariſtophanes, couertly conueying the ſtampe of the SAMIANS, ſpeaking merily in a place of his comedies ſaieth:

The Samians are great learned men.

The Samians do yeelde to Pericles.

Pericles being aduertiſed of the ouerthrowe of his armie, returned preſently to the reſcue. Meliſſus went to meete him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowne, and driuen back into his citie, where Pericles walled them in round about the citie, deſiring victorie rather by time and charge, then by danger, and loſſe of his ſouldiers. But when he ſawe that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withholde them: he then deuided his armie into eight companies, whom he made to drawe lots, and that companie that lighted on the white beane, they ſhould be quiet and make good cheere, while the other ſeauen fought. And they ſay that from thence it came, that when any haue made good cheere, and taken pleaſure abroade, they do yet call it a white day, becauſe of the white beane. Ephorus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was there, where firſt of all they began to vſe engines of warre to plucke downe great walles, and that Pericles vſed firſt this wonderfull inuention: and that Artemon an enginer was the firſt deuiſer of them. He was caried vp and downe in a chaire, to ſet forward theſe workes, becauſe he had a lame legge: and for this cauſe he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorum therein, by the verſes of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeares before this warre of SAMOS began: and ſaieth this Periphoretos was a maruellous tender man, and ſo fooliſhly afeard of his owne ſhadowe, that the moſt part of his time he ſturred not out of his houſe, and did ſit alwaies hauing two of his men by him, that held a copper target ouer his head, for feare leaſt any thing ſhould fall vpon him. And if vpon any occaſion he were driuen to go abroad out of his houſe: he would be caried in a litle bed hanging near the ground, and for this cauſe he was ſurnamed Periphoretos. At the laſt, at nine moneths end, the SAMIANS were compelled to yeelde. So Pericles tooke the city, and raſed their wals to the ground: he brought their ſhippes away, and made them pay a maruellous great tribute, whereof part he receiued in hand, and the reſt payable at a certaine time, taking hoſtages with him for aſſurance of payment. But Duris the SAMIAN dilateth theſe matters maruellous pittyfully, burdening the ATHENIANS, and Pericles ſelfe with vnnaturall cruelty: whereof neither Thucydides, nor Ephorus, nor Ariſtotle him ſelfe maketh mention. And ſure I cannot beleeue it is true that is written. That he brought the captaines of the gallies, and the ſouldiers them ſelues of SAMIA, into the market place of the city of MILETVM, where he made them to be bound faſt vnto bordes for the ſpace of tenne daies, and at the end of the ſame, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads paſhed in peeces: and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crowes, & would not burie them. So Duris being accuſtomed to ouerreach, and to lie many times in things nothing touching him: ſeemeth in this place out of all reaſon to aggrauate the calamities of his countrey, only to accuſe the ATHENIANS, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles hauing won the citie of SAMOS, he returned againe to ATHENS, where he did honorably burie the bones of his ſlaine citizens in this warre: and himſelfe (according to their manner & cuſtome) made the funerall oration, for the which he was maruellouſly eſteemed. In ſuch ſort, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration: the ladies & gentlewomen of the citie came to ſalute him, & brought him garlands to put vpon his head, as they do to noble conquerers when they return from games, where they haue wonne the price. But Elpinicé cõming to him, ſaid. Surely Pericles, thy good ſeruice done, deſerueth garlands of triumph: for thou haſt loſt vs many a good and valiant citizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOENICIANS, and with the barbarous people as my brother Cimon did, but for deſtroying a citie of our owne nation and kinred. Pericles to theſe wordes, ſoftly anſwered Elpinicé, with Archilocus verſe, ſmyling:

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and ſtood much in his owne conceipt, after hee had ſubdued the SAMIANS, ſaying: Agamemnon was tenne yeares taking of a citie of the barbarous people: and he in nine monethes only had wonne the ſtrongeſt citie of the whole nation of IONIA. In deede he had good cauſe to glorie in his victorie: for truely (if Thucydides report be true) his conqueſt was no leſſe doubtfull, then he found it daungerous. For the SAMIANS had almoſt bene lordes of the ſea, and taken the ſeigniorie thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the warres of PELOPONNESVS being whotte againe, the CORINTHIANS inuading the Ilanders of CORPHV: Pericles did perſwade the ATHENIANS to ſend aide vnto the CORPHIANS, and to ioyne in league with that Iland, which was of great power by ſea, ſaying: that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would haue warre with them. The ATHENIANS conſented to his motion, to aide thoſe of CORPHV. VVherevpon they ſent thither Lacedæmonius (Cimons ſonne) with ten galleys onely for a mockerie: for all Cimons familie and friends, were wholly at the LACEDÆMONIANS deuotion. Therefore did Pericles cauſe Lacedæmonius to haue ſo fewe ſhips deliuered him, and further, ſent him thither againſt his will, to the end that if he did no notable exploite in this ſeruice. that they might then the more iuſtly ſuſpect his goodwill to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Moreouer whileſt he liued, he did euer what he could to keepe Cimons children backe from riſing: becauſe that by their names they were no naturall borne ATHENIANS, but ſtrangers. For the one was called Lacedæmonius, the other Theſſalus, and the third Elius: and the mother to all them three, was an ARCADIAN woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he ſent but ten galleys onely, which was but a ſlender aide for thoſe that had requeſted them, and a great matter to them that ſpake ill of him: he ſent thither afterwards a great number of other galleys, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were maruellous angry, and went & complained to the counſel of the LACEDÆMONIANS, where they laide open many grieuous complaints and accuſations againſt the ATHENIANS, and ſo did the MEGARIANS alſo: alledging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauẽs, their ſtaples, and all trafficke of marchaundiſe in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly againſt the common lawes, and articles of peace, agreed vpon by othe among all the GRECIANS. Moreouer the ÆGINETES finding themſelues very ill and cruelly handled, did ſend ſecretly to make their mone and complaints to the LACEDÆMONIANS, being afraid openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While theſe things were a doing, the city of POTIDÆA, ſubiect at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in old time by the CORINTHIANS) did rebell, and was beſieged by the ATHENIANS, which did haſten on the warres. Notwithſtanding this, ambaſſadors were firſt ſent vnto ATHENS vpon theſe complaints, and Archidamus, king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, did all that he could to pacifie the moſt part of theſe quarrels and complaints, intreating their friends and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no warres at all, for any other matters wherewith they were burdened, if they would haue graunted to haue reuoked the decree they had made againſt the MEGARIANS. VVhereupon, Pericles, that aboue all other ſtood moſt againſt the reuocation of that decree, & that did ſtur vp the people, & made them ſtand to that they had once decreed, and ordered, againſt the MEGARIANS: was thought the originall cauſe and author of the PELOPONNESIAN wars. For it is ſaide that the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent ambaſſadours vnto ATHENS for that matter only. And when Pericles alledged a law, that did ſorbid them to take away the table whereupon before time had bene written any cōmon law or edict: Polyarces, one of the LACEDÆMON ambaſſadours, ſaid vnto him. Well, ſaid he, take it not away then, but turne the table onely: your law I am ſure forbiddeth not that. This was pleaſantly ſpoken of the ambaſſadour, but Pericles could neuer be brought to it for all that. And therefore it ſeemeth he had ſome ſecret occaſion of grudge againſt the MEGARIANS: yet as one that would finely conuey it vnder the common cauſe and cloke, he tooke from them the holy lands they were breaking vp. For to bring this to paſſe, he made an order, that they ſhould ſend an herauld to ſummone the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, and that the ſame herauld ſhould goe alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to accuſe the MEGARIANS vnto them. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as alſo it was moſt iuſt and reaſonable: but it fortuned ſo, that the meſſenger they ſent thither died, and not without ſuſpition that the MEGARIANS made him away. Wherefore Charinus made a lawe preſently againſt the MEGARIANS: that they ſhould be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And alſo if any MEGARIAN ſhould once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he ſhould ſuffer the paines of death. And moreouer, that their captaines taking yearely their ordinarie oth, ſhould ſweare among other articles, that twiſe in the yeare they ſhould go with their power, and deſtroy ſome part of the MEGARIANS lande. And laſtly, that the herauld Anthemocritus ſhould be buried by the place called then the gates Thriaſienes, and now called Dipylon But the MEGARIANS ſtoutly denying, that they were any cauſe of the death of this Anthemocritus: did altogether burthen Aſpaſia and Pericles with the ſame, alledging for proofe thereof, Ariſtophanes verſes the Poet, in his comedie he intituled the Acharnes, which are ſo common, as euery boye hath them at his tongues end.

But in very deed, to tell the originall cauſe of this warre, and to deliuer the trothe thereof, it is very hard. But all the hiſtoriographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefeſt author of the warre: becauſe the decree made againſt the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe. Yet ſome holde opinion, that Pericles did it of a noble minde and iudgement, to be conſtant in that he thought moſt expedient. For he iudged that this commaundement of the LACEDÆMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would grant them: and if they yeelded to them in that, then they manifeſtly ſhewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarily ſay, that it was done of a ſelfe will and arrogancy, to ſhew his authoritie and power, and how he did deſpiſe the LACEDÆMONIANS. But the ſhrewdeſt proofe of all, that bringeth beſt authority with it, is reported after this ſort. Phidias the image maker (as we haue tolde you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friend, was in great eſtimation about him. But that procured him many ill willers. Then they being deſirous to heare by him what the people would iudge of Pericles: they intiſed Menon, one of the worke men that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to pray aſſuraunce of the people that he might openly accuſe Phidias, for a fault he had committed about Pallas image. The people receiued his obedience, and his accuſation was heard openly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all: becauſe that Phidias (through Pericles counſell and deuiſe) had from the beginning ſo laide on the golde vppon the image, that it might bee taken off and wayed euery whit. Whereupon Pericles openly ſaid vnto his accuſers, take off the gold and waie it. The glorie of his workes did purchaſe him this enuy. For he hauing grauē vpon the ſcutchiō of the goddeſſe, the battell of the AMAZONES, had cut out the portraiture of himſelfe maruellous liuely, vnder the perſō of an old bauld man, liſting vp a great ſtone with both his hands. Further he had cut out Pericles image, excellently wrought & artificially, ſeeming in manner to be Pericles ſelfe, fighting with an AMAZON in this ſort. The AMAZONES hand being lift vp high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, ſo paſſing cunningly wrought, as it ſeemed to ſhadow the likenes & reſemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithſtanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles ſelfe on either ſide of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in priſon, and there died of a ſicknes, or els of poiſon (as ſome ſay) which his enemies had prepared for him: & all to bring Pericles into further ſuſpition, and to giue them the more cauſe to accuſe him. But howſoeuer it was, the people gaue Menon his freedome, and ſet him free for payment of all ſubſidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captaines charge they ſhould ſee him ſafely kept, and that he tooke no hurt. And about the ſame time alſo Aſpaſia was accuſed, that ſhe did not beleeue in the goddes: and her accuſer was Hermippus, maker of the commedies. He burdened her further, that ſhe was a bawde to Pericles, and receiued citizens wiues into her houſe, which Pericles kept. And Diopithes at the ſame time made a decree, that they ſhould make ſearch and enquirie for heretikes that did not beleeue in the goddes, and that taught certaine new doctrine and opinion touching the operations of thinges aboue in the element, turning the ſuſpition vpon Pericles, becauſe of Anaxagoras. The people did receiue and confirme this inquiſition: and it was moued alſo then by Dracontides, that Pericles ſhould deliuer an account of the money he had ſpent, vnto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treaſurers of the common fines and reuenues, and that the iudges deputed to giue iudgement, ſhould giue ſentence within the citie vpon the aultar. But Agnon put that worde out of the decree, and placed in ſtead thereof, that the cauſe ſhould be iudged by the fifteene hundred iudges, as they thought good, if any man brought this action for theft, for batterie, or for iniuſtice. As for Aſpaſia, he ſaued her, euen for the verie pittie and compaſſion the iudges tooke of him, for the teares he ſhed in making his humble ſute for her, all the time he pleaded her caſe: as Æſchines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not do ſo much for him: he ſent him out of the citie, and himſelfe did accompanie him. And furthermore, ſeeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias fact, and for this cauſe fearing the iſſue of the iudgement: he ſet the warres a fire againe, that alwaies went backward, and did but ſmoake a litle, hoping by this meanes to weare out the accuſations againſt him, and to roote out the malice ſome did beare him. For the people hauing waightie matters in hand, and very dangerous alſo: he knewe they would put all into his hands alone, he hauing wonne already ſuch great authoritie and reputation among them. And theſe be the cauſes why he would not (as it is ſaid) ſuffer the ATHENIANS to yeeld vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the truthe cannot certainly be knowne. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could weed out Pericles, and ouerthrow him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS: they commaunded them they ſhould purge their city of Cylons rebellion, becauſe they knew well enough that Pericles kinne by the mothers ſide were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practiſe fell out contrary to their hope and expectation, that were ſent to ATHENS for this purpoſe. For, weening to haue brought Pericles into further ſuſpition and diſpleaſure, the citizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiaunce in him then before, becauſe they ſaw his enemies did ſo much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before king Archidamus entred with the army of the PELOPONNESIANS into the countrey of ATTICA, he told the ATHENIANS, that if king Archidamus fortuned to waſt and deſtroy all the countrey about, and ſhould ſpare his landes and goods for the old loue and familiarity that was betweene them, or rather to giue his enemies occaſion falſely to accuſe him: that from thenceforth, he gaue all the landes and tenements he had in the countrey, vnto the common wealth. So it fortuned that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friendes and confederates, brought a maruellous army into the countrey of ATTICA, vnder the leading of king Archidamus: who burning & ſpoyling all the countrey he came alongeſt, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, where they encamped, ſuppoſing the ATHENIANS would neuer ſuffer them to approche ſo neare, but that they would giue them battell for the honor and defence of their countrey, and to ſhew that they were no cowardes. But Pericles wiſely conſidered how the daunger was too great to hazard battell, where the loſſe of the citie of ATHENS ſtoode in perill, ſeeing they were threeſcore thouſand footmẽ of the PELOPONNESIANS, & of the BOEOTIANS together: for ſo many was their number in the firſt voyage they made againſt the ATHENIANS. And as for thoſe that were very deſirous to fight, and to put themſelues to any hazard, being mad to ſee their countrie thus waſted and deſtroyed before their eyes, Pericles did comfort and pacifie them with theſe words. That trees being cut and hewen downe, did ſpring againe in ſhort time: but men being once dead, by no poſſibilitie could be brought againe. Therefore he neuer durſt aſſemble the people in counſell, fearing leaſt he ſhould be inforced by the multitude, to doe ſomething againſt his will. But as a wiſe man of a ſhippe, when he ſeeth a ſtorme comming on the ſea, doth ſtraight giue order to make all things ſafe in the ſhippe, preparing euery thing ready to defend the ſtorme, according to his arte and skill, not harkening to the paſſengers fearefull cries and pittifull teares, who thinke themſelues caſt away: euen ſo did Pericles rule all things according to his wiſedome, hauing walled the citie ſubſtantially about and ſet good watch in euery corner: and paſſed not for thoſe that were angry and offended with him, neither would be perſwaded by his friends earneſt requeſts and intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threates nor accuſations againſt him, nor yet reckoned of all their fooliſh ſcoffing ſonges they ſung of him in the citie, to his ſhame and reproch of gouernement, ſaying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for daſtardlineſſe he let the enemies take all, and ſpoile what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that moſt defamed him, and began to enter into ſome pretie credit and fauour with the common people, for that they were angrie, and miſliked with P*ericles*: as appeareth by theſe ſlanderous verſes of Hermippus, which were then abroade:

O King of Satyres thou, who with ſuch manly ſpeache
of bloudy warres and doughtie deeds, dooſt dayly to vs preache: VVhy art thou now afraide, to take thy launce in hand, or with thy pike againſt thy foes, couragiouſlie to ſtand?

Note Pericles pollicie to pacifie the peoples anger.

Plague at Athens.

All theſe notwithſtanding, P*ericles* was neuer mooued any thing, but with ſilence did paciently beare all iniuries and ſcoffings of his enemies, and did ſend for all that a nauie of a hundred saile vnto PELOPONNESVS, whither he would not go in perſon, but kept himſelfe at home, to keepe the people in quiet: vntill ſuch time as the enemies had raiſed their campe, and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angrie at this warre: he comforted the poore people againe, with cauſing a certaine diſtribution to be made amongſt them of the common treaſure, and diuiſion alſo of the landes that were got by conqueſt. For after he had driuen all the ÆGINETES out of their countrie, he cauſed the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongeſt the citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comfort to them in this aduerſity, to heare of their enemies hurt and loſſe in ſuch manner as it did fall out. For their army that was ſent by ſea vnto PELOPONNESVS, had waſted and deſtroyed a great part of the champion countrey there, and had ſacked beſides many ſmall cities and townes. P*ericles* ſelfe alſo entring into the MEGARIANS countrey by land, did waſt the whole countrey al afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receiuing by ſea as much hurt and loſſe at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land vnto the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres ſo long with the ATHENIANS, but would ſoone haue giuen ouer (as P*ericles* had told them before) had not the gods aboue ſecretly hindered mans reaſon and pollicie. For firſt of all there came ſuch a ſore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole city beſides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infected with this diſeaſe, their hearts alſo were ſo ſharpely bent againſt P*ericles*, that the ſickneſſe hauing troubled their braines, they fell to flat rebellion againſt him, as the patient againſt his phiſitian, or children againſt their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocation of his enemies. Who bruted abroade, that the plague came of no cauſe elſe, but of the great multitude of the countrey men that came into the city on heapes, one vppon anothers necke in the

hart of the ſommer, where they were compelled to lye many together, ſmothered vp in litle tentes and cabines, remaining there all day long, cowring downewardes, and doing nothing, where before they liued in the countrie in a freſh open ayer, and at libertie. And of all this, (ſay they) Pericles is the only cauſe who procuring this war, hath pent and ſhrowded the countrie men together within the walles of a cittie, employing them to no manner of vſe nor ſeruice, but keeping them like ſheepe in a pinnefold, maketh one to poyſon another with the infection of their plague ſores running vpon them, and giuing them no leaue to chaunge ayer, that they might ſomuch as take breath abroade. Pericles to remedie this, and to do their enemies a litle miſchiefe: armed a 150 ſhippes, and ſhipped into them a great number of armed footemen and horſemen alſo. Hereby he put the cittizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, ſeeing ſo great a power. But when he had ſhipped all his men, and was himſelfe alſo in the admirall ready to hoyſe ſayle: ſodainly there was a great eclypſe of the ſunne, and the day was very darke, that all the armie was ſtriken with a maruellous feare, as of ſome daungerous and very ill token towardes them. Pericles ſeing the maſter of his gally in a maſe withall, not knowing what to doe: caſt his cloake ouer the maſters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harme or no. The maſter aunſwered him, he thought it none, Then ſayed Pericles againe to him. There is no difference betwene this and that, ſauing that the bodye which maketh the darknes is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eyes. Theſe things are thus diſputed of in the ſchooles of the philoſophers. But Pericles hoiſing ſayle notwithſtanding, did no notable nor ſpeciall ſeruice, aunſwerable to ſo great an armie and preparation. For he laying ſiege vnto the holy cittie of EPIDAVRVM, when euery man looked they ſhould haue taken it, was compelled to rayſe his ſiege for the plague that was ſo vehement: that it did not onely kill the ATHENIANS themſelues, but all other alſo (were they neuer ſo fewe) that came to them, or neere their campe. Wherefore perceiuing the ATHENIANS were maruellouſly offended with him, he did what he could to comforte them, and put them in hart againe: but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them. For by the moſt parte of voyces, they depriued him of his charge of generall, and condemned him in a maruellous great fine and ſumme of money, the which thoſe that tell the leaſt do write, that it was the ſumme of fifteene talentes: and thoſe that ſay more, ſpeake of fiftie talentes. The accuſer ſubſcribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomeneus, or Simmias ſay, or as Theophraſtus writeth: yet Heraclides Ponticus ſayth, one Lacratidas. Now his common griefes were ſoone blowen ouer: for the people dyd eaſely let fall their diſpleaſures towardes him, as the waſpe leaueth her ſting behind her with them ſhee hath ſtong. But his owne priuate affaires and houſehold cauſes were in very ill caſe: both for that the plague had taken awaye many of his friendes and kinſmen from him, as alſo for that he and his houſe had continued a long time in diſgrace. For Xanthippus (Pericles ſonne & heire) being a man of a very ill diſpoſition and nature, and hauing maried a young woman very prodigall and lauiſh of expence, the daughter of Iſander, ſonne of Epilychus: he grudged much at his fathers hardnes, who ſcantly gaue him money and but a litle at a time. Wherupon he ſent on a time to one of his fathers friends in Pericles name, to pray him to lend him ſome money, who ſent it vnto him. But afterwardes when he came to demaund it againe, Pericles did not onely refuſe to paye it him, but further alſo, he put him in ſute. But this made the young man Xanthippus ſo angrie with his father, that he ſpake very ill of him in euery place where hee came: and in mockerie reported how his father ſpent his time when he was at home, and the talke he had with the Sophiſters, and the maiſter Rhetoritians. For a miſchaunce fortuning on a time, at the game of the throwing of the darte, who ſhould throwe beſt, that he that threwe, did vnfortunately kill one Epitimius a THESSALIAN: Xanthippus went pratling vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole daye diſputing with Protagoras the Rhetoritian, to know which of the three by law and reaſon ſhould be condemned for this murther. The darte: he that threwe the darte: or the deuiſer of the game. Moreouer Steſimbrotus writeth, that the brute that ranne abroade through the cittie, how Pericles did keepe his wife, was ſowen abroade by Xanthippus himſelfe. But ſo it is, this quarrell and hate betwixt the father and the ſonne cõtinued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xanthippus died in the great plague, and Pericles owne ſiſter alſo: moreouer he loſt at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinſefolkes, and thoſe ſpecially that did him greateſt pleaſure in gouerning of the ſtate. But all this did neuer pull down his conntenaunce, nor any thing abate the greatnes of his mind, what miſfortunes ſoeuer he had ſuſtained. Neither ſaw they him weep at any time, nor mourne at the funeralles of any of his kinſmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his yonger and lawfull begotten ſonne: for, the loſſe of him alone did onely melt his hart. Yet he did ſtriue to ſhew his natural conſtancie, and to keepe his accuſtomed modeſtie. But as he would haue put a garland of flowers vpon his head, ſorrow did ſo pierce his hart when he ſaw his face, that then he burſt out in teares and cryed a mayne: which they neuer ſaw him doe before: all the dayes of his life. Furthermore, the people hauing proued other captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgment and authoritie ſufficient, for ſo great a charge: In the end, of themſelues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counſelles, and to the ſtate of a captaine alſo to take charge of the ſtate. But at that time he kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe, as one bewayling his late grieuous loſſe and ſorrowe. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friendes, perſuaded him to ſhew himſelfe vnto the people: who did excuſe themſelues vnto him, for their ingratitude towardes him. Pericles then taking the gouernment againe vpon him, the firſt matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to reuoke the ſtatute he had made for baſe borne children, fearing leaſt his lawfull heirs would fayle, and ſo his houſe & name ſhould fall to the ground. But as for that law, thus it ſtood. Pericles whẽ he was in his beſt authority, cauſed a law to be made, that they onely ſhould be compted cittizens of ATHENS, which were naturall ATHENIANS borne by father and mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of EGYPT hauing ſent a gift vnto the people of ATHENS, of forty thouſand buſhells of corne, to be diſtributed among the cittizens there: many by occaſion of this lawe were accuſed to be baſe borne, and ſpecially men of the baſer ſorte of people, which were not knowne before, or at the leaſt had no reckoning made of them, and ſo ſome of them were falſely and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon ſo it fell out that there were no leſſe then fiue thouſand of them conuicted and ſolde for ſlaues: and thoſe that remained as free men, and were iudged to be naturall cittizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thouſand and fortye perſones. Now this was much miſliked of the people, that a law enacted, and that had beene of ſuch force, ſhould by the ſelfe ſame maker and deuiſer of the ſame be againe reuoked and called in. Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his houſe, did breake the peoples hardened hartes againſt him. Who thinking theſe ſorrowes ſmarte, to be puniſhment enough vnto him for his former pryde, and iudging that by goddes diuine iuſtice and permiſſion, this plague and loſſe fell vpon him, and that his requeſt alſo was tolerable: they ſuffered him to enrolle his baſe born ſonne in the regiſter of the lawful cittizens of his familie, giuing him his owne name, Pericles. It is the ſelfſame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battel by ſea, neere vnto the Iles ARGINVSES, was put to death by ſentẽce of the people, with other captaines his cõpanions. Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not ſo vehemẽtly as other were, rather more tẽperately: & by long ſpace of time, with many alterations & changes, that did by little and little decay and conſume the ſtrengh of his bodie, and ouercame his ſences and noble mind. Therfore Theophraſtus in his morralles declareth, in a place where he diſputeth, whether mens manners doe chaunge with their miſfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions doe ſo alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reaſon: that Pericles in his ſicknes ſhewed a friend of his that came to ſee him, I cannot tel what a preſeruing charme the woman hath tyed (as a carkanet) about his necke, to let him vnderſtand he was very ill, ſince he ſuffered them to apply ſuch a fooliſh bable to him. In the ende, Pericles drawing faſt vnto his death, the Nobilitie of the cittie, and ſuch his friendes as were left aliue, ſtanding about his bed, beganne to ſpeake of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, conſidering the greatnes of his noble acts, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine foughten battelles being generall of the ATHENIANS, and had ſet vp ſo many tokens and triumphes in honour of his countrie) they reckoned vp among themſelues all theſe matters, as if he had not vnderſtood them, imagining his ſences had bene gone. But he contrarilie being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had ſayed, and thus he beganne to ſpeake vnto them. That he maruelled why they had ſo highly praiſed that in him, which was common to many other captaines, & wherein fortune delt with them in equalitie alike, and all this while they had forgotten to ſpeake of the beſt and moſt notable thing that was in him, which was: that no ATHENIAN had euer worne blacke gowne through his occaſion. And ſure ſo was he a noble and worthie perſon. For he did not onely ſhewe himſelfe mercifull and curteous, euen in moſt weightie matters of gouernment, among ſo enuious people and hatefull enemies: but he had this iudgment alſo to thinke, that the moſt noble actes he did were theſe, that he neuer gaue himſelfe vnto hatred, enuie, nor choller, to be reuenged of his moſt mortall enemie, without mercy ſhewed towardes him, though he had committed vnto him ſuch abſolute power and ſole gouernment among them. And this made his ſurname to be Olympius (as to ſaye, diuine or celeſtiall) which otherwiſe for him had bene too prowde and arrogant a name, becauſe he was of ſo good and gentle a nature, and for that in ſo great libertie he had kept cleane handes and vndefiled: euen as we eſteeme the goddes authors of all good, and cauſers of no euill, and ſo worthie to gouerne and rule the whole monarchie of the world. And not as Poets ſay, which do confound our wittes by their follies, and fond fayninges, and are alſo contrarie to themſelues, conſidering that they call heauen (which conteineth the goddes) the euerlaſting ſeate, which trembleth not, and is not driuen nor moued with windes, neither is darkened with cloudes, but is alwayes bright and cleare, and at all times ſhining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and manſion place of the eternall God, onely happy and immortall. And afterwardes they deſcribe it themſelues, full of diſſentions, of enmities, of anger and paſſions, which doe nothing become wiſe and learned men. But this diſcourſe peraduenture would be better ſpoken of in ſome other booke, Now the troubles of the ATHENIANS felt immediately after Pericles death, made them then lament the loſſe of ſo noble a member. For thoſe who vnpaciently did brooke his great authoritie while he liued, becauſe it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other ſpeakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confeſſe, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercie, then his was. And that moſt hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, did then moſt plainely appeare vnto them, to haue beene the manifeſt ramper and bullwarke of the ſafetie of their whole ſtate and common weale: ſuch corruption and vice in gouernment of the ſtate did then ſpring vp immediately after his death, which when he was aliue, he did euer ſuppreſſe and keepe vnder in ſuch ſort, that either it did not appeare at all, or at the leaſt it came not to that hed and libertie, that ſuch faultes were committed, as were vnpoſſible to be remedied.

Fabius Maximus.

HAVING already declared vnto you ſuch things worthy memorie as we could collect, and gather of the life of Pericles: it is now good time we ſhould proceede to write alſo of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is ſayed the firſt Fabius, from whom the houſe and familie of the Fabians did deſcend (being the greateſt and nobleſt houſe of all other in ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymphe (or as other ſay, a woman of the country by the riuer of Tyber. And ſome ſay, that the firſt of this houſe, were called at the beginning Fodians, becauſe they did hunte wilde beaſtes, with pittefalles and ditches. For vnto this preſent the ROMAINES call ditches, Foſſa: and to digge Fodere. Since that time, the two ſecond letters haue beene chaunged, and they haue called them Fabians. But howſoeuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that houſe: and among other, there was one of that houſe called Fabius Rullus, whome the ROMAINES for his noble acts did ſurname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whoſe life we haue now in hand, was the fourth lineally deſcended of the ſame line, and he was ſurnamed Verrucoſus, becauſe of a certen birth marke he had vpon one of his lippes, like a litle wart. And he was alſo ſurnamed Ouicula, a litle lambe, for his ſoftnes, ſlownes, and grauitie of his doings whileſt he was a childe. But becauſe of nature he was dull, ſtill, and very ſilent, & that he was ſeldome ſeene to play at any paſtime among the boyes, and for that they ſaw he was but of ſlowe capacitie, and hard to learne and conceiue, and withall that the boyes might doe to him what they would, he was ſo lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked not into him that he would proue a very foole and idiotte. Yet other were of contrarie opinion of him: who conſidering more deeply the man, perceiued in his nature a certaine ſecret conſtancie and the maieſty of a lion. But Fabius ſelfe when he was called to ſerue the common weale, did quickly ſhewe to the world, that which they tooke for dulnes in him, was his grauitie, which neuer altered for no cauſe or reſpect: and that which others iudged fearefulnes in him, was very wiſdome. And where he ſhewed himſelſe not haſtie, nor ſodaine in any thing: it was found in him an aſſured & ſettled conſtancie. Wherefore when he came to conſider the great ſoueraintie of their common weale, and the continuall warres it was in: he did vſe his bodie to all hardnes, and brought vp himſelfe therewithall, that he might be the better able to ſerue in the field: and he gaue himſelfe much to eloquence alſo, as a neceſſarie inſtrument to perſuade ſouldiers vnto reaſon. His tongue likewiſe did agree with his conditions, and manner of life. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfeat finenes in his ſpeach, but his wordes were euer very graue and profound, and his ſentences euen grafted in him by nature, and ( as ſome ſay ( were much like Thucydides ſayings. As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praiſe of his ſonne, who died when he came out of his Conſulſhippe, which is yet extant to be ſeene. Now as for him, hauing bene fiue times choſen Conſul, in his firſt yere of his conſulſhippe, he triumphed ouer the LIGVRIANS ( which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coaſt of GENVA) who being ouerthrowen by him in a great battell, where they had loſt many men, they were compelled to goe their way, and to take the ALPES for their ſuccour, & durſt no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALIE, whereupon they did confine. Hannibal entring ITALIE afterwards with a great armie, and hauing wonne the firſt battel neere vnto the riuer of TREBIA: he paſſed further, and went through THVSCAN, waſting and deſtroying all the country as he paſſed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Beſides they ſaw many ſignes & tokens, ſome common vnto them, as thundering, lightning, and ſuch other like: but other alſo more ſtraunge, neuer ſeene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certen targets were waxen all bloudy of themſelues, and that about the cittie of ANTIVM they found wheat eares, which were all bloudie when they were reaped: that there fell from heauen, burning ſtones all in a flame of fire: and in the countrie of the PHALERIANS how the element ſeemed to open, and many litle written ſcrolles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written theſe wordes, word for word: Marcus doth now handle his weapons. But all theſe ſignes and wonders did nothing appawle nor daunt the boldnes of Caius Flaminius, Conſul then: who beſides the naturall great courage, & aſpiring minde he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reaſon increaſed in him, by the wonderfull good ſucceſſe he had before. For, notwithſtanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellowe Conſul ſtoode againſt his intent: he for all that did giue battell to the GAVLES, in deſpight of them all, and wanne the victorie Likewiſe, though al theſe ſignes and wonders in the aire, did greatly trouble, and amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he ſaw no apparant cauſe to be troubled withall. But he vnderſtanding the ſmall number of his enemies and the lacke of money that was among them: gaue counſell, and was of opinion they ſhould paciently forbeare a litle, and not to hazarde battell againſt a man, whoſe armie had bene long trained in wars, and by many foughten fieldes was growen valiant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they ſhould ſend ayde to their ſubiects, and other their allies and confederates, as neede required, to keepe their citties ſtill vnder their obedience: and in the meane ſeaſon by tract of time, to weare out Hanniballs force & power, which was like ſtraw ſet on fire, that ſtraight giueth forth a blaſe, and yet hath no ſubſtance to holde fire long. When Fabius had thus ſayed enough to perſwade Flaminius, yet it would not ſinke into Flaminius heade: for, ſayeth he, I wil not tarie vntill the warres come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the cittie, to defend it, and as Camillus did, that fought within the cittie ſelfe in old time. Whereupon he commaunded his captaines to ſet out their bandes to the field, and he himſelfe tooke his horſe backe: which vpon the ſodaine, without any cauſe was ſo afeard, and tooke ſo on with himſelfe, that he caſt the Conſul to the ground with his heade forward. For all this fall he would not chaunge his minde, but helde on his iorney toward Hannibal, & preſented him battell in THVSCAN, by the lake called Thraſimena, which is the lake of PERVSIA. This battel was ſo fiercely fought on both ſides, that notwithſtanding there was ſuch a terrible earthquake therewhile, that ſome cities were ouerthrowen and turned topſy turuey, ſome riuers had their ſtreames turned againſt their courſe, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in ſunder, and broken open: yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any ſuch thing at all. Flaminius the Conſul ſelfe was ſlaine at that battell, after he had in his owne perſon done many a valiant acte, and many of the worthieſt gentlemen and valianteſt ſouldiers of his armie laye dead about him: the reſidue being fled, the ſlaughter was great, for the bodies ſlaine were fifteene thouſand, and ſo many priſoners left aliue. After this ouerthrow, Hannibal made al the ſearch he could poſſible to finde the body of Flaminius, nius, to burie him honorably, becauſe of his valiantnes: but he could neuer be founde amongeſt the dead bodies, neither was it euer heard what became of it. Now as touching the firſt ouerthrow at TREBIA, neither the generall that wrote it, nor the poaſte that brought the firſt newes to ROME, tolde the trothe of it as it was, but fayned that the ende was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the beſt. But of this battell, ſo ſoone as the Prætor Pomponius had receiued the newes, he called all the people to counſell, where without diſguiſing or diſſembling at all, he playnely ſayed thus vnto them. My Lordes, we haue loſt the battell, our armie is ouerthrowne, and the Conſul himſelfe is ſlaine in the fielde: wherefore conſider what you haue to doe, and prouide for your ſafety. Theſe wordes ſpoken to the people, as, it had beene a boyſterous ſtorme of weather that had fallen on them from the ſea, to put them in daunger, did ſo terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole cittie for feare: that they were all in a maze, and knew not what to determine. Yet in the ende they all agreed that it ſtoode them vpon to haue a chiefe magiſtrate, called in Latin Dictatura, that ſhould be a man of courage, and could ſtoutely vſe it without ſparing or fearing any perſon. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the onely man meete to be choſen, as he, whoſe noble courage and graue behauiour was aunſwerable, to the dignitie and ſoueraintie of the office: and moreouer, that to his grauitie and wiſdome there was ioyned (by reaſonable age) ſtrengh of bodie, and valiantneſſe with experience. This counſell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was choſen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius generall of the horſemen. Then he firſt required the Senate, that they would graunt him he might haue his horſe in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expreſſely forbidden by an auncient order. Either becauſe they thought the chiefeſt force of their armie dyd conſiſt in their footemen, which cauſed the making of this lawe: whereby the generall ſhould be amongeſt them in the daye of the battell, and in no wiſe ſhould forſake them. Or els becauſe the authoritie of this magiſtrate in all other thinges was ſo great, that it was in manner after the ſtate of a King: yet all this notwithſtanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dictator ſhould haue abſolute power ouer the people. Fabius at his firſt comming, becauſe he would ſhewe the maieſtie and dignitie of his office, that euery man, ſhould be the more obedient and readye at his commaundement: when he went abroade, he had foure and twentie ſergeantes before him, carying the bundelles of roddes, and axes. And when one of the conſulls came to him, he ſent a ſergeant to commaund his bundell of roddes that were caried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layed a ſide: and that he ſhould come and ſpeake with him, as a priuate man. And firſt to make a good foundation, and to beginne with the ſeruice of the goddes: he declared vnto the people, that the loſſe they had receiued, came through the raſhnes and wilfull negligence of their captaine, who made no reckoning of the goddes nor religion: and not through any defaulte and cowardlines of the ſouldiers. And for this cauſe he did perſuade them not to be afrayde of their enemies, but to appeaſe the wrath of the goddes, and to ſerue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby ſuperſticious, but did confirme their valiancie with true religion and godlines: and beſides did vtterly take awaye and aſwage their feare of their enemies, by giuing them certaine hope and aſſuraunce of the ayde of the goddes. Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles propheſies peruſed, which were kept very ſecret and therein they found certaine auncient propheſies and oracles, which ſpake of the preſent miſfortunes of the time. But what were conteyned therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered to any perſon. Afterwardes the Dictator, before the open aſſemblie of the people, made a ſolemne vowe vnto the goddes, that he would ſacrifice all the profittes and frutes that ſhould fall the next yere, of ſheepe, of ſowes, of milch kine, and of goats in all the mountaines, champion countrie, riuers, or meadowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of muſicke, and ſhewe other ſightes in the honour of the goddes, and would beſtow vpon the ſame the ſumme of three hundreth three and thirtie Seſtercians, & three hundreth three and thirtie Romaine pence, and a thirde part ouer. All which ſumme reduced into Grecian money, amounteth to foure ſcore three thouſand, fiue hundreth, and foure ſcore, and three ſiluer drachmas, and two obolos. ſumme ſo preciſely, and why he did deuide it by three, vnleſſe it were to extoll the power of the number of three: becauſe it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the firſt of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of diuerſe numbers, and conteineth in it ſelfe the firſt differences, and the firſt elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius hauing brought the people to hope, and truſt to haue the ayde and fauour of the gods: made them in the end the better diſpoſed to liue well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the gods would ſend good luck and proſperitie vnto men, through their valiantneſſe and wiſdome: did ſtraight ſet forwards vnto Hannibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully reſolued to weare out his ſtrength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increaſe his pouertie by the long ſpending of his owne money, and to conſume the ſmall number of his people, with the great number of his ſouldiers. Fabius camped alwaies in the ſtrong and high places of the mountaines, out of all danger of his enemies horſemen, and coaſted ſtill after the enemie: ſo that when Hannibal ſtayed in any place, Fabius alſo ſtayed: if Hannibal remooued, he followed him ſtraight, and would be alwayes neere him, but neuer forſooke the hilles, neither would he come ſo neere him, as that he ſhould be inforced to fight againſt his will. Yet alwayes he followed the enemie at his tayle, and made him euer afeard of him, thinking ſtill that he ſought to get the vantage, to giue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this ſort: he became diſliked of euery body. For euery man both in his owne campe, and abroade, ſpake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better, then a rancke coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiuing his great reache and policie, and foreſeeing the manner of fight, ſawe there was no remedie, but by plaine force or ſlight to bring him to the fight: for otherwiſe his delay would ouerthrowe the CARTHAGINIANS, when they ſhould not come to handie ſtrokes with him, wherein onely conſiſted all their hope and ſtrength, and in the meane time his ſouldiers ſhould fall away, and dye, and his money was ſcant, and himſelfe ſhould growe the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethinke him, and deuiſe all the ſtratageins and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wreſtler, to ſeeke out all the trickes he could to giue his aduerſarie the fall. For ſodainely, he would go and giue alarum to his campe: by and by againe he would retire. Another time he would remooue his campe, from one place to another, and giue him ſome aduantage, to ſee if he could plucke his lingring deuiſe out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued ſtill reſolute in his firſt determination: that delay of fight was the beſt way ſo to ouerthrowe him. Howbeit Minutius, generall of his horſemen, did trouble him much. For he being earneſtly bent to fight without diſcretion, and brauing of a luſtie courage, crept into opinion with the ſouldiers, by his hotte furie and deſire to fight. Which wrought much in them, and ſo ſtirred vp their courages, that they mocked Fabius altogether: and called him Hannibals ſchoolemaiſter: and contrariwiſe they commended Minutius, for a valiant captaine, and worthie ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke high, and haue a proude opinion of himſelfe, mocking Fabius becauſe he euer lodged on the hilles, with ſaying, the Dictator would make them goodly ſportes, to ſee their enemies waſte and burne ITALY before their face. Moreouer, he asked Fabius friends, whether he would in the end lodge his campe in the ſkie, that he did climbe vp ſo high vpon mountaines, miſtruſting the earth: or elſe that hee was ſo affrayde, his enemies would finde him out, that hee went to hide him ſelfe in the cloudes. Fabius friendes made reporte of theſe ieaſts, and aduiſed him rather to hazard battell, then to beare ſuch reproachefull wordes as were ſpoken of him. But Fabius aunſwered them. If I ſhould yeeld to that you counſell me, I ſhould ſhewe my ſelfe a greater cowarde then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and ſpightfull wordes. For it is no ſhame for a man to ſtand fearefull, and iealous, of the welfare and ſafetie of his countrey: but otherwiſe to be afeard of the wagging of euery ſtrawe, or to regarde euery common prating, it is not the parte of a worthie man of charge, but rather of a baſe minded perſon, to ſeeke to pleaſe thoſe whome hee ought to commaunde and gouerne, becauſe they are but fooles. After this, Hanniball chaunced to fall into a great errour. For intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the plaines, where there was plentie of victuals, and ſtore of paſture to feede his horſe and cattell: he commaunded his guides to bring him ſtraight after ſupper, into the plaine of CASINVM. They miſtaking his words, and not vnderſtanding well what he ſaid, becauſe his ITALIAN tongue was but meane: tooke one thing for another, and ſo brought him and his armie to the end of a field neere the citie of CASILINVM, through the middeſt of the which runneth a riuer, the ROMAINES call Vulturnus. Now the countrie lying by it, was a valley compaſſed in with mountaines round about, ſauing that the riuer went to the ſea: where leauing his owne banckes, it ſpreadeth abroade into the mariſſes, and banckes of ſand very deepe, and in the ende fell into that parte of the ſea which is moſt daungerous, and there was neither ſuccour nor couert. Hanniball being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a ſacke, Fabius that knewe the countrie, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabouts, followed him ſtep by ſtep, and ſtopped his paſſage, where he ſhould haue come out of the valley, with foure thouſand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the ſtraight, and diſpoſed the reſt of his armie vpon the hangings of the hilles, in the moſt apt and fit places all about. Then with his light horſemen he gaue a charge, vpon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hannibals armie by and by out of order, and ſo there were ſlaine eight hundred of his men. Whereupon Hanniball would haue remoued his campe thence immediatly, and knowing then the faulte his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the danger wherein they had brought him: he roundly truſſed them vp, and hung them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the tops of the hilles, and to winne them from their ſtrength, he ſawe it was vnpoſſible, and out of all hope. Wherefore, perceiuing his ſouldiers both afraide and diſcouraged, for that they ſawe themſelues hemmed in on all ſides, without any order to eſcape: Hanniball determined to deceiue Fabius by a deuiſe. He cauſed ſtraight two thouſand oxen to be choſen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their ſpoiles, and tyed to their hornes light bundels of reedes, and ſallowe faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commaunded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they ſawe any ſignall or token lift vp in the ayre in the night, they ſhould then ſtraight ſet fire on thoſe bundels and bunches, and driue vp the beaſts to the hilles, toward the wayes where the enemies laye. Whileſt theſe things were a preparing, he on the other ſide ranged his armie in order of battell: and when night came, cauſed them to marche faire and ſoftly. Now theſe beaſts, whileſt the fire was but litle that burnt vpon their hornes, went but faire and ſoftly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driuen. In ſo much as the heard men that were on the toppe of the mountaines, wondered maruellouſlie to ſee ſuch flames and fires about the hornes of ſo many beaſts, as if it had bene an armie marching in order of battell with lightes and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the ſtumpes, and that the force of the fire did frie their very fleſh: then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to ſhake their heads, whereby they did ſet one another a fire. Then left they their ſoft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extreame paine they felt, beganne to runne heere and there in the mountaines, carying fire ſtill about their hornes, and in their tailes, and ſet fire of all the boughes and coppeſies they paſſed by. This was a ſtrange ſight to looke vpon, and did much amaze the ROMAINES that kept the paſſages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne heere and there with torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a maruellous feare and trouble, ſuppoſing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuiron them of all ſides: ſo as they durſt no more keepe the paſſages which they were commaunded, but forſaking their ſtraights, began to flie towards their maine and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horſemen immediatly poſſeſſed the ſtraights that were kept: by reaſon whereof, all the reſt of his armie marched out at their eaſe and leiſure, without feare or daunger, notwithſtanding that they were loden and troubled with maruellous great ſpoiles, and of all kinde of ſortes. Fabius then perceiued very well the ſame night, that it was but a ſlight of Hannibal: for ſome of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his armie. Whereupon fearing to fall vpon ſome ambuſhe by reaſon of the darke night, he kept his men in battell raye, without ſturring, or making any noiſe. The next morning by breake of day, he began to follow his enemie by the tracke, and fell vpon the taile of the rereward, with whome he ſkirmiſhed within the ſtraites of the mountaines: and ſo did diſtreſſe ſomewhat Hannibals armie. Hanniball thereupon ſent out of his vauntgarde a certaine number of Spaniards (very luſtie and nimble fellowes, that were vſed to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who comming downe, and ſetting vpon the ROMAINES that were heauie armed, ſlue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they deſpiſed Fabius the more, and thought worſe of him then they did before: becauſe his pretence and determination was not to be brought to fight with Hanniball, but by wiſedome and policie to ouerthrowe him, where as he him ſelfe by Hanniball was firſt finely handled and deceiued. Hanniball then to bring Fabius further in diſliking and ſuſpition with the ROMAINES, commaunded his ſouldiers when they came neere any of Fabius lands, that they ſhould burne and deſtroye all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wiſe to medle with Fabius lands, nor any thing of his, and did purpoſely appoint a garriſon to ſee that nothing of Fabius ſhould miſcarie, nor yet take hurt. This was ſtraight caried to ROME, which did thereby the more incenſe the people againſt him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceaſed crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus ſpeciall procurement and perſwaſion: who of himſelfe had no cauſe to miſlike with Fabius, but onely becauſe he was Minutius kinſeman (generall of the horſemen) and thought that the ill opinion they bare to Fabius, would turne to the praiſe and aduauncement of Minutius. The Senate alſo were much offended with Fabius, for the compoſition he made with Hanniball, touching the priſoners taken of either ſide. For it was articled betweene them, that they ſhould chaunge priſoners, deliuering man for man, or elſe two hundred and fiftie ſiluer drachmas for a man, if the one chaunced to haue moe priſoners then the other. When exchange was made betweene them, it appeared that Hanniball had left in his hands of ROMAINE priſoners, two hundred and fortie moe, then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commaunded there ſhould be no money ſent to redeeme them, and greatly found fault with Fabius for making this accorde: becauſe it was neither honorable, nor profitable for the common weale, to redeeme men that cowardly ſuffered themſelues to be taken priſoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderſtanding it, did paciently beare this diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him by the Senate. Howbeit hauing no money, and meaning to keepe his word, and not to leaue the poore cittizens priſoners behinde him: he ſent his ſonne to ROME, with commiſſion to ſell his lands, and to bring him money immediatly. The young man went his waye to ROME, and ſould his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the priſoners, and ſent their ranſome vnto Hanniball. Many of the priſoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay him their ranſome: but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ranſome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the prieſts to do certaine ſolemne ſacrifices, he left the armie in charge with Minutius, to gouerne the ſame in his abſence, with condition not to ſet vpon the enemie, nor to fight with him at all: the which not onely by his authoritie he did expreſſely forbid him, but alſo as his very friend, he did warne and intreate him in no wiſe to attempt. Howbeit Minutius litle regarding his commaundements or requeſts, ſo ſoone as Fabius backe was turned, began to bee ſomewhat luſtie, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongſt the reſt, Minutius perceiuing Hanniball had ſent a great part of his armie abroade to forrage and get victuales: came and ſet vpon them that remained behinde, and draue them into their campe, with great ſlaughter, and did put them in a maruellous feare that were ſaued, as men that looked for no leſſe, but to haue bene beſieged in their campe. Afterwards alſo, when their whole armie came together againe: he retired backe in ſpight of them all, and loſt not a man. This exploite ſet Minutius in a pride, and brought the ſouldiers to be more raſhe then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrowe went with ſpeede to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, ſaied: he was more afeard of Minutius proſperitie then of his owne aduerſitie. But the common people reioyced maruellouſlie, and made great ſhewe of ioye vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlineſſe, but with flat treaſon. Furthermore, he did accuſe the Nobilitie and greateſt men of ROME, ſaying: that from the firſt beginning they had layde a plotte to drawe theſe warres out at length, onely to deſtroy the peoples power and authoritie, hauing brought the whole commonweale, to the ſtate of a monarchie, and into the handes of a priuate perſon. Who by his remiſſeneſſe and delaies, would giue Hanniball leiſure to plante himſelfe in ITALIE, and by time giue open paſſage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleaſure to ſend Hanniball a ſecond aide and armie, to make a full conqueſt of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing theſe words, roſe vp ſtraight, and ſpake to the people, and taried not about the aunſwering of the accuſations the Tribune had burthened him withall, but prayed them they would diſpatche theſe ſacrifices and ceremonies of the goddes, that he might ſpeedily returne againe to the campe, to puniſh Minutius, for breaking his commaundement, in fighting with the enemie. He had no ſooner ſpoken theſe wordes, but there roſe a maruellous tumult and hurley burlie preſently among the people, for the danger Minutius ſtoode in then: becauſe the Dictator had abſolute power and authoritie to impriſon and put to death, whom he thought good, without ordinarie courſe of lawe or araignement. Moreouer, they did iudge, ſince Fabius had of late left his accuſtomed mildneſſe and affabilitie, that he would grow to ſuch ſeueritie in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appeaſe him. Wherefore euery man held their peace for feare, ſaunig onely Metellus the Tribune. He hauing authoritie by vertue of his office, to ſay what he thought good, and who onely of all other kept ſtill his place and authoritie, when any Dictator was choſen: then all the officers that were put downe, inſtantlie beſought the people not to forſake Minutius, nor to ſuffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his ſonne, who ſtroke off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and ouercome them, for breaking his commaundement. And began to perſwade them further, to take this tyrannicall power of the Dictatorſhip from Fabius: and to put their affaires into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them ſafely to paſſe. The people were tickled maruellouſlie with theſe ſeditious words, but yet they durſt not force Fabius to reſigne his Dictatorſhip, though they bare him great grudge, and were angrie with him in their hearts. Howbeit they ordained that Minutius thenceforth ſhould haue equall power and authoritie with the Dictator in the warres, a thing that was neuer ſeene nor heard of before, and yet the very ſame done in that ſort againe, after the battell of Cannes. For Marcus Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they did chooſe another Dictator at ROME, which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create new Senators in the place of thoſe that were ſlaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and reſtored the full number againe of the counſell of the Senate: he diſcharged the ſelfe ſame day the ſergeants that caried the axes before him, and ſent away the traine that waited vpon him, and did ſo put himſelfe in preaſe of the people in the market place, and followed his owne peculiar buſineſſe as a priuate perſon. Nowe the ROMAINES imagined, that when Fabius ſhould ſee how they had made Minutius equall in authoritie with him, it would greeue him to the heart for very anger: but they came ſhorte to iudge of his nature, for he did not thinke that their follie ſhould hurte or diſhonour him at all. But as wiſe Diogenes aunſwered one that ſaied vnto him, looke, they mocke thee: tuſhe (ſaied he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby, that he tooke them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius tooke euery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and did comfort himſelfe with the Philoſophers rules and examples: who do maintaine, that an honeſt and wiſe man, can no waye be iniured nor diſhonoured. For all the diſpleaſure he receiued by the peoples follie, was in reſpect of the commonwealth: becauſe they had put a ſworde into a madde mans hand, in giuing Minutius authoritie to followe his raſhe humour, and fonde ambition in the warres. Wherefore, fearing leaſt he being blinded with vaine glorie, and preſumptuous opinion of him ſelfe, ſhould raſhelie (and vpon a head) haſten to do ſome great hurt before he came to the campe: he departed ſodainely out of ROME without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the campe, where he found Minutius ſo proud and ſtout, that he was not to be delt with. For he would needes haue the authoritie to command the whole armie when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not conſent to that, but deuided the one halfe of the armie betweene them: thinking it better he ſhould alone commaunde the one halfe, then the whole armie by turnes. So he choſe for himſelfe, the firſt and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the ſecond and fourth, and deuided alſo betwene them the aide of their friends. And when Minutius made his boaſt, that the maieſtie of the higheſt magiſtrate was brought lower for his ſake: Fabius tolde him that he might thinke, if he were wiſe, he had not to fight with him, but with Hanniball: and if he would needes contend againſt his companion, yet he ſhould haue a ſpeciall regarde and conſideration, that hauing wonne now the citizens good willes, by whom he was ſo much honoured, he ſhould haue no leſſe care of their health and ſafetie, then he had, who was now troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his leſſon, for a counterfeat mocke, after old mens manners & faſhion: and ſo taking the one halfe of the armie vnto him, went and lodged alone by himſelfe. Hanniball hearing of their iarre and ſquaring together, ſought ſtraight oportunitie to make their diſcord finely to ſerue his turne. Now there was a hill betweene both their campes not very harde to be wonne, and it was an excellent place to lodge a campe ſafely in, and was very fitte and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, did ſeeme a farre off to be very plaine & euen ground, becauſe they had no couert of wood to ſhadow them, yet were there many ditches and little vallies in them: wherefore Hanniball though he might eaſily haue taken it at his pleaſure if he had liſted, did let it alone in the middeſt betweene them, for a baite to drawe out his enemies to the battell. Now when Hanniball ſaw Fabius and Minutius lodged a ſunder, he placed certaine bandes in the night, among thoſe ditches and vallies. Afterwardes the next morning by breake of day, he ſent a ſmall number of men openly to winne this hill: hoping by this pollicie to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out in deede. For firſt Minutius ſent thither his light horſemen, and afterwardes all his men at armes: and laſtly perceiuing that Hanniball himſelfe came to relieue his men that were vpon the hill, he himſelfe marched forward alſo with all the reſt of his armie in order of battell, and gaue a whot charge vpon them that defended the hill, to driue them thence. The fight continued equall a good ſpace betweene them both, vntill ſuch time as Hanniball ſaw his enemie come directly within his danger, and ſhewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had laide in ambuſh: he ſtraight raiſed the ſignall he had giuen them. They vpon that diſcouered all together, and with great cries did ſet vpon the rereward of the ROMAINES, and ſlew a great number of them at the firſt charge: and did put the reſt in ſuch a feare and diſorder, as it is vnpoſſible to expreſſe it. Then was Minutius raſh brauerie and fonde boaſtes much cooled, when he looked firſt vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and ſaw in none of them any courage to tarie by it, but rather that they were all readie to runne away. Which if they had done, they had bene caſt away euery man: for the NVMIDIANS finding they were the ſtronger, did diſperſe themſelues all about the plaine, killing all ſtraglers that fled. Minutius ſouldiers being brought to this daunger and diſtreſſe, which Fabius foreſaw they would fall into, and hauing vpon this occaſion his armie readie ranged in order of battell, to ſee what would become of Minutius, not by report of meſſengers, but with his owne eies: he got him to a litle hill before his campe, where when he ſaw Minutius and all his men compaſſed about on euery ſide, and euen ſtaggering and readie to flie, and heard beſide their cries not like men that had harts to fight, but as men ſcared, and readie to flie for feare to ſaue themſelues: he clapped his hande on his thigh, and fetched a great ſigh, ſaying to thoſe that were about him: O goddes, how Minutius is gone to caſt himſelfe away, ſooner then I looked for, and later then he deſired? But in ſpeaking theſe words, he made his enſignes march on in haſte, crying out aloud. O my friends, we muſt diſpatch with ſpeede to ſuccour Minutius: for he is a valiant man of perſon, and one that loueth the honour of his countrie. And though with ouermuch hardines he hath ventred too farre, & made a fault, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time ſerueth not nowe to accuſe him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he preſently brake

the Nvmides, and diſperſed them, that lay waiting in the fields for the Romaines, which they thought would haue fled. Afterwards he went further, and did ſet vppon them that had giuen charge vpon the rereward of Minutius battell, where he ſlew them that made head againſt him. The reſidue, fearing leaſt they ſhould fall into the daunger they had brought the Romaines vnto: before they were enuironned in of all ſides, did turne taile ſtraight to Fabius. Now Hanniball ſeeing this chaunge, and conſidering how Fabius in perſon, with more courage then his age required, did make a lane in the middeſt of thoſe that fought againſt the ſide of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was: he made the battell to ceaſe, and commaunded to ſound the retreate, and ſo drew backe his men againe into his campe, the Romaines being very glad alſo they might retire with ſafetie. They ſay Hanniball in his retiring, ſaid merrily to his friends: haue not I tolde you (Sirs) many a time and oft, of the hanging cloude we ſawe on the toppe of the mountaines, howe it would breake out in the ende with a tempeſt that would fall vpon vs? After this battell, Fabius hauing ſtript thoſe that were left dead in the field, retired againe to his owne campe, & ſpake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his campe, aſſembled his ſouldiers, and ſpake thus to them. My friends, not to erre at all, enterpriſing great matters, it is a thing paſſing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faultes that are paſt and done, it is the part of a wiſe and valiant man. For my ſelfe, I acknowledge I haue no leſſe occaſion to praiſe fortune, then I haue alſo cauſe to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I haue learned by experience in one little peece of a day: and that is this. That I am not able to commaunde, but am my ſelfe fitter to be gouerned and commaunded by another: and that I am but a foole to ſtande in mine owne conceipt, thinking to ouercome thoſe, of whom it is more honour for me to confeſſe my ſelfe to be ouercome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth ſhalbe he, who alone ſhall commaund you in all things. And to let him know that we doe all acknowledge the fauour which we haue preſently receiued at his hands: I will leade you to giue him thankes, and will my ſelfe be the firſt man to offer to obey him in all that he ſhall commaund me. Theſe wordes being ſpoken, he commaunded his enſigne bearers to follow him, and he him ſelfe matched formoſt towards Fabius campe. When he came thither, he went directly to the Dictators tent: whereat euery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to meete him. Minutius after he had ſet downe his enſignes at his feete, ſaid with a loud voice, O father: and his ſouldiers vnto Fabius ſouldiers, O maſters, which name the bondmen that are infranchiſed, doe vſe to them that haue manumiſſed them. Afterwards euery man being ſilent, Minutius beganne a loud to ſay vnto him. My lorde Dictator, this day you haue wonne two victories. The one of Hanniball, whom valiantly you haue ouercome: the ſecond, of my ſelfe your companion, whom alſo your wiſedome and goodnes hath vanquiſhed. By the one, you haue ſaued our liues: and by the other, you haue wiſely taught vs. So haue we alſo bene ouercome in two ſortes: the one by Hanniball to our ſhame, and the other by your ſelfe, to our honour and preſeruation. And therefore doe I now call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honour you: acknowledging my ſelfe more bound vnto you for the preſent grace and fauour I haue receiued of you, then vnto my naturall father that begot me. For by him onely I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all theſe honeſt citizens liues haue bene ſaued. And hauing ſpoken theſe wordes, he embraced Fabius: and ſo did the ſouldiers alſo, heartily embrace together, and kiſſe one another. Thus the ioy was great through the whole campe, and one were ſo glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their cheekes for ioy. Now when Fabius was afterwardes put out of his office of Dictatorſhippe, there were new Conſuls choſen againe: the two firſt followed directly Fabius former order he had begunne. For they kept themſelues from giuing Hanniball any battell, and did alwaies ſende aide to their ſubiectes and friendes, to keepe them from rebellion: vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth, and knowen to be very bolde and raſh) by flattering of the people, wanne credit among them to be made Conſull. Then they thought that he by his raſhneſſe and lacke of experience, would incontinently hazard battell: becauſe he had cried out in all the aſſemblies before, that this warre would be euerlaſting, ſo long as the people did chuſe any of the Fabians to be their generals, nerals, and vaunted him ſelfe openly, that the firſt day he came to ſee his enemies, he would ouerthrow them. In giuing out theſe braue wordes, he aſſembled ſuch a power, that the ROMAINES neuer ſaw ſo great a number together, againſt any enemie that euer they had: for he put into one campe, foure ſcore and eight thouſand fighting men. This made Fabius and the other ROMAINES, men of great wiſedome and iudgement, greatly affraide: becauſe they ſaw no hope for ROME to riſe againe, if it fortuned that they ſhould looſe ſo great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other Conſull, called Paulus Aemilius, a man very skilfull and expert in warres, but ill beloued of the common people, whoſe furie he yet feared, for that they had condemned him a little before to pay a great fine to the treaſurie: and after he had ſomwhat comforted him, he beganne to perſwade and encourage him to reſiſt the fond raſhneſſe of his companion, telling him, that he ſhould haue aſmuch to doe with Terentius Varro for the preſeruation and ſafety of his countrie, as to fight with Hanniball for defence of the ſame. For they were both Marſhall men, and had a like deſire to fight: the one becauſe he knew not wherein the vantage of his ſtrength conſiſted, and the other becauſe he knewe very well his weaknes. You ſhall haue reaſon to beleeue me better, for matters touching Hanniball, then Terentius Varro. For I dare warrant you, if you keep Hannibal from battell but this yere: he ſhall of neceſſitie, if he tarrie, conſume himſelfe, or els for ſhame be driuen to flie with his armie. And the rather, becauſe hitherto (though he ſeeme to be lorde of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his part: and moreouer becauſe there remaines at this day in his campe not the third part of his armie, he brought with him out of his countrie. Vnto theſe perſwaſions, the Conſull (as it is reported) anſwered thus. When I looke into my ſelfe, my lorde Fabius, mee thinkes my beſt way were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once againe to light into the hands and voices of our citizens. Therefore, ſith the eſtate of the common wealth ſo requireth it, that it behoueth a man to doe as you haue ſaide: I will doe my beſt indeuour to ſhewe my ſelfe a wiſe captaine, for your ſake only, rather then for all other that ſhould aduiſe me to the contrarie. And ſo Paulus departed from ROME with this minde. But Terentius his companion would in any caſe, they ſhould cōmaund the whole armie by turnes, ech his day by himſelfe: and went to encampe hard by Hanniball, by the riuer of Aufide, neere vnto the village called CANNES. Now when it came to his day to commaund by turnes, early in the morning he cauſed the ſignall of battell to be ſet out, which was a coate armour of skarlet in graine, that they did lay out vpon the pauilion of the generall: ſo that the enemies at the firſt ſight, beganne to be affeard, to ſee the luſtineſſe of this new come generall, and the great number of ſouldiers he had alſo in his hoaſt, in compariſon of them that were not halfe ſo many. Yet Hanniball of a good courage, commaunded euery man to arme, and to put them ſelues in order of battell: and him ſelfe in the meane time taking his horſe backe, followed with a few, gallopped vp to the toppe of a litle hill not very ſteepe, from whence he might plainely diſcerne all the ROMAINES campe, and ſawe how they did range their men in order of battell. Now one Giſcon (a man of like ſtate and nobilitie as him ſelfe) being with him at that time, tolde him, that the enemies ſeemed a farre off to be a maruellous number. But Hanniball rubbing his forehead, aunſwered him. Yea, ſaid he, but there is another thing more to be wondred at then you thinke of Giſcon. Giſcon ſtraight asked him: What? marie ſaith he this: that, of all the great number of ſouldiers you ſee yonder, there is not a man of them called Giſcon as you are. This merry anſwere deliuered contrarie to their expectation that were with him, looking for ſome great waightie matter, made them all laugh a good. So downe the hill they came laughing a loud, and tolde this pretie ieaſt to all they met as they rode, which ſtraight from one to another ranne ouer all the campe, in ſo much as Hanniball himſelfe could not holde from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN ſouldiers perceiuing this, beganne to be of a good courage, imagining that their generall would not be ſo merily diſpoſed as to fall a laughing, being ſo neere daunger, if he had not perceiued him ſelfe a great deale to be the ſtronger, and that he had good cauſe alſo to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore, he ſhewed two policies of a skilfull captaine in the battell. The firſt was, the ſituation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, ſo as they had the winde on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raiſed a ſharpe duſt out of the open ſandy vallie,and paſſing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS ſquadron,blew full in the ROMAINES faces, with ſuch a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne rankes. The ſecond policie was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either ſide of his winges, the beſt and valianteſt ſouldiers he had in all his armie: and did fill vp the middeſt of his battell with the worſt of his men, which he made like a point, and was farther out by a great deale, then the two winges of the front of his battell. So hee commaunded thoſe of the winges, that when the ROMAINES had broken his firſt front,and followed thoſe that gaue backe, whereby the middeſt of his battell ſhould leaue an hollowe place,and the enemies ſhould come in ſtill increaſing within the compaſſe of the two winges: that then they ſhould ſet vpon them on both ſides, and charge their flanks immediatly,and ſo incloſe them in behind. And this was cauſe of a greater ſlaughter. For when the middle battell beganne to giue backe, and to receiue the ROMAINES within it, who purſued the other very whotly, Hannibals battell chaunged her forme: and where at the beginning it was like a point, it became now in the middeſt like a creſſant or halfe moone. Then the captaines of the choſen bandes that lay out in both the winges, made their men to turne, ſome on the left hand, and ſome on the right, and charged the ROMAINES on the flankes, and behind, where they were all naked: ſo they killed all thoſe that could not ſaue themſelues by flying, before they were enuironned.

They ſay alſo, that there fell out another miſchiefe by miſfortune, vnto the horſemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occaſion. The horſe of Paulus Æmilius the Conſull being hurt, did throwe his maſter on the ground: whereupon thoſe that were next him, did light from their horſe backes to helpe him. The reſidue of the horſemen that were a great way behinde him, ſeeing them light, thought they had beene all commaunded to light: hereupon euery man forſooke their horſe, and fought it out a foote. Hanniball when he ſaw that, ſaid: yea marie, I had rather haue them ſo, then deliuered me bound hand and foote. But for thoſe matters, the hiſtoriographers doe dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Conſuls, Varro ſaued himſelfe by his horſe, with a fewe following him, within the citie of VENVSA.

Paulus being in the middeſt of the throng of all the armie, his bodie full of arrowes that ſtucke faſt in his woundes, and his heart ſore loden with grieuous ſorrowe and anguiſh to ſee the ouerthrow of his men: was ſet downe by a rocke, looking for ſome of his enemies, to come and rid him out of his paine. But fewe could knowe him, his head and face was of ſuch a gore bloud: inſomuch as his friendes and ſeruantes alſo paſſed by him, and knewe him not. And there was but one young gentleman of a noble houſe, of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knew him, who did his beſt endeuour to ſaue him. For he lighted a foote preſently, & brought him his horſe, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could ſaue him ſelfe for the neceſſitie of his countrie, which now more then euer had neede of a good and wiſe captaine. But he refuſed the gentlemans offer and his intreatie, and compelled him to take his horſe backe againe, though the teares ranne downe his cheekes for pittie: and raiſing himſelfe vp to take him by the hand, he ſaide vnto him. I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, and witneſſe with me, that Paulus Æmilius euen to his laſt houre hath followed his counſell, and did neuer ſwarue from the promiſe he made him: but that firſt he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hanniball. When he had deliuered theſe words, he bad Lentulus farewell: and running againe into the furie of the ſlaughter, there he died among his ſlaine companions.

50000. Romaines ſlaine at the battell of Cannes.

It is thought there were ſlaine at this battell, fiftie thouſand ROMAINES, and foure thouſand taken priſoners: and other ten thouſand that were taken priſoners in two campes after the battell. When this noble victorie was gotten, Hannibals friends gaue him counſell to follow his good fortune: and to enter ROME after the ſcattered number that fled thither: ſo as within fewe daies following he might ſuppe in their capitoll. A man cannot eaſily geſſe what was the cauſe that ſtayed him, that he went not, vnleſſe it was (as I thinke) ſome good fortune, or fauourable God toward the ROMAINES that withſtood him, & made him afeard and glad to retire. Whereupon they ſay, that one Barca a CARTHAGINIAN, in his anger ſaid to Hanniball: Sir, you haue the way to ouercome, but you cannot vſe victorie. Notwithſtanding, this victorie made a maruellous chaunge for him.

For hereupon, all ITALY in manner came in to ſubmit them ſelues to him: where before he had no towne at commaundement, nor any ſtorehouſe or port through all ITALY, yea hee did maruellous hardly, and with much a doe vittell his army with that he could daily robbe and ſpoile, hauing no certaine place to retire vnto, nor grounded hope to entertaine theſe warres, but kept the field with his army, remouing from place to place, as they had bene a great nũber of murderers and theeues together. For the moſt part of the country, did yeeld immediatly vnto him: as the city of CAPVA, being the chiefeſt and greateſt city of all ITALY but ROME, and did receiue Hanniball, and were at his deuotion. Thus we may plainely ſee, that as the poet Euripides ſaieth: it is a great miſchiefe not onely to be driuen to make triall of friends, but proofe alſo of captaines wiſdome. For that which before they accounted cowardlineſſe and faint heart in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reaſon, and rather a heauenly wiſdome and influence, that ſo long foreſaw the thinges to come, which the parties ſelues that afterwardes felt them, gaue litle credite vnto before. Vpon this occaſion, ROME repoſed incontinently all their hope and truſt in Fabius, and they repaired to him for counſell, as they would haue run vnto ſome temple or altar for ſanctuary. So as the firſt and chiefeſt cauſe of ſtaying the people together from diſperſing themſelues abroade, as they did when ROME was taken by the GAVLES: was the onely opinion and confidence they had in Fabius wiſedome. For where before he ſeemed to be a coward, and timerous, when there was no dannger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for ſorrow, which could not helpe, and that all the world was ſo troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the city very modeſtly, with a bold conſtant countenaunce, ſpeaking curteouſly to euery one, and did appeaſe their womaniſh cries and lamentations, and did forbid the common aſſemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corſe at their burials. Then he perſwaded the Senat to aſſemble in counſell, and did comfort vp thoſe that were magiſtrates, and hee alone was the onely force and power of the city: for there was not a man that bare any office, but did caſt his eye vppon Fabius, to know what he ſhould do. He it was that cauſed the gates of the city ſtraight to be warded, and to keepe thoſe in for going their waie, that would haue forſaken the citie. Hee moreouer did appoint the time and place of mourning, and did commaund whoſoeuer was diſpoſed to mourne, that he ſhould doe it priuately in his owne houſe, and to continue onely but thirty daies. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, and that the city might be cleane from ſuch vnclean things. So the feaſt of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leaue off the ſacrifices and proceſſion they were wont to keepe on Ceres day: then by their ſmall number that were left, and ſorrow of thoſe that remained, to let their enemies vnderſtand their exceeding great loſſe. For the goddes delight to be ſerued with glad and reioyſing hearts, and with thoſe that are in proſperity. But all this notwithſtanding, whatſoeuer the prieſts would haue done, either to pacifie the wrath of the goddes, or to turne away the threatninges of theſe ſiniſter ſignes, it was forthwith done. For they did ſend to the oracle of Apollo, in the citie of DELPHES, one of Fabius kinſemen ſurnamed Pictor. And two of the Veſtall Nuns being defloured: the one was buried aliue according to the law and cuſtome, and the other made her ſelfe away. But herein the great courage and noble clemency of the ROMAINES, is maruellouſly to be noted and regarded. For the Conſull Terentius Varro returning backe to ROME, with the ſhame of his extreame misfortune and ouerthrow, that he durſt not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithſtanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the citie to meete him, and did honorably receiue him. Nay furthermore, thoſe that were the chiefe magiſtrates and Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when ſilence was made, they commended Varro much: becauſe he did not deſpaire of the preſeruation of the common weale after ſo great a calamitie, but did returne againe to the citie, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vſing the authoritie of the law, and the ſeruice of the citizens, as not being altogether vnder foote, but ſtanding yet in reaſonable termes of good recouerie. But when they vnderſtoode that Hanniball after the battell was gone into other partes of ITALIE: then they beganne to be of good cheere againe, and ſent a new army and generalles to the field, among which, the two chiefe generals were, Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in manner, wanne a like glorie and reputation. For Marcellus (as we haue declared in his life, was a man of ſpeedy execution, of a quicke hand, of a valiant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them, that valiauntly put them ſelues in any daunger: by reaſon whereof, hauing to deale with another captaine a like venturous and valiaunt as him ſelfe, in all ſeruice and execution, he ſhewed the ſelfe boldneſſe and courage that Hanniball did. But Fabius perſiſting ſtill vppon his firſt determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hanniball, nor ſtur him at all, yet continuall warres would conſume him and his army in the end, and bring them both to naught: as a common wreſtler that forceth his body aboue his naturall ſtrength, doth in the end become a lame and bruſed man. Hereupon Poſſidonius writeth, that the one was called the ROMAINES ſword, and the other their target. And that Fabius conſtancy and reſoluteneſſe in warres to fight with ſecurity, and to commit nothing to hazard and daunger, being mingled with Marcellus heate and fury: was that onely, which preſerued the ROMAINS empire. For Hanniball meeting alwaies in his way the one that was furious, as a ſtrong running ſtreame, found that his army was continually turmoyled and ouerharried and the other that was ſlow as a litle prety riuer, he found that his army ranne ſoftly vnder him without any noiſe, but yet continually by litle and litle it did ſtill conſume and diminiſh him, vntill he ſaw him ſelfe at the laſt brought to that paſſe, that he was weary with fighting with Marcellus, and affraide of Fabius becauſe he fought not. For during all the time of theſe warres, he had euer theſe two captaines almoſt againſt him, which were made either Prætors, Conſuls, or Proconſuls: for either of them both had bene fiue times before choſen Conſull. Yet as for Marcellus: Hanniball had laide and ambuſh for him in the fift and laſt yeare of his Conſulſhippe, where he ſet vppon him on a ſodaine, and ſlue him. But as for Fabius, he laide many baites for him, and did what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambuſhes, and other warlike policies to entrappe him: but he could neuer draw him within his daunger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a litle trouble, and was in good hope then to haue made him fall vppon his ambuſh he had laide for him: and by this policy. He had counterfeyted letters written and ſent vnto him from the city of METAPONT, to pray him to come to them, and they would deliuer their city into his handes: and withall, that ſuch as were priuy to the contents of the ſame, deſired no other thing but his repaire thither. Theſe letters pretily quickned Fabius, inſomuch as he was determined one night to haue taken part of his army, and to haue gone to them. But becauſe the ſignes of the birdes did promiſe him no good ſucceſſe, he left off his purpoſe. Soone after he vnderſtoode they were counterfaite letters, made by Hannibals fine deuiſe to haue drawn him out, and to haue entrapped him, for whom him ſelfe lay in perſon in ambuſh neare the citie, looking and waiting for his comming: but the goddes who would haue him ſaued, were onely to be thanked for his happy ſcape. Furthermore, concerning the reuolt of the cities that were ſubiect vnto them, and the riſing of their allies and friends againſt them: Fabius thought it far better to intreat them curteouſly, making them aſhamed without occaſion to rebell againſt them, rather then openly to ſuſpect them, and to deale ſtraightly with thoſe that were ſo to be ſuſpected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a ſouldier in his campe that was a MARSIAN borne by nation, a valiaunt man of his perſon, and alſo of as noble a houſe, as any that were of all the allies of the ROMAINES: who had practiſed with other his fellowes of the band he ſerued in, to go ſerue the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practiſe he went about, gaue him no ill countenaunce for it, but calling him to him, he ſaide. I muſt confeſſe there is no reckoning made of you, as your good ſeruice doth deſerue: wherefore for this time (ſaieth he) I blame the pety captaines onely, which in ſuch ſort doe beſtow their good will and fauour at aduenture, and not by deſert. But henceforth it ſhall be your owne fault if you doe not declare your mind vnto me, and betweene you and me make me priuy of your lacke and neceſſity. When he had ſpoken theſe wordes to him, he gaue him a very good horſe for ſeruice, and did reward him with other honorable giftes, as men of good ſeruice and deſert haue commonly beſtowed on them: and this did ſo encourage the ſouldier thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and ſeruiceable ſouldier to the ROMAINES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horſes, and ſuch like as take vppon them to tame brute beaſts, ſhould ſooner make them leaue their ſauage and churliſh nature by gentle vſage and manning of them: then by beating, and ſhackling of them. And ſo a gouernour of men, ſhould rather correct his ſouldier by patience, gentlenes, and clemency: then by rigour, violence, or ſeuerity. Otherwiſe he ſhould handle them more rudely, and ſharpely, then husbandmen doe figge trees, oliue trees, & wilde pomegarnets: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, doe alter their hard and wilde nature, and cauſe them in the end to bring forth good figs, oliues and pomegarnets. Another time certaine captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their ſouldiers which would euer goe out of the campe, and leaue his enſigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was. They aunſwered him all together, that he was a very good ſouldier, and that they could hardly finde out ſuch another, in all their bandes as he: and therewithall they told him of ſome notable ſeruice they had ſeene him doe in perſon. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquiry to know what the cauſe was that made him goe ſo ofte out of the campe: in the end, he found he was in loue with a young woman, and that to goe ſee her was the cauſe he did ſo oft leaue his enſigne, and did put his life in ſo great daunger, for that ſhe was ſo farre off. When Fabius vnderſtood this, he ſent certaine ſouldiers (vnknowing to the ſouldier) to bring the woman away he loued, and willed them to hide her in his tent, and then called hee the ſouldier to him, that was a LVCANIAN borne, and taking him a ſide, ſayd vnto him thus. My friend, it hath bene told me, how thou haſt lyen many nightes out of the campe, againſt the law of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therewithall I vnderſtand alſo that otherwiſe thou art an honeſt man, and therefore I pardon thy faultes paſt, in conſideration of thy good ſeruice: but from henceforth I will giue thee in cuſtody to ſuch a one, as ſhall make me accompt of thee. The ſouldier was blancke when he heard theſe wordes. Fabius with that, cauſed the woman he was in loue with to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, ſaying vnto him. This woman hereafter ſhall aunſwer me thy body to be forth comming in the campe amongeſt vs: and from henceforth thy deedes ſhall witneſſe for the reſt, that thy loue vnto this woman, may be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practiſe or intent. Thus much we finde written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after ſuch a ſort, recouered againe the city of TARENTVM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had loſt by treaſon. It fortuned there was a young man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a ſiſter within TARENTVM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruellous dearely: now there was a captaine, a BRVTIAN borne, that fell in loue with her, and was one of thoſe to whom Hanniball had committed the charge of the city of TARENTVM. This gaue the young ſouldier the TARENTINE, very good hope, and way, to bring his enterpriſe to good effect: whereupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his priuity fled from his campe, and got into the city of TARENTVM, giuing it out in the city, that he would altogether dwell with his ſiſter. Now for a few dayes at his firſt comming, the BRVTIAN captaine lay alone by him ſelfe, at the requeſt of the maide his ſiſter, who thought her brother had not knowen of her loue: and ſhortly after the young fellowe tooke his ſiſter a ſide, and ſaide vnto her. My good ſiſter, there was a great ſpeach in the ROMAINES campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefeſt captaines of the garriſon: I pray thee if it be ſo, let me know what he is. For ſo he be a good fellow, and an honeſt man (as they ſay he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all thinges topſi turuey, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of, and ſtill maketh vertue of neceſſity, without reſpect of ſhame. And it is a ſpeciall good fortune, at ſuch time as neither right nor reaſon rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His ſiſter hearing him ſpeake theſe wordes, ſent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeuoured himſelfe to frame his ſiſters loue in better ſort towards him, then it was before: by reaſon whereof, the captaine alſo beganne to truſt him very much. So this young TARENTINE ſaw it was very eaſie to winne and turne the minde of this amarous and mercenary man, with hope of great gifts that were promiſed him, and Fabius ſhould performe. Thus doe the moſt part of writers ſet downe this ſtorie. Howbeit ſome writers ſay, that this woman who wan the BRVTIAN captaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRVTIAN borne, whom Fabius it is ſayd, kept afterwards for his concubine: and that ſhee vnderſtanding the captaine of the BRVTIANS (who laie in garriſon within the city of TARENTVM) was alſo a BRVTIAN borne, and of her owne natiue countrey, made Fabius priuy to her intent, and with his conſent, ſhe comming to the wals of the city, ſpake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom ſhe handled in ſuch ſort, that ſhee wanne him. But whileſt this geare was a brewing, Fabius, becauſe he would traine Hanniball out of thoſe quarters, wrote vnto the ſouldiers of RHEGIO: which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they ſhould enter the borders of the BRVTIANS, and lay ſiege to the city of CAVLONIA, and raſe it to the ground. Theſe RHEGIAN ſouldiers were about the number of eight thouſand, and the moſt of them traytours, and runneagates, from one campe to another: and the worſt ſort of them, and moſt defamed of life, were thoſe that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, ſo that in loſing them all, the loſſe were nothing to the common weale, and the ſorrow much leſſe. So Fabius thought, that putting theſe fellowes out for a pray to Hanniball (as a ſtale to draw him from thoſe quarters) he ſhould plucke him by this meanes from TARENTVM: and ſo it came to paſſe. For Hanniball incontinently went thence with his army to intrappe them: and in the meane time Fabius went to lay ſiege to TARENTVM, where he had not lien ſixe daies before it, but the young man (who together with his ſiſter had drawen the BRVTIAN captaine to this treaſon) ſtale out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, hauing taken very good markes of that ſide of the wall the BRVTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promiſed him to keepe it ſecret, and to ſuffer them to enter, that came to aſſault that ſide. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether vpon the BRVTIANS executing this treaſon, but went himſelfe in perſon to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: and in the meane ſeaſon, he gaue a generall aſſault to all partes of the city (as well by ſea as by land) with great ſhoutes and cries. Then the BRVTIAN captaine ſeeing all the citizens and garriſon run to that part, where they perceiued the noiſe to be greateſt: made a ſignall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then cauſed ſcaling ladders to be brought a pace, whereupon himſelfe with his company ſcaled the walles, and ſo wanne the city. But it appeareth here, that ambition ouercame him. For firſt he commaunded they ſhould kill all the BRVTIANS, becauſe it ſhould not be knowen he had wonne the city by treaſon. But this bloudy policy failed him: for he miſſed not only of the glory he looked for, but moſt deſeruedly he had the reproche of cruelty and falſehood. At the taking of this city, a maruellous number of the TARENTINES were ſlaine, beſides there were ſold thirty thouſand of the chiefeſt of them, and al the city was ſacked: and of the ſpoile thereof was caried to the common ſtore treaſure at ROME, three thouſand talents. It is reported alſo, that when they did ſpoile and carie away all other ſpoiles left behinde, the recorder of the city asked Fabius, what his pleaſure was to doe with the goddes, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius aunſwered him. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their goddes that be angry with them. This notwithſtanding, he caried from thence Hercules ſtatue, that was of a monſtrous bigneſſe, and cauſed it to be ſet vp in the Capitoll, and withall did ſet vp his owne image in braſſe a horſebacke by him. But in that act he ſhewed him ſelfe farre harder hearted, then Marcellus had done, or to ſay more truely, thereby he made the world know how much Marcellus curteſie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at: as we haue written in his life. Newes being brought to Hanniball, that TARENTVM was beſieged, he marched preſently with all ſpeede poſſible to raiſe the ſiege: and they ſay he had almoſt come in time, for he was within 40. furlongs of the city when he vnderſtoode the troth of the taking of it. Then ſayd he out aloud, ſure the ROMAINES haue their Hanniball to: for as we wanne TARENTVM, ſo haue we loſt it. But after that, to his friends he ſaid priuately (and that was the firſt time they euer heard him ſpeake it) that he ſaw long before, and now appeared plainely, that they could not poſſibly with this ſmall power keepe ITALY. Fabius made his triumphe and entry into ROME the ſecond time, by reaſon of taking this city: and his ſecond triumph was much more honorable then the firſt, as of a valiant captaine that held out ſtill with Hanniball, and eaſely met with all his fine policies, much like the ſlight tricks of a cunning wreſtler, which caried not now the former toughnes & ſtrength any more, becauſe that his army was giuen to take their eaſe, and growen too delicaſie, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly alſo for that it was ſore waſted and diminiſhed, through the ſundry foughten battelles and blowes they had beene at. Now there was one

Marcus Liuius a ROMAINE, that was gouernour of TARENTVM at that time, when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheleſſe kept the caſtell ſtill out of Hannibals hands, and ſo held it vntill the citie came againe into the hands of the ROMAINES. This Liuius ſpighted to ſee ſuch honour done to Fabius, ſo that one day in open Senate, being drowned with enuie and ambition, he burſt out and ſaid: that it was himſelfe, not Fabius, that was cauſe of taking of the citie of TARENTVM againe. Fabius ſmiling to heare him, anſwered him openly: indeed thou ſaieſt true, for if thou hadſt not loſt it, I had neuer wonne it againe. But the ROMAINES in all other reſpects did greatly honour Fabius, and ſpecially for that they choſe his ſonne Conſul. He hauing alreadie taken poſſeſſion of his office, as he was diſpatching certaine cauſes touching the warres, his father (whether it was for debilitie of his age, or to prooue his ſonne) tooke his horſe to come to him, and rode through the preaſe of the people that thronged about him, hauing buſineſſe with him. But his ſonne ſeeing him comming a farre off, would not ſuffer it, but ſent an officer of his vnto him, to commaund him to light off his horſe, and to come a foote if he had any thing to do with the Conſull. This commaundement miſliked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but ſaid not a word: thinking with themſelues, that the Conſull did great wrong to his fathers greatneſſe. So he lighted ſtraight, and went a good round pace to embrace his ſonne, and ſaid vnto him. You haue reaſon ſonne, and do well to ſhewe ouer whom you commaund, vnderſtanding the authoritie of a Conſull, which place you haue receiued. For it is the direct courſe, by the which we and our anceſters haue increaſed the ROMAINE empire: preferring euer the honour and ſtate of our countrie, aboue father, mother, or children. And truly they ſay, that Fabius great grandfather being the greateſt and moſt noble perſon of ROME in his time, hauing fiue times bene Conſull, and had obtained manie triumphes, for diuerſe honourable and ſundrie victories he had wonne: was contented after all theſe, to be his ſonnes lieutenant, and to go to the warres with him, he being choſen Conſull. And laſt of all, the Conſull his ſonne returning home to ROME a conqueror, in his triumphing charriot drawne with foure horſes, he followed him a horſe backe alſo, in troope with the reſt: thinking it honour to him, that hauing authoritie ouer his ſonne in the right of a father, and being alſo the nobleſt man of all the citizens, ſo taken and reputed, neuertheleſſe he willingly ſubmitted himſelfe to the lawe and magiſtrate, who had authoritie of him. Yet beſides all this, he had farre more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then thoſe already ſpoken of. But it fortuned that this ſonne of Fabius died before him, whoſe death he tooke paciently, like a wiſe man, and a good father. Now the cuſtome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neereſt kinſeman ſhould make a funerall oration in their praiſe at their obſequies: he himſelfe made the ſame oration in honour of his ſonne, and did openly ſpeake it in the market place, and moreouer wrote it, and deliuered it out abroad.

About this time, Cornelius Scipio was ſent into SPAINE, who draue out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had ouerthrowne them in many battels, and had conquered many great cities, and greatly aduanced the honour and eſtimation of the ſtate of ROME: for the which at his returne, he was aſmuch, or rather more honoured, beloued and eſteemed, then any other that was in the citie of ROME. Hereupon Scipio being made Conſull, conſidered that the people of ROME looked for ſome great matter at his hands, aboue all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight againſt Hanniball in ITALIE, he ſhould but follow the olde manner, and treade too much in the ſteps of the olde man: whereupon he reſolued immediatly to make warres in AFRICKE, and to burne and deſtroy the countrie euen vnto CARTHAGE gates, and ſo to transfer the warres out of ITALIE into LIBYA, procuring by all poſſible deuiſe he could, to put it into the peoples heads, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarilie, perſwading himſelfe that the enterpriſe this young raſhe youth tooke in hand, was vtterly to ouerthrowe the commonweale, or to put the ſtate of ROME in great danger: deuiſed to put ROME in the greateſt feare he could poſſible, without ſparing ſpeech or deede he thought might ſerue for his purpoſe, to make the people change from that minde. Now he could ſo cunningly worke his purpoſe, what with ſpeaking and doing, that he had drawne all the Senate to his opinion. But the people iudged, it was the ſecret enuie he bare to Scipioes glorie, that drue him to encounter this deuiſe, onely to bleamiſh Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, leaſt if he ſhould happen to do ſome honourable ſeruice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwiſe to drawe Hanniball out of ITALIE) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bene too ſoft, or too negligent, to draw this warre out to ſuch a length. For my part, me thinkes the onely matter that mooued Fabius from the beginning to be againſt Scipio, was the great care he had of the ſafetie of the commonweale, by reaſon of the great danger depending vpon ſuch a reſolution. And yet I do thinke alſo, that afterwards he went further then he ſhould, contending too ſore againſt him (whether it was through ambition or obſtinacie) ſeeking to hinder and ſuppreſſe the greatneſſe of Scipio: conſidering alſo he did his beſt to perſwade Craſſus, Scipioes companion in the Conſulſhip, that he ſhould not graunt vnto him the leading of the armie, but if he thought good to go into AFRICKE, to make warres vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he ſhould rather go himſelfe. And moreouer, he was the let that they gaue him no money for maintenance of theſe warres. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furniſh himſelfe as he could: he leauied great ſummes of money in the cities of THVSCAN, who for the great loue they bare him, made contribution towards his iourney. And Craſſus remained at home, both becauſe he was a ſoft and no ambitious, nor contentious man of nature: as alſo, becauſe he was the chiefeſt Prelate and high biſhop, who by the lawe of their religion, was conſtrained to keepe ROME. Fabius ſeeing his labour loſt that way, tooke againe another courſe to croſſe Scipio, deuiſing to ſtay the young men at home, that had great deſire to go this iourney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all aſſemblies of the Senate and people, that Scipio was not contented onely to flie Hanniball, but that he would carie with him beſides the whole force of ITALIE that remained: alluring the youth with ſweete baites of vaine hope, and perſwading them to leaue their wiues, their fathers, mothers, and their countrey, euen now when their enemie knocked at ROME gates, who did euer conquer, and was yet neuer conquered. Theſe words of Fabius did ſo dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio ſhould furniſh his iourney onely with the armie that was in SICILIA, ſauing that he might ſupply to them if he would, three hundred of the beſt ſouldiers that had ſerued him faithfully in SPAINE. And ſo it doth appeare euen to this preſent, that Fabius both did and ſaid all things, according to his wonted manner, and naturall diſpoſition. Now Scipio was no ſooner arriued in AFRICKE, but newes were brought to ROME incontinently, of wonderfull exploits, and noble ſeruice done beyond meaſure: and of great ſpoiles taken by him, which argued the trothe of the newes. As, the king of the NVMIDIANS taken priſoner, two campes of the enemies burnt and deſtroyed at a time, with loſſe of a great number of people, armour, and horſes, that were conſumed in the ſame: letters and poſtes for life running in the neck one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hanniball home, and to pray him to hunt no longer after vaine hope that would neuer haue end, haſting himſelfe with all ſpeede poſſible to come to the reſcue of his countrie. Theſe wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of ſuch renowme and fame within ROME, that there was no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithſtanding deſiſted not to make a new requeſt, being of opinion they ſhould ſend him a ſucceſſour, alledging no other cauſe nor reaſon, but a common ſpeeche of euery bodie: that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, ſo great exceeding proſperitie and good ſucceſſe, becauſe it is a rare matter to ſee one man happie in all things. Theſe words did ſo much miſlike the people, that they thought him an enuious troubleſome man, or elſe they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his courage failed with his ſtrength, fearing Hanniball more doubtfully then he needed. For nowe though Hanniball was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not graunt, that the peoples ioy and ſecuritie they thought they were in, was altogether cleare, and without feare and miſtruſt: but gaue it out that then they were in greateſt danger, and that the commonweale was breeding more miſchiefe now, then before. For when Hanniball (ſaid he) ſhall returne home into AFRICKE, and come before CARTHAGE walles, the ROMAINES ſhall be leſſe able to abide him there, then they haue bene before: and Scipio moreouer, ſhall meete with an armie yet warme, and embrued with the bloud of ſo many Prætors, Dictators, and Conſuls of ROME, which they haue ouercome, and put to the ſword in ITALIE. With theſe vncomfortable ſpeeches, he ſtill troubled and diſquieted the whole citie, perſwading them that notwithſtanding the warre was transferred out of ITALIE into AFRICK, yet that the occaſion of feare was no leſſe neere vnto ROME, then it was euer before. But within ſhort ſpace after, Scipio hauing ouercome Hanniball in plaine battell in the field, and troden vnder foote the glory and pride of CARTHAGE, he brought a greater ioy to ROME, then they euer looked for: and by this noble victorie of his, he ſhored vp againe the declining ſtate of the empire of ROME, which a litle before was falling downe right. Howbeit Fabius liued not to the end of this warre, nor euer heard while he liued the ioyfull newes of Hannibals happy ouerthrow, neither were his yeres prolonged to ſee the happy aſſured proſperitie of his countrie: for about that time that Hanniball departed out of ITALIE, a ſickneſſe tooke him, whereof he died. The ſtories declare, that the THEBANS buried Epaminondas, at the common charges of the people: becauſe he died in ſo great pouertie, that when he was dead, they found nothing in the houſe but a litle iron ſpit. Now the ROMAINES buried not Fabius ſo, at the common charge of the citie, but euery man of beneuolence gaue towards his funerall charges, a peece of coine that caried the leaſt value of their currant money: not for that he lacked abilitie to bring him to the ground, but onely to honour his memory: in making his obſequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. So had his vertuous life, an honourable end and buriall.

Pericles with Fabius.

HERE haue you heard what is written, of theſe two great perſons. And foraſmuch as they haue both left behinde them, many noble examples of vertue, aſwel in martiall matters, as in ciuil gouernment, let vs begin to compare them together. Firſt of all, Pericles began to gouerne the commonweale, at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefeſt proſperitie, and of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or ſince. The which might ſeeme to be a cauſe of the continuall maintenance of the ſame in ſecuritie without danger of falling, not ſo much for their worthineſſe, as for their common power and felicitie: where contrariwiſe Fabius acts fell out in the moſt diſhonorable & vnfortunate time, that euer happened to his countrie, in the which he did not only keepe the citie in good ſtate from declining, but raiſed it vp, and deliuered it from calamitie, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and ſucceſſe, the victories and triumphes of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deedes of armes of Tolmides, gaue good cauſe to Pericles, to entertaine his citie in feaſts, and playes, whileſt he did gouerne the ſame: and he did not finde it in ſuch ill caſe and diſtreſſe, that he was driuen to defend it by force of armes, or to conquer that againe which he had loſt. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he ſaw before him many ouerthrowes, great flying away, much murther, great ſlaughters of the generals of the ROMAINE armies, the lakes, the plaines, the woods filled with ſcattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds and riuers running all a gore bloud (by reaſon of the great ſlaughter) and the ſtreame carying downe the dead bodies to the maine ſea: did take in hande the gouernment of his countrie, and a courſe farre contrarie to all other: ſo as he did vnderproppe and ſhore vp the ſame, that he kept it from flat falling to the ground, amongeſt thoſe ruines and ouerthrowes other had brought it too, before him. Yet a man may ſay alſo, that it is no great matter of difficultie to rule a citie already brought lowe by aduerſitie, and which compelled by neceſſitie, is contented to be gouerned by a wiſe man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the inſolencie of a people, puft vp with pride, and preſumption of long proſperitie, as Pericles found it amongſt the ATHENIANS. The great multitude alſo of ſo many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the ROMAINES neckes at that time, did plainely ſhew Fabius to be a graue and a conſtant man, which would neuer giue way vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could euer be remooued from that he had at the firſt determined. The winning and recouering againe of TARENTVM, may well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wan by force: and the cities of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EVBOEA: excepting the citie of CAPVA, which the Conſuls Fuluius and Appius recouered againe. But it ſeemeth that Fabius neuer wanne battell, ſaue that onely for which he triumphed the firſt time: where Pericles ſet vp nine triumphes, of battels and victories he had wonne, aſwell by ſea as by land. And ſo alſo, they cannot alledge ſuch an acte done by Pericles, as Fabius did, when he reſcued Minutius out of the hands of Hanniball, and ſaued a whole armie of the ROMAINES: which doubtleſſe was a famous acte, and proceeded of a noble minde, great wiſdome, and an honourable heart. But Pericles, againe did neuer commit ſo groſſe an errour as Fabius did when he was outreached, and deceiued by Hannibals fine ſtratagem of his oxen: who hauing found his enemie by chance to haue ſhut himſelfe vp in the ſtraight of a vallie, did ſuffer him to eſcape in the night by a ſubtiltie, and in the day by plaine force. For he was preuented by ouermuch delaye, and fought withall by him he kept incloſed. Now if it be requiſite, a good captaine do not onely vſe well that he hath in his hands, but that he wiſely iudge alſo what will follow after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in ſuch ſort, as Pericles ſaied they would come to paſſe: for with ambition to imbrace too much, they ouerthrew their eſtate. But the ROMAINS contrariwiſe, hauing ſent Scipio into AFRICKE to make wars with the CARTHAGINIANS, wanne all that they tooke in hand: where their generall did not ouercome the enemy by fortune, but by valiantneſſe. So that the wiſedom of the one is witneſſed, by the ruine of his countrie: and the errour of the other teſtified, by the happy euent of that he would haue let. Now the fault is a like in a general, to fall into danger, for lack of forecaſt: as for cowardlineſſe to let ſlip a fit opportunitie offred, to do any notable peece of ſeruice. For like default and lack of experience, maketh the one too hardie, and the other too fearfull. And thus much touching the warres. Now for ciuill gouernement: it was a foule blot to Pericles, to be the author of warres. For it is thought, that he alone was the cauſe of the ſame, for that he would not haue them yeeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any reſpect. And yet me thinkes Fabius Maximus alſo would no more giue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but ſtood firme and bold in all danger, to maintaine the empire of his countrie againſt them. But the goodneſſe and clemencie Fabius ſhewed vnto Minutius, doth much condemne Pericles accuſations and practiſes, againſt Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being noble and good men, and taking part with the Nobilitie, whom he expulſed out of ATHENS, and baniſhed for a time. So was Pericles power & authoritie in the commonweale greater: by reaſon whereof he did euer foreſee, that no general in all his time did raſhly attempt any thing hurtful vnto the commonweale, except Tolmides only: who fled from him, & in deſpight of him went to fight with the BOEOTIANS where he was ſlaine. As for all other generals, they wholly put themſelues into his hands, and did obey him for the greatneſſe of his authoritie. But Fabius, although for his part he neuer committed any fault, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernement: yet becauſe he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it ſeemeth in this reſpect he was defectiue. For if Fabius had caried like authoritie in ROME, as Pericles did in ATHENS: the ROMAINES had not fallen into ſo great miſerie as they did. And for liberalitie: the one ſhewed it, in refuſing the money offred him: and the other, in giuing vnto thoſe that needed, and redeeming his poore captiue country men. And yet Fabius might diſpend no great reuenue. for his whole receiptes came only to ſixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to ſay how rich he was, who had comming in to him, great preſents by his authoritie, aſwell of the ſubiects, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as alſo of Kings and ſtraunge Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any perſon liuing. And to conclude, as for the ſumptuous building of temples, the ſtately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in ROME, before the times of the Cæſars, they are not to be compared with thoſe, wherewith Pericles did beautifie and adorne the citie of ATHENS. For neither in qualitie nor quantitie was there any proportion or like compariſon, betweene the exceeding ſumptuouſnes of the one, and of the other.

THE LIFE OF Alcibiades.

ALCIBIADES by his fathers ſide, was anciently deſcended of Euryſaces, that was the ſonne of Aiax, and by his mother ſide of Alcmæon: for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias hauing armed, and ſet forth a gallie, at his owne proper coſtes and charges, did winne great honour in the battell by ſea, that was fought alongeſt the coaſt of ARTEMISIVM, and he was ſlaine afterwardes in another battell fought at CORONEA, againſt the BOEOTIANS. His ſonne Alcibiades tutors, were Pericles, and Ariphron Xanthippus ſonnes: who were alſo his neere kinſmen. They ſay, and truely: that Socrates good will and friendſhippe did greatly further Alcibiades honour. For it appeareth not, neither was it euer written, what were the names of the mothers of Nicias, of Demoſthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thraſibulus, and of Theramenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrarie, we find the nource of Alcibiades, that ſhe was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that his ſchoolemaſter was called Zopyrus: of the which, Antiſthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beautie, it made no matter if we ſpeake not of it, yet I will a litle touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull faire, being a child, a boy, and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruellous amiable, and beloued of euery man. For where Euripides ſaith, that of all the faire times of the yere, the Autumne or latter ſeaſon is the faireſt: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proued true in Alcibiades, though in few other: for he was paſſing faire euen to his latter time, and of good temperature of bodie. They write of him alſo, that his tongue was ſomewhat fat, and it did not become him ill, but gaue a certaine naturall pleaſant grace in his talke: which Ariſtophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that did counterfaite a liſping grace with his tongue.

 The equiuocation of theſe two Greeke wordes* Κορα and Κολα, is hard to be expreſſed in Engliſh, in ſtead whereof I haue ſet flatling blowes, for flattering browes, obſeruing the grace of liſping as neere as I could, like to the Latin and French tranſlations, likewiſe Theolus for Theorus.

This Alcibiades, with his fat liſping tongue, into mine eares, this truſtie tale, and ſong full often ſung.
Looke vpon Theolus (quoth he) lo there he bowes, behold his comely crow-bright face with fat and flatling blowes.*
The ſonne of Clinias, would liſpe it thus ſomewhiles, and ſure he liſped neuer a lie, but rightly hit his wiles.

And Archippus another poet alſo, mocking the ſonne of Alcibiades, ſaith thus:

Becauſe he would be like his father euery way
in his long trayling gowne he would goe ietting day by day.
And counterfaite his ſpeech, his countenance and face:
as though dame nature had him giuen, therein a perfect grace.
To liſpe and looke aſide, and hold his head awry, euen as his father lookt and liſpt, ſo would he prate and pry.

A vile thing to play of a flute.

For his manners they altered and chaunged very oft with time, which is not to be wondred at, ſeeing his maruellous great proſperity, as alſo aduerſitie that folowed him afterwards. But of all the great deſires he had, and that by nature he was moſt inclined to, was ambition, ſeeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the beſt perſon: as appeareth by certaine of his deedes, and notable ſayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wreſtling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to haue giuen him the fall: he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit ſo hard, as he would haue eaten it off. The other feeling him bite ſo hard, let goe his holde ſtraight, and ſaid vnto him: what Alcibiades, biteſt thou like a woman? No marie doe I not (q; he) but like a lyon. Another time being but a litle boy, he plaide at skayles in the middeſt of the ſtreete with other of his companions, and when his turne came about to throw, there came a cart laden by chaunce that way: Alcibiades praied the carter to ſtaie a while, vntill he had plaied out his game, becauſe the skailes were ſet right in the high way where the cart ſhould paſſe ouer. The carter was a ſtubborne knaue, and would not ſtaie for any requeſt the boy could make, but draue his horſe on ſtill, in ſo much as other boyes gaue backe to let him goe on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durſt. The carter being afeard, plucked backe his horſe to ſtaie them: the neighbours flighted to ſee the daunger, ranne to the boy in all haſte crying out. Afterwards when he was put to ſchoole to learne, he was very obedient to all his maſters that taught him any thing, ſauing that he diſdained to learne to plaie of the flute or recorder: ſaying, that it was no gentlemanly qualitie. For, ſaide he, to play on the violl with a ſticke, doth not alter mans fauour, nor diſgraceth any gentleman: but otherwiſe, to play on the flute, his countenance altereth and chaungeth ſo oft, that his familiar friends can ſcant know him. Moreouer, the harpe or violl doth not let him that plaieth on them, from ſpeaking, or ſinging as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth ſo hard to it, that it taketh not onely his wordes from him, but his voice. Therefore, ſaid he, let the children of the THEBANS play on the flute, that cannot tell how to ſpeake: as for the ATHENIANS, we haue (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectors and patrones of our countrie, the goddeſſe Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in olde time (as it is ſaide) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that plaied vpon a flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging theſe reaſons, partly in ſport, and partly in good earneſt: did not onely himſelfe leaue to learne to play on the flute, but he turned his companions mindes alſo quite from it. For theſe wordes of Alcibiades, ranne from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reaſon to deſpiſe playing on the flute, and that hee mocked all thoſe that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the flute, was put out of the number of honeſt and liberall exerciſes, and the flute it ſelfe was thought a vile inſtrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accuſations Antiphon wrote againſt Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boy, he fled out of his tutors houſe, into the houſe of Democrates one of his louers, and how Ariphron one of his tutors thought to haue made a beadle crie him through the citie. But P*ericles* would not ſuffer him, ſaying: that if he were dead, they ſhould know it but one day ſooner by crying of him: and if he were aliue, that it would be ſuch a ſhame to him while he liued, that he had bene better he had neuer bene heard of againe. The ſame Antiphon accuſeth him further, that he had killed a ſeruant of his that attended on him, in the wreſtling place of Sibyrtius, with a blow of a ſtaffe. But there is no reaſon to credite his writing, who confeſſeth he ſpeaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did beare him. Now ſtraight there were many great and rich men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates loue vnto him had another ende and cauſe, which witneſſed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceiuing that vertue did appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beautie of his face and bodie, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignitie and authoritie, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chiefeſt of the citie, as of ſtraungers, ſeeking to entiſe him by flatterie, and by many other pleaſures: hee tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to ſuffer ſo goodly an ympe to looſe the hope of the good frute of his youth. For fortune doth neuer ſo intangle nor ſnare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let and hinder him ſo, that philoſophy ſhould not take holde on him with her free, ſeuere, and quicke reaſons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, aſſaied with all delightes, and ſhut vp as it were in their companie that feaſted him with all pleaſures, only to turne him that he ſhould not hearken to Socrates wordes, who ſought to bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithſtanding, hauing a good naturall wit, knewe what Socrates was, and went to him, refuſing the companie of all his rich friendes and their flatteries, and fell in a kinde of familiar friendſhippe with Socrates. Whom when he had heard ſpeake, he noted his wordes very well, that they were no perſwaſions of a man ſeeking his diſhoneſty, but one that gaue him good counſell, and went about to reforme his faultes and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and preſumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe ſaith,

Socrates loue to Alcibiades.

Like to the crauen cocke, he drooped downe his winges, which cowardly doth runne away, or from the pit out flinges.

And did thinke with himſelf, that all Socrates loue & following of yong men, was indeede a thing ſent from the goddes, & ordeined aboue for them, whom they would haue preſerued, and put into the path way of honour. Therefore he beganne to deſpiſe himſelfe, and greatly to reuerence Socrates, taking pleaſure of his good vſing of him, and much imbraced his vertue: ſo as he had (he wiſt not how) an image of loue grauen in his heart, or rather (as P*lato* ſaieth) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy & honeſt affection towards Socrates. Inſomuch as all the world wondred at Alcibiades, to ſee him commonly at Socrates board, to play, to wreſtle, and to lodge in the warres with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other well willers, who could not ſo much as haue a good looke at his handes, and beſides became daungerous to ſome, as it is ſaide he was vnto Anytus, the ſonne of Anthemion, being one of thoſe that loued him well. Anytus making good cheere to certaine ſtraungers his friendes that were come to ſee him, went and praied Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refuſed to goe. For he went to make merie with certaine of his companions at his own houſe, & after he had well taken in his cuppes, he went to Anytus houſe to counterfeate the foole amongeſt them, and ſtaying at the hall doore, and ſeeing Anytus table and cubberd full of plate of ſiluer and golde, he commaunded his ſeruants to take away halfe of it, and carie it home to his houſe. But when he had thus taken his pleaſure, he would come no neerer into the houſe, but went his way home. Anytus friendes and gueſtes miſliking this ſtraunge part of Alcibiades, ſaide it was ſhamefully and boldly done ſo to abuſe Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, ſaide Anytus: for he hath left vs ſome, where he might haue taken all. All other alſo that made much of him, he ſerued after that ſort. Sauing a ſtraunger that came to dwell in ATHENS: who being but a poore man as the voyce went, ſold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred ſtateres which he brought vnto Alcibiades, and praied him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades beganne to be merie, and being very glad to vnderſtand his good will towards him, tooke his honeſt offer, and praied him to come to ſupper to him: ſo he welcomed him very hartily, and made him good cheere. When ſupper was done, he gaue him his money againe, and commaunded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and landes of the citie are wont to be let out to thoſe that bid moſt, and charged him he ſhould out bid all. The poore man would faine haue excuſed himſelfe, ſaying, the farmes were too great for him to hire: but Alcibiades threatned to whippe him, if he would not doe it. For beſides the deſire he had to pleaſure him, he bare a priuate grudge againſt the ordinarie farmers of the citie. The next morning the ſtraunger was readie in the market place, where they did cry out the letting of their farmes, and he raiſed one to a talent more, then all other did offer. The other farmers were as mad with him as they could be, that they all did ſet vpon him, crying out: let him put in ſuertie ſtraight, ſuppoſing he could haue found none. The ſtraunger was maruellous blanke thereat, and beganne to ſhrinke backe. Then cried Alcibiades out aloud to the officers that ſate there to take the beſt offers: I will be his ſuertie, ſaieth he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him ſay ſo, were at their wittes ende, and wiſte not what to doe. For they being alwaies accuſtomed to pay their yerely rent as it went before, by the helpe of the reſt of the yeres that followed after: perceiuing nowe that they ſhould not be able to pay the arrerages of the rentes due to the common weale, and ſeeing no other remedie, they praied him to take a peece of money, and to leaue the bargaine. Then Alcibiades would in no wiſe he ſhould take leſſe then a talent, which they gaue him willingly. So Alcibiades ſuffered the ſtraunger then to depart, and made him gaine by his deuiſe. Now Socrates loue which he bare him, though it had many mightie and great aduerſaries, yet it did ſtaie much Alcibiades, ſometime by his gentle nature, ſometime by his graue counſell and aduiſe: ſo as the reaſon thereof tooke ſo deepe roote in him, and did ſo peirce his heart, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time alſo being caried away with the intiſement of flatterers, that helde vp his humour with all pleaſure and delightes, he ſtole away from Socrates, and made him runne after him to fetch him againe, as if he had bene a ſlaue that had runne away from his maſters houſe: for Alcibiades ſtoode in awe of no man but of Socrates only, and in deede he did reuerence him, and did deſpiſe all other. And therefore Cleanthes was wont to ſay, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gaue his other louers holde, which Socrates neuer ſought for: for to ſay truely, Alcibiades was much giuen ouer to luſt and pleaſure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydides ment of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of bodie, and diſſolute of life. Thoſe that marred Alcibiades quite, did ſtill pricke forward his ambition and deſire of honour, and did put him in the head to thruſt himſelfe into great matters betimes, making him beleeue that if he did but once beginne to ſhewe himſelfe to deale in matters of ſtate, he would not onely blemiſh and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell P*ericles*, in authoritie and power among the GRECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made ſoft, to be wrought in any forme, and by colde alſo doth ſhut and harden in againe: euen ſo Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanitie and opinion of himſelfe, as oft as Socrates tooke him in hande, was made faſt and firme againe by his good perſwaſions, inſomuch that when he ſaw his owne fault and follie, and how farre wide he had ſtraied from vertue, he became ſodainely very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growen to mans ſtate, he went into a grammer ſchoole, and asked the ſcholemaiſter for one of Homers bookes. The ſchoolemaiſter aunſwered him, he had none of them: Alcibiades vp with his fiſte and gaue him a good boxe on the eare, and went his way. Another grammarian told him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, why what meaneſt thou, to ſtand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach young men, not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, deſirous to ſpeake with him: aunſwere was made him, he was not at leyſure now, for that he was buſily occupied by himſelf, thinking on his reckonnings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, ſaid he, going his way: it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no accompt at all. Moreouer, being but a young boie, he was at the iourney of POTIDÆA, where he laie ſtill with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battels and skirmiſhes he was in: among which there was one, very whot and bloudy, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurt. But Socrates ſtepped before him, and did defend him ſo valiantly before them all, that he ſaued him and his weapon out of the enemies handes. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equitie and reaſon, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades ſide, becauſe he was of a noble houſe. But Socrates, becauſe he would increaſe his deſire of honor, & would pricke him forward to honeſt and commendable things, was the very firſt that witneſſed Alcibiades had deſerued it: and therefore praide the captaines to iudge him the crowne and complet armour. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receiued the ouerthrow, Socrates retired with a few other a foote. Alcibiades being on horſe backe, and ouertaking him, would not goe from him, but kept him company, and defended him againſt a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and ſlue many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gaue a boxe of the eare vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greateſt men of power in the city, being a noble man borne, and of great poſſeſſions, which was done vpon a brauerie and certaine luſtines, as hauing laid a wager with his companions he would doe it, and for no malice or quarrell that hee bare the man. This light part was ſtraight ouer all the citie, and euerie one that heard it, ſaide it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his houſe, and knocking at his gate was let in: ſo he ſtripping him ſelfe before him, deliuered him his body to be whipped, and puniſhed at his pleaſure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, & gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwardes in mariage. Howbeit ſome ſay, it was not Hipponicus that gaue her to him: but Callias ſonne, with ten talents of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of the firſt childe hee had by her, he asked ten talents more, ſaying: they were promiſed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing leaſt this was an occaſion ſought of him to lye in waite to kill him for his goods: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire general, if he died without heires ſpeciall of his body. This gentlewoman Hipparete being an honeſt true wife to Alcibiades, miſliking her husband did ſo much miſuſe her, as to entertain cõmon light ſtrũpets, aſwell citizens as ſtrangers: ſhe went abroad one day to her brothers houſe, and tolde him of it. Alcibiades paſſed not for it, and made no further reckonning of the matter: but only bad his wife, if ſhe would, preſent her cauſe of diuorce before the iudge. So ſhee went thither her ſelfe, to ſue the diuorce betweene them, according to the law: but Alcibiades being there alſo, tooke her by the hand, and caried her through the market place home to his houſe, and no man durſt meddle betweene them, to take her from him. And ſo ſhee continued with him all the daies of her life, which was not long after: for ſhe died, when Alcibiades was in his iourney he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vſed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuill, becauſe it ſeemeth that the law was grounded vpon this cauſe: that the wife, which would be diuorced from her husband, ſhould goe her ſelfe openly before the iudge to put vp her complaint, to the end, that by this meanes, the husband might come to ſpeake with his wife, and ſeeke to ſtay her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruellous faire great dogge, that coſt him three ſcore and tenne minas, and he cut off his taile that was his chiefe beautie. When his friends reproued him, and told him how euerie man blamed him for it: he fell a laughing, and told them he had that he ſought. For, ſaith he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they ſhould ſay worſe of me. Moreouer, it is ſaide, the firſt time that Alcibiades ſpake openly in the common weale, and beganne to deale in matters, was vpon a gift of money he gaue vnto the people, & not of any pretence or former purpoſe he had to do it. One day as he came through the market place, hearing the people very loud, he asked what the matter was: they told him it was about money certain men had giuen to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them money out of his owne purſe. The people were ſo glad at that, as they fell to ſhouting and clapping of their hands, in token of thankfullnes: and him ſelfe was ſo glad for company, that hee forgat a quaile he had vnder his gowne, which was ſo afeard of the noiſe, that ſhe tooke her flight away. The people ſeeing the quaile, made a greater noiſe then before, and many roſe out of their places to runne after her: ſo that in the end, it was taken vp by a maſter of a ſhip called Antiochus, who brought him the quaile again, & for that cauſe Alcibiades did loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobility of his houſe, his goods, his worthines, and the great number of his kinſmen and friends made his way open to take vpon him gouernment in the common weale. Yet the onely way he deſired to winne the fauour of the common people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To prooue he was eloquent, all the Comicall poets do teſtifie it: and beſides them, Demoſthenes the prince of orators alſo doth ſay, in an oration he made againſt Midias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was moſt eloquent. And if we may beleeue Theophraſtus, the greateſt ſearcher of antiquities, & beſt hiſtoriographer aboue any other philoſopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a wit to deuiſe & conſider what he would ſay, as any man that was in his time Howbeit ſometimes ſtudying what he ſhould ſay, as alſo to deliuer good wordes, not hauing them very readily at his tongues end: he many times tooke breath by the way, and pauſed in the middeſt of his tale, not ſpeaking a word, vntill he had called it to mind, that he would ſay His charge was great, and much ſpoken of alſo, for keeping of running horſes at games: not onely becauſe they were the beſt and ſwifteſt, but for the number of coches hee had beſides. For neuer priuat perſon, no nor any prince, that euer ſent ſeuen ſo well appointed coches, in all furniture vnto the games Olympicall, as he did: nor that at one courſe hath borne away the firſt, the ſecond, and the fourth priſe, as Thucydides ſaieth: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name that euer ſtriued for victory therein. For Euripides pronounced his praiſe, in a ſong he made of him, as followeth.

O ſonne of Clinias, I will reſound thy praiſe:
for thou art bold in martiall deedes, and ouercommeſt alwaies.
Thy victories therewith, doe farre exceede the reſt, that euer were in Greece ygot, therefore I compt them beſt.
For at th Olympike games, thou haſt with chariots wonne,

The Herauldes haue proclaimed thee victor by thy name:
aboue all thoſe which ranne with thee, in hope to get the game.

Alcibiades a breaker of promiſe.

Howbeit the good affection diuers cities did beare him, contending which ſhould gratifie him beſt, did much increaſe his fame and honour. For the EPHESIANS did ſet vp a tent for him, verie ſumptuouſly and richly furniſhed. Thoſe of the citie of CHIO, furniſhed him with prouander for his horſe, and gaue him muttons beſides, and other beaſtes to ſacrifice withall. They of LESBOS alſo ſent him in wine and other prouiſion for vittels, to helpe him to defray the great charges he was at in keeping open houſe, and feeding ſuch a number of mouths dailie. Yet the ſpite they did beare him, or rather his breach of promiſe which hee often made, with this magnificence and ſtate he ſhewed, gaue the people more cauſe to ſpeake of him then before. For they ſay there was one Diomedes at ATHENS, a friend of Alcibiades, and no ill man, who deſired once in his life to win a game at the playes Olympicall. This man being enformed that the ARGIVES had a coch excellently furniſhed, belonging to their common weale, and knowing that Alcibiades could do very much in the citie of ARGOS, becauſe he had many friends in the ſame: he came to intreate Alcibiades to buie this coche for him. Alcibiades thereupon bought it, but kept it to him ſelfe, not regarding Diomedes requeſt hee had made. Diomedes ſeeing that fell ſtarke mad for anger, and called the gods and men to witneſſes, that Alcibiades did him open wrong: and it ſeemeth, that there fell out ſute in law vpon the ſame. For Iſocrates wrote an oration, and drue a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a childe, touching a couple of horſes: yet in this plea, his aduerſarie was called Tiſias, and not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a young man, when he came to practiſe and pleade publikelie, he put all other Orators to ſilence, but only two that were euer againſt him: the one was Phæax the ſonne of Eraſiſtratus, and the other Nicias the ſonne of Niceratus. Of theſe two, Nicias was a man growen, and had won the name and reputation of a good captaine. And Phæax began alſo to come forward as he did, being of a good and honourable houſe: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence ſpecially. For, he could more properly talke and diſcourſe among his friends priuately, then he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Eupolis ſayeth:

VVords enow, but no eloquence.

Alcibiades aduerſaries in the commonwealth when he came to plead.

Phæax lacked eloquence.

There is a certaine oration extant in writing againſt Alcibiades and Phæax: where among other accuſations is brought in, how Alcibiades was ordinarily ſerued in his houſe, with gold and ſiluer plate that belonged to the common weale, and which were vſed to be born for ſtate and magnificence, in ſolemne proceſſions before them, and how he vſed them as boldly, as if they had bene his own. Now there was one Hyperbolus in ATHENS at that time, borne in the village of Perithoide: of whō Thucydides maketh mention, as of a naughty wicked mā, whoſe tongue was a fit inſtrument to deliuer matter to all the Comicall poets of that time, to powre out all their taunts and mocks againſt them. Howbeit he was ſo impudent a perſon, and cared ſo litle what men ſaid of him, that he paſſed not though hee were defamed, neither did anie thing grieue him, whatſoeuer they reported of him: which ſome do call boldnes, and corage, being no better indeede then plaine impudency, extreme madnes, & deſperate folly. He would neuer pleaſe any man: and if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magiſtrate, whom they would any way accuſe, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their inſtrument to vtter their ſpite. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being aſſembled, were ready to proceede to the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon by moſt voices. The manner and cuſtome of this kinde of baniſhment was for a time to baniſh out of their citie ſuch a one, as ſeemed to haue too great authority and credit in the city: and that was, rather to ſatisfie their enuy, then for to remedy their feare. And becauſe it was manifeſt it would fall out to one of them three to be baniſhed (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phæax) Alcibiades found means to ioine all their three factions in one, becomming friends one to another: and hauing conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus ſelfe to be baniſhed, who was the chiefe inſtrument to prepare the way of their baniſhment. Howbeit other ſay, he ſpake not with Nicias about it, but with Phæax, and ioyning his part with Phæax, he cauſed Hyperbolus to be baniſhed, who fearing nothing leſſe: for it was neuer ſeene before, that a man of meane countenance, and of ſmall authority, fell into the hap of this baniſhment. As Plato the Comicall poet teſtifieth, ſpeaking of Hyperbolus.

Hyperbolus baniſhed for 10. yeares.

Although for his deſert, this paine to him is due,
or greater puniſhment prepard, the which might make him rue:
Yet ſince he was by birth, a perſon meane and baſe,
ſuch puniſhment therefore did ſeeme (for him) too great of grace.
Since Oſtraciſmon was, not made at firſt to be.
nor yet deuiſde as puniſhment, for ſuch meane folke as he.

But of this matter, we haue ſpoken more at large before: and now to returne againe to Alcibiades. Nicias had great reputation among ſtraungers, and his enemies grieued at it no leſſe, then at the honour the citizens ſelues did vnto him. For his houſe was the common inne for all LACEDÆMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they euer laie with him: moreouer he had very well entertained the LACEDÆMON priſoners that were taken at the fort of PYLE. And afterwards when peace was concluded betweene LACEDÆMON and ATHENS, and their priſoners redeliuered home againe by Nicias meanes onely and procurement: they loued him more then euer they did before. This was blowen abroade through GREECE, that Pericles had kindled the warres amongeſt them, and Nicias had quenched

it: ſo ſome called this peace Nicium, as one would ſay, Nicias worke. But Alcibiades ſtomaking this, and enuying Nicias glorie, determined to breake the peace whatſoeuer came of it. Wherefore to compaſſe this matter, knowing firſt of all that the ARGIVES had no liking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they did but ſeeke matter to fall out with them: he ſecretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreouer hee did perſwade them to it, both by letters and word of mouth, ſpeaking with the magiſtrates, and ſuch as had greateſt authority and credite amongeſt the people: declaring vnto them, that they ſhould not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeelde to them at all, but to ſticke to the ATHENIANS, who would ſoone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwards when the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the city of PANACTVM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and ſpoyled, contrarie to the league: Alcibiades perceiuing how the people were much offended thereat, made them more earneſt againſt them, and therewithall brought Nicias in diſgrace with the people, and charged him with many matters of great likelyhood. As at that time when he was generall: that hee would neuer take anie of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were ſhut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and much leſſe diſtreſſe them when he might: and moreouer that when other had taken them priſoners by force, that hee had found the meanes to deliuer them, and ſend them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, hee did not his duety to diſſwade the people from making of league offenſiue, & defenſiue with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe alſo, if there were any people of GREECE that had a deſire to become friends and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he did the beſt he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in diſgrace with the people, for the cauſes aboue ſayd: in the middeſt of this ſturre, ambaſſadours came by chance from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their comming gaue very good wordes, ſaying they had full power and commiſſion to compound all controuerſies, vnder reaſonable and equall conditions. The Senate heard them, and receiued them curteouſly, and the people the next day ſhould aſſemble in counſell to giue them audience: which Alcibiades fearing much, he went to labour the ambaſſadours, and ſpake with them apart in this ſort. What meane you, my Lordes of SPARTA: doe yee not know that the Senate hath alwaies accuſtomed to be gracious and fauourable vnto thoſe that ſue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a proude nature, and deſirous to imbrace all great matters? If therefore at the firſt ſight, yee doe giue them to vnderſtand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all manner of cauſes: doe you not thinke that they make you ſtretch your authoritie farre, to graunt them all that they will demaund. Therefore, my Lords ambaſſadours, if you looke for indifferency at the ATHENIANS hands, and that they ſhall not preaſe you too farre againſt your willes, to graunt them any thing of aduantage: I would wiſhe you a litle to couer your full commiſſion, and in open manner to propound certaine articles, and reaſonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwiſe with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will aſſure you of my good will in fauour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had tolde them this tale, he gaue them his faithfull promiſe, and vowed as it were to performe his word Hereupon Alcibiades turned the ambaſſadours from the truſt they repoſed in Nicias, and wanne them on his ſide: in ſo much as they gaue credite to no man but to him, wondring much at his great wiſedome & ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were aſſembled to giue the ambaſſadours audience. They were ſent for, and brought into the market place. There Alcibiades gently aſked them, what was the cauſe of their comming. They aunſwered: that they were come to treate of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then beganne Alcibiades to be angrie with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he anie to them: calling them vnfaithfull, vnconſtant, and fickle men, that were come neither to doe, nor ſay any thing worth the hearing. The Senate alſo were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: whereat Nicias was ſo aſhamed and amaſed withall, that hee could not tell what to ſay, to ſee ſo ſodaine a chaunge, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and ſubtill practiſe with the ambaſſadours. So the ambaſſadours of Lacedæmon were diſpatched without any thing done, and Alcibiades choſen generall: who preſently brought the Argives, the Elians, and the Mantinians in league with the Athenians. Though no man did commend this practiſe of his, in working it after this ſort: yet was it a maruellous thing of him to deuiſe to put all Peloponnesvs in armes, and to procure ſuch a number of ſouldiers againſt the Lacedæmonians, as he did before the citie of Mantinea, and to ſhift off the miſeries of warre and hazard of battell, ſo farre from Athens. Which if the Lacedæmonians did winne, could not profit them much: and if they loſt it, they could hardly ſaue their citie of Sparta. After this battell of Mantinea, the thouſand men whom the citie by an ancient order did keepe continually in pay, aſwell in peace as in warre, within the citie of Argos, thinking now opportunitie ſerued them very trimly: attempted to take the ſoueraigne authoritie from the common people, and to make themſelues Lords of the citie. And to bring this to paſſe, the Lacedæmonians comming in the meane time, did aide them in their purpoſe, and ſo did put downe the gouernement of the people: notwithſtanding, immediatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the ſtronger. Alcibiades comming thither euen at that time, did warrant them the victorie, and ſo ſet vp againe the authoritie of the people. Then he perſwaded them to make their walles longer to ioyne their citie to the ſea, to the end they might more eaſily be ayded by ſea, by the Athenians. He brought them alſo from Athens, many carpenters, maſons, ſtone hewers, and other workmen: and to conclude, he ſhewed them by all the meanes and waies he could, that he did beare good will vnto them, and thereby wanne himſelfe no leſſe fauour particularly among them, then generally he did good vnto his countrie. He did perſwade alſo the citizens of Patras to ioyne their towne to the ſea, by making long walles, which they built out euen to the cliffes of the ſea. And when one ſaid vnto them, alas, poore people of Patras, what do yee meane? the Athenians will eate you out. Alcibiades anſwered him, it may well be, but it ſhall be by litle and litle, beginning firſt at the feete: but the Lacedæmonians will deuoure you all at once, and begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the citie of Athens ſtrong by ſea, yet he did not leaue to perſwade the Athenians alſo, to make themſelues ſtrong by land. For he did put the young men oftentimes in minde of the othe they were made to ſweare in Agravlos, and did aduiſe them to accompliſh it in deed. Which was, that they ſhould take all corne fields, vines, and olyue trees, to be the borders and confines of Attica, whereby they were taught to reckon all land theirs, that was manured, and did bring forth fruite. Yet with all theſe goodly deedes and faire words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quickneſſe of vnderſtanding, he had many great faults and imperfections. For he was too daintie in his fare, wantonly giuen vnto light women, riotous in bankets, vaine and womaniſh in apparrell: he ware euer a long purple gowne that ſwept the market place as he walked vp and downe, it had ſuch a traine, and was too riche and coſtly for him to weare. And following theſe vaine pleaſures and delights, when he was in his galley, he cauſed the planckes of the poope thereof to be cut and broken vp, that he might lie the ſofter: for his bed was not laide vpon the ouerlop, but lay vpon girthes ſtrained ouer the hole, cut out and faſtened to the ſides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded ſcutchion, wherein he had no cognizance, nor ordinarie deuiſe of the Athenians, but onely had the image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The noblemen, and beſt cittizens of Athens perceiuing this, they hated his faſhions and conditions, and were much offended at him, and were afeard withall of his raſhneſſe and inſolencie: he did ſo contemne the lawes and cuſtomes of their countrie, being manifeſt tokens of a man that aſpired to be King, and would ſubuert and turne all ouer hand. And as for the good will of the common people towards him, the poet Ariſtophanes doth plainely expreſſe it in theſe words:

Alcibiades ryot.

The people moſt deſire, what moſt they hate to haue:
and what their minde abhorres, euen that they ſeeme to craue.

And in another place he ſaid alſo, aggrauating the ſuſpition they had of him.

For ſtate or commonweale, much better ſhould it be,
to keepe within the countrie none ſuch lyons lookes as he.

But if they needs will keepe, a lyon to their coſt,
then muſt they needs obey his will for he will rule the roſte.

For to ſay truely: his curteſies, his liberalities, and noble expences to ſhew the people ſo great pleaſure and paſtime as nothing could be more: the glorious memorie of his aunceſters, the grace of his eloquence, the beautie of his perſon, the ſtrength and valiantneſſe of his body, ioyned together with his wiſedome and experience in martiall affaires: were the very cauſes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the ATHENIANS did paciently endure all his light parts, and did couer his faults, with the beſt wordes and termes they could, calling them youthfull, and gentlemens ſports. As when he kept Agartharcus the painter priſoner in his houſe by force, vntill he had painted all his walles within: and when he had done, did let him go, and rewarded him very honeſtly for his paines. Againe when he gaue a boxe of the eare to Taureas, who did pay the whole charges of a companie of common plaiers, in ſpight of him, to carie away the honour of the games. Alſo when he tooke away a young woman of MELIA by his authoritie, that was taken among certaine priſoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a childe, which he cauſed to be brought vp. Which they called a worke of charitie, albeit afterwards they burthened him, that he was the onely cauſe of murthering of the poore MELIANS, ſauing the litle children, becauſe he had fauoured and perſwaded that vnnaturall and wicked decree, which another had propounded. Likewiſe where one Ariſtophon a painter, had painted a curtiſan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and ſitting in her lap, which all the people ran to ſee, and tooke great pleaſure to behold it: the graue and ancient men, were angrie at theſe fooliſh parts, accompting them impudent things, and done againſt all ciuill modeſtie and temperancie. Wherfore it ſeemed Archeſtratus words were ſpoken to good purpoſe, when he ſaid, that GREECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he came from the counſell and aſſembly of the citie, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by meanes thereof had obtained the thing he deſired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon, ſurnamed Miſanthropus (as who would ſay, Loup-garou, or the manhater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not paſſe by him, nor gaue him way (as he was wont to do all other men) but went ſtraight to him, and tooke him by the hand, and ſaid. O, thou dooſt well my ſonne, I can thee thanke, that thou goeſt on, and climeſt vp ſtill: for if euer thou be in authoritie, woe be vnto thoſe that follow thee, for they are vtterly vndone. When they heard theſe words, thoſe that ſtood by fell a laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after, ſuch ſundrie opinions they had of him for the vnconſtancie of his life, and waiwardneſſe of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of SICILE, the ATHENIANS did maruellouſlie couet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not medle withall, vntill after his death: and then they did it at the firſt vnder colour of friendſhip, as ayding thoſe cities which were oppreſſed, and ſpoiled by the SYRACVSANS. This was in manner a plaine bridge made, to paſſe afterwards a greater power and armie thither. Howbeit the onely procurer of the ATHENIANS, and perſwader of them, to ſend ſmall companies thither no more, but to enter with a great armie at once to conquer all the countrie together, was Alcibiades: who had ſo allured the people with his pleaſant tongue, that vpon his perſwaſion, they built caſtles in the ayre, and thought to do greater wonders, by winning onely of SICILIA. For where other did ſet their mindes vpon the conqueſt of SICILE, being that they only hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enterpriſes. And where Nicias commonly in all his perſwaſions, did turne the ATHENIANS from their purpoſe to make warres againſt the SYRACVSANS, as being too great a matter for them to take the citie of SYRACVSA: Alcibiades againe had a further reache in his head, to go conquer LIBYA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to paſſe from thence into ITALIE, and ſo to PELOPONNESVS: ſo that SICILIA ſhould ſerue but to furniſh them with victuals, and to pay the ſouldiers for their conqueſts which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently caried away with a maruellous hope and opinion of this iorney, and gaue good eare to old mens tales that told thẽ wonders of the countries: inſomuch as there was no other paſtime nor exerciſe among the youth in their meetings,but companies of men to ſet round together, drawe plats of SICILE,and deſcribe the ſcituation of LIBYA and CARTHAGE. And yet they ſay,that neither Socrates the Philoſopher,nor Meton the Aſtronomer did euer hope to ſee any good ſucceſſe of this iourney. For the one by the reuealing of his familiar ſpirit, who told him all things to come,as was thought,had no great opinion of it: and Meton, whether it was for the feare of the ſucceſſe of the iourney he had by reaſon, or that he knew by diuination of his arte what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, and holding a burning torche in his hand,made as though he would haue ſet his houſe a fire. Other ſay,that he did not counterfeit, but like a mad man indeed did ſet his houſe a fire one night, & that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to pray the people,that in conſideration of his great loſſe & his grieuous calamity ſo late happened him,it would pleaſe them to diſcharge his ſonne for going this voyage. So by this mad deuiſe, he obteined his requeſt of the people for his ſonne,whom he abuſed much. But Nicias againſt his will was choſen captaine, to take charge of men in theſe warres: who miſliked this iourney,aſwell for his companion and aſſociate in the charge of theſe wars,as for other misfortunes he foreſaw therin. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the warre would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades raſhneſſe and hardineſſe,but did ioyne with him the wiſedome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus alſo for their third captaine,whom they ſent thither, though he were waxen now ſomewhat olde, as one that had ſhewed him ſelfe no leſſe venturous and hardie in ſome battels, then Alcibiades himſelfe. Now when they came to reſolue of the number of ſouldiers, the furniture and order of theſe warres, Nicias ſought crookedly to thwart this iourney, and to breake it off altogether: but Alcibiades withſtood him,and got the better hand of him. There was an orator called Demoſtratus, who mooued the people alſo, that the captaines whom they had choſen for theſe warres: might haue full power and authoritie to leauie men at their diſcretion, and to make ſuch preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condeſcended, and did authoriſe them. But when they were euen ready to go their way, many ſignes of ill ſucceſſe lighted in the neck one of another: and amongſt the reſt this was one. That they were commanded to take ſhip,on the day of the celebration of the feaſt of Adonia, on the which the cuſtome is,that women do ſet vp in diuers places of the citie,in the middeſt of the ſtreets,images, like to dead corſes which they carie to buriall, and they repreſent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with blubbering, and beating themſelues, in token of the ſorrow the goddeſſe Venus made,for the death of her friend Adonis. Moreouer,the Hermes (which are the images of Mercurie,and were wont to be ſet vp in euery lane and ſtreete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled ſpecially in their faces: but this put diuerſe in great feare and trouble,yet euen thoſe that made no accompt of ſuch toyes. Wherevpon it was alledged that it might be the CORINTHIANS that did it, or procured that leude acte to be done,fauouring the SYRACVSANS, who were their neere kinſemen, and had bene the firſt founders of them,imagining vpon this ill token,it might be a cauſe to breake off the enterpriſe, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hand. Neuertheleſſe,the people would not allow this excuſe, neither hearken to their words that ſaied, they ſhould not reckon of any ſuch ſignes or tokens, and that they were but ſome light brained youthes, that being tippled, had played this ſhamefull part in their brauerie, or for ſporte. But for all theſe reaſons, they tooke theſe ſignes very greeuouſlie, and were in deed not a litle afeard, as thinking vndoubtedly that no man durſt haue bene ſo bolde to haue done ſuch an abhominable facte, but that there was ſome conſpiracie in the matter. Hereupon, they looked vpon euery ſuſpition and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely ſoeuer it were) and that very ſeuerely: and both Senate and people alſo met in counſell vpon it, very oft, and in a fewe dayes. Now whileſt they were buſilie ſearching out the matter, Androcles a common counſeller, and oratour in the commonwealth, brought before the counſell certaine ſlaues and ſtrangers that dwelt in ATHENS: who depoſed that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that ſort, and in a mockerie had counterfeited alſo in a banket that he made, the ceremonies of the holy myſteries, declaring theſe matters particularly. How one Theodorus counterfeited

the herauld, that is wonte to make the proclamations: Polytion the torche bearer, and Alcibiades the prieſt, who ſheweth the holy ſignes and myſteries: and that his other companions were the aſſiſtants, as thoſe that make ſute to be receiued into their religion and order, and into the brotherhood of their holy myſteries, whom for this cauſe they call Myſtes. Theſe very words are written in the accuſation Theſſalus (Cimons ſonne) made againſt Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddeſſes, Ceres, and Proſerpina. Whereat the people being maruellouſly moued and offended, and the orator Androcles his mortall enemie, aggrauating and ſtirring them vp the more againſt him: Alcibiades a litle at the firſt began to be amazed at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners which were prepared for the voyage of SICILIA, and the ſouldiers alſo that were gathered, did beare him great goodwill, and ſpecially how the aide, and that bande that came from ARGOS, and Mantinea (being a thouſand footemen, well armed and appointed) did ſay openly, how it was for Alcibiades ſake they did take vpon them ſo long a voyage beyond ſea, and that if they went about to do him any hurt or wrong, they would preſently returne home againe from whence they came: he began to be of a good courage againe, and determined with this good fauourable oportunitie of time, to come before the counſell, to aunſwer to all ſuch articles and accuſations as ſhould be laide againſt him. Thereupon his enemies were a litle cooled, fearing leaſt the people in this iudgement would haue ſhewed him more fauour, becauſe they ſtood in neede of him. Wherefore to preuent this danger, they had fed other oratours, who ſet a good face on the matter, as they had bene Alcibiades friends, and yet bare him no leſſe goodwill, then the ranckeſt enemies he had. Theſe fine fellowes roſe vp in open aſſembly, and ſaid: it was no reaſon, that he that was now choſen one of the generals of ſo mightie and puiſſant an armie (being ready to hoyſe ſaile, and the aide alſo of their allies and friends) ſhould be driuen to ſtay now, and to loſe time and occaſion of well doing, whileſt they ſhould go about to chooſe iudges, and appoint him his houres and time of anſwer. Therefore, they ſaied, it was fit he ſhould take his iourney betimes, and when warres were done, that he ſhould preſent himſelfe to require iuſtice, and to purge himſelfe of ſuch matters as ſhould be obiected againſt him. But Alcibiades ſmelling ſtraight their fetche, and perceiuing the practiſe of his ſtay, ſtept vp, and declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a generall of ſo great an armie, his minde being troubled with continuall feare of ſo grieuous curſes, as he ſhould leaue vpon him: and that he deſerued death, if he could not purge and iuſtifie himſelfe, of all the vniuſt and ſurmized accuſations againſt him. And if he had once cleered himſelfe of all things, and had publiſhed his innocencie: he ſhould then haue nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to go on luſtely to fight with his enemies, and to caſt behinde him the danger of all his ſlaunderous detracters. But all this could not perſwade them. And ſo he was preſently commanded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke, and ſhip away his men. Thus he was compelled to take the ſeas with his other companions, hauing in their nauie about a hundred and fortie galleys, all hauing three owers to a bancke: and fiue thouſand one hundred footemen, very well armed and appointed, and throwers with ſlings, archers, and other light armed men, to the number of thirteene hundred, ſufficiently furniſhed of all warlike and neceſſarie munition. Nowe after they were arriued on the coaſt of ITALIE, they landed in the citie of RHEGIO: where, holding counſell in what ſort they ſhould direct theſe warres, it was reſolued in the end that they ſhould go ſtraight vnto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias did contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his conſent thereunto: and at his firſt comming, he was the occaſion of winning the citie of CATANA. But he neuer after did any exploite, for he was called home immediatly by the ATHENIANS, to come and aunſwer certaine accuſations laide to his charge. For as we tolde you before, there was at the beginning, certaine light ſuſpitions and accuſations put vp againſt him, by ſome ſlaues and ſtrangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burthened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken the images of Mercurie: and had committed ſacriledge in counterfeiting in ieaſt and mockerie the holy ceremonies of the myſteries: and blew into the eares of the people, that both the one and the other proceeded of one ſet conſpiracie, to change and alter the gouernment of the ſtate of the citie. Vpon theſe informations, the people tooke it in ſo ill part, that they committed all to priſon, that were in any ſort accuſed or ſuſpected thereof, and would neuer let them come to their aunſwere: and moreouer did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon ſo great complaints and informations as were exhibited againſt him, while his offence was in queſtion before them. And the furie and hatred of the people was ſuch towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their daunger, they were the worſe handled for his ſake. Thucydides did not name his accuſers, but ſome other doe name Dioclides and Teucer: amongſt whom, Phrynicus the Comicall poet is one, who diſcouereth it in his verſes, by bringing in one that ſpeaketh thus to the image of Mercury.

My good friend: Mercurie, I pray thee take good heede, that thou fall not, and breake thy necke: for ſo thou mightſt me breede, both daunger and diſtruſt, and though I guiltleſſe be,
ſome Dioclides falſely might accuſe and trouble me.

Mercury anſwereth.

Take thou no thought for me, my ſelfe I ſhall well ſaue:
and will foreſee full well therewith that Teucer (that falſe knaue) ſhall not the money get, which he by law hath wonne, for his promouters bribing part, and accuſation.

And yet for all this, theſe tokens doe ſhewe no certainetie of any thing. For one of them being asked, how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced theſe images? he anſwered, that he knewe them well enough by the brightneſſe of the moone. And hereby it appeareth plainely that he was periured, becauſe that the ſame night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a coniunction of the moone. This did a litle trouble and ſtay men of iudgement: howbeit the common ſort of people this notwithſtanding, did not leaue to be as ſharpe ſet, to receiue all accuſations and informations, that were brought in againſt him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the priſoners whoſe cauſe was hanging before them, the orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the hiſtoriographer deſcribeth to deſcende of the race of Vlyſſes) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the gouernment of the common people, and bent altogether to fauour the ſmall number of the nobilitie. But one of the chiefeſt occaſions why he was ſuſpected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his houſe there was a faire great image ſet vp in olde time, by the familie or tribe of the Ægeides, and that alone amongeſt all the reſt of ſo many famous images, was left whole and vnbroken: whereupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is ſo called generally of euery bodie, albeit the inſcription ſheweth the contrarie. Andocides being in priſon, chaunced to fall in acquaintance with one Timæus, with whom he was more familiar then with all the reſt, who was alſo priſoner with him for the ſelf cauſe. This Timæus was a man not ſo well knowen as he, but beſides, a wiſe man, and very hardie. He perſwaded him, and put into his head, that he ſhould accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confeſſing it, he ſhould receiue grace and pardon, according to the courſe and promiſe of the law. Where contrarily, if he ſhould ſtand vpon the courteſie of the iudges ſentence, he might eaſily endaunger himſelfe: becauſe iudgements in ſuch caſes are vncertaine to all people, and moſt to be doubted and feared towarde the rich. And therefore he tolde him it were his beſt way, if he looked into the matter wiſely, by lying to ſaue his life, rather then to ſuffer death with ſhame, and to be condemned vpon this falſe accuſation. Alſo he ſaid if he would haue regard to the common wealth, that it ſhould in like caſe be wiſely done of him, to put in daunger a few of thoſe (which ſtood doubtfull whether in troth they were any of them or not) to ſaue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honeſt men, who in deede were innocent of this lewd fact. Timæus words and perſwaſions wrought ſuch effect with Andocides, that they made him yeld vnto them, & brought him to accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: by meanes wherof Alcibiades according to the lawe had his pardon. But all ſuch as he named and accuſed, were euery man put to death, ſauing ſuch as ſaued them ſelues by running away. Furthermore, to ſhadowe his accuſation with ſome apparance of troth, Andocides among thoſe that were accuſed, did accuſe alſo certaine of his owne ſeruants.

Alcibiades ſent for to anſwere to his accuſation.

Now though the people had no more occaſion to occupie their buſie heades about the breakers of theſe images, yet was not their malice thus appeaſed againſt Alcibiades, vntil they ſent the galley called Salaminiana, commaunding thoſe they ſent by a ſpeciall commiſſion to ſeeke him out, in no caſe to attempt to take him by force, nor to lay holde on him by violence: but to vſe him with all the good wordes and courteous manner that they poſſibly could, and to will him onely to appeare in perſon before the people, to anſwere to certaine accuſations put vp againſt him. If otherwiſe they ſhould haue vſed force, they feared much leaſt the armie would haue mutined on his behalfe within the countrie of their enemies, & that there would haue growen ſome ſedition amongeſt their ſouldiers. This might Alcibiades haue eaſily done, if he had bene diſpoſed. For the ſouldiers were very ſorie to ſee him depart, perceiuing that the warres ſhould be drawen out now in length, and be much prolonged vnder Nicias, ſeeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only ſpurre that pricked Nicias forward to do any ſeruice: and that Lamachus alſo, though he were a valiant man of his handes, yet he lacked honour and authoritie in the armie, becauſe he was but a meane man borne, and poore beſides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, diſappointed the Athenians of winning the citie of Messina: for they hauing intelligence by certaine priuate perſons within the citie, that it would yeelde vp into their hands, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them vnto thoſe that were the Syracusans friendes: whereupon all this practiſe was broken vtterly. Afterwardes when he came to the citie of Thuries, ſo ſoone as he had landed, he went and hid himſelfe incontinently in ſuch ſort, that ſuch as ſought for him, could not find him. Yet there was one that knew him where he was, and ſaid: Why, how now Alcibiades, dareſt thou not truſt the iuſtice of thy countrie? Yes very well (ꝗ he) and it were in another matter: but my life ſtanding vpon it, I would not truſt mine owne mother, fearing leaſt negligently ſhe ſhould put in the blacke beane, where ſhe ſhould caſt in the white. For by the firſt, condemnation of death was ſignified: and by the other, pardon of life. But afterwards, hearing that the Athenians for malice had condemned him to death: well, ꝗ he, they ſhall know I am yet a liue.

Now the manner of his accuſation and inditement framed againſt him, was found written in this ſort. Theſſalus the ſonne of Cimon, of the village of Laciades, hath accuſed, and doth accuſe Alcibiades, the ſonne of Clinias, of the village of Scambonides, to haue offended againſt the goddeſſes, Ceres and Proſerpina, counterfaiting in mockery their holy myſteries, & ſhewing them to his familiar friends in his houſe, himſelfe apparelled and arraied in a long veſtement or cope, like vnto the veſtement the prieſt weareth when he ſheweth theſe holy ſacred myſteries: and naming himſelfe the prieſt, Polytion the torch bearer, and Theodorus of the village of Phygea the verger, and the other lookers on, brethren, & felow ſcorners with them, and all done in manifeſt contempt and deriſion, of holy ceremonies and myſteries of the Eumolpides, the religious prieſts and miniſters of the ſacred temple of the citie of Eleusin.

Alcibiades condemned being abſent.

So Alcibiades for his contempt and not appearing, was condemned, and his goods confiſcate. Beſides this condemnation, they decreed alſo, that all the religious prieſts and women ſhould ban and accurſe him. But hereunto aunſwered one of the Nunnes called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of Agraula, ſaying that ſhe was profeſſed religious, to pray & to bleſſe, not to curſe and banne. After this moſt grieuous ſentence and condemnation paſſed againſt him, Alcibiades, departed out of the citie of Thuries, and went into the countrie of Peloponnesus, where he continued a good ſeaſon in the citie of Argos. But in the end fearing his enemies, and hauing no hope to returne againe to his owne countrie with any ſafety: he ſent vnto Sparta to haue ſafe conduct & licence of the Lacedæmonians, that he might come and dwell in their countrie, promiſing them he would do them more good being now their freind, then he euer did them hurt, while he was their enemie.

Alcibiades flyeth to Sparta.

The Lacedæmonians graunted his requeſt, and receiued him very willingly into their citie: where euen vpon his firſt comming, he did three things. The firſt was: That the Lacedæmonians by his perſwaſion and procurement, did determine ſpeedily to ſend aid to the Syracusans, whom they had long before delaied: and ſo they ſent Gylippus their captaine to ouerthrowe the Athenians armie, which they had ſent thither. The ſecond thing he did for them, was: That he made them of Grece to beginne warre vpon the Athenians. The third, and greateſt matter of importance, was: That he did counſell them to fortifie the citie of Decelea, which was within the territores of Attica ſelfe: which conſumed, and brought the power of the Athenians lower, then any other thing whatſoeuer he could haue done. And if he were welcome, and well eſteemed in Sparta, for the ſeruice he did to the common wealth: much more he wanne the loue and good wils of priuate men, for that he liued after the Laconian manner. So as they that ſaw his skinne ſcraped to the fleſh, and ſaw him waſh himſelfe in cold water, and how he did eate browne bread, and ſup of their blacke broth: would haue doubted (or to ſay better, neuer haue beleeued) that ſuch a man had euer kept cooke in his houſe, nor that he euer had ſeene ſo much as a perfuming panne, or had touched cloth of tiſſue made at Miletvm. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they ſay was one, whereby he moſt robbed mens hearts: that he could frame altogether with their manners and faſhions of life, transforming himſelfe more eaſily to all manner of ſhapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white colour: but Alcibiades could put vpon him any manners, cuſtomes or faſhions, of what nation ſoeuer, & could follow, exerciſe, and counterfaite them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in Sparta, he was very painefull, and in continuall exerciſe: he liued ſparingly with litle, and led a ſtraight life. In Ionia, to the contrarie: there he liued daintily & ſuperfluouſly, and gaue himſelf to all mirth and pleaſure. In Thracia, he dranke euer, or was alwaies on horſe back. If he came to Tiſſaphernes, lieutenant of the mightie king of Persia: he farre exceeded the magnificence of Persia in pompe and ſumptuouſnes. And theſe things notwithſtanding, neuer altered his naturall condition from one faſhion to another, neither did his manners (to ſay truely) receiue all ſorts of chaunges. But becauſe peraduenture, if he had ſhewed his naturall diſpoſition, he might in diuers places where he came, haue offended thoſe whoſe companie he kept, he did with ſuch a viſerd and cloke diſguiſe himſelfe, to fit their maners, whom he companied with, by transforming himſelfe into their naturall countenance. As he that had ſeene him when he was at Sparta, to haue looked vpon the outward man, would haue ſaid as the common prouerbe ſaieth:

It is not the ſonne of Achilles, but Achilles ſelfe:

Euen ſo it is euen he, whom Lycurgus brought vp. But he that had inwardly ſeene his naturall doings, and good will in deede lie naked before him: would haue ſaide contrarily, as they ſay commonly in another language.

Alcibiades more chaungeable then the camelion.

For he entertained Queene Timæa, King Agis wife of Sparta, ſo well in his abſence, he being abroad in the warres: that he got her with child, and ſhe her ſelfe denied it not. For ſhe being brought a bed of a ſonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when ſhe was amongeſt her familiars and very friends, ſhe called him ſoftly Alcibiades, ſhe was ſo farre in loue with him. And Alcibiades ieaſting out the matter, ſaide he had done it for no hurt, nor for any luſt of fleſh to ſatisfie his deſire: but onely to leaue of his race, to reigne amongeſt the Lacedæmonians. This matter was brought by diuers vnto King Agis eares, who at the length beleeued it: but ſpecially when he beganne to make a reckoning of the time, how long it was ſince he lay with his wiſe. For lying with his wiſe one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ranne out of his chamber for feare the houſe would fall on his head: ſo that it was tenne moneths after ere he lay againe with her. Whereupon, her ſonne Leotychides being borne at the end of tenne moneths, he ſaide he was none of his: and this was the cauſe that Leotychides did not ſucceede afterwards in the Kingdome, becauſe he was not of the bloud royall. After the vtter ouerthrowe of the Athenians in Sicilia, thoſe of the Iles of Chio and Lesbos, with the Cyzicenians, did ſend all about a tenne ambaſſadours to Sparta: to let the Lacedæmonians vnderſtand, they had good will to leaue the Athenians, ſo they would ſend them aide to defende them. The Boeotians fauored thoſe of Lesbos: Pharnabazus, the king of Persiaes lieutenant, fauored the Cyzicenians. This notwithſtanding, the Lacedæmonians were better affected to helpe thoſe of Chio firſt, by the perſwaſion of Alcibiades, who tooke their matters in hande. And he tooke ſea himſelfe and went into Aſia, where he almoſt turned the countrie of Ionia againſt the Athenians: and keeping alwaies with the generals of the Lacedæmonians, he did much hurt the Athenians. Yet notwithſtanding, king Agis did beare him ill will, partly for the iniurie he did him in diſhonouring and defiling his wife, and partly alſo, for that he enuied his glorie: becauſe the rumour ranne all about, that the moſt part of the goodly exploites of theſe warres did happen well, by Alcibiades meanes. Other alſo of the greateſt authoritie among the Spartans, that were moſt ambitious among them, beganne in their mindes to be angrie with Alcibiades, for the enuie they bare him: who were of ſo great power, that they procured their gouernours to write their letters to their captaines in the field, to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, did no whit deſiſt to doe all he could for the benefite of the Lacedæmonians: yet he had an eye behind him, flying all occaſions to fall into their hands. So in the end, for more ſuerty of his perſon, he went vnto Tiſaphernes, one of the king of Perſiaes lieutenantes, with whom he wanne incontinently ſuch credit, that he was the firſt and chiefeſt perſon he had about him. For this barbarous man being no ſimple perſon, but rather malicious, & ſubtill of nature, and that loued fine & craftie men: did wonder how he could ſo eaſily turne from one manner of liuing to another, and alſo at his quicke wit and vnderſtanding. Moreouer, his companie and manner to paſſe the time away, was commonly maruellous full of mirth and pleaſure, and he had ſuch pleaſant comely deuiſes with him, that no man was of ſo ſullen a nature, but he would make him merie, nor ſo churliſh, but he would make him gentle. So that both thoſe that feared him, and alſo enuied him: they were yet glad to ſee him, & it did them good to be in his company, & vſe talke with him. In ſo much as this Tiſaphernes (that otherwiſe was a churliſh man, and naturally hated the Grecians) did giue him ſelfe ſo much vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleaſed him ſo well: that he himſelfe did ſtudie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make much of him. For he called Alcibiades his faire houſe of pleaſure, and goodly proſpect: notwithſtanding he had many goodly gardens, ſweete ſpringes, greene arbours and pleaſant meadowes, and thoſe in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades deſpairing vtterly to finde any ſafetie or friendſhippe among the Spartans, and fearing on the other ſide king Agis alſo: he beganne to ſpeake ill of them, and to diſgrace all that they did, to Tiſaphernes. By this practiſe he ſtaied Tiſaphernes from aiding them ſo friendly as he might: moreouer, he did not vtterly deſtroy the Athenians. For he perſwaded him that he ſhould furniſh the Lacedæmonians but with litle money, to let them diminiſh and conſume by litle and litle: to the end that after one had troubled and weakned the other, they both at the length ſhould be the eaſier for the King to ouercome. This barbarous man did eaſily conſent to this deuiſe. All the world then ſaw he loued Alcibiades, and eſteemed of him very much: in ſo much as he was ſought to, and regarded of all handes of the Grecians. Then were the Athenians ſorie, and repented them when they had receiued ſo great loſſe and hurt, for that they had decreed ſo ſeuerely againſt Alcibiades, who in like manner was very ſorowfull, to ſee them brought to ſo hard termes, fearing, if the citie of Athens came to deſtruction, that he himſelfe ſhould fall in the ende into the handes of the Lacedæmonians, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the Athenians were almoſt in the Ile of Samos, from whence with their armie by ſea, they ſought to ſuppreſſe the rebels that were vp againſt them, and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily ſtrong to reſiſt their enemies, at the leaſt by ſea: but they ſtoode in great feare of the power of Tiſaphernes, and of the hundred & fiftie gallies which were reported to be comming out of the countrie of Phenicia, to the aide of their enemies, which if they had come, the citie of Athens had bene vtterly ſpoyled, and for euer without hope of recouerie. The which Alcibiades vnderſtanding, ſent ſecretly vnto the chiefeſt men that were in the armie of the Athenians at Samos, to giue them hope he would make Tiſaphernes their friend: howbeit not of any deſire hee had to gratifie the people, nor that he truſted to the communaltie of Athens, but only to the honorable, and honeſt citizens, and that conditionally ſo as they had the heart and courage, to bridle a litle the ouer licentiouſnes and inſolencie of the common people, & that they would take vpon them the authoritie to gouerne, and to redreſſe their ſtate, and to preſerue the citie of Athens,from finall and vtter deſtruction. Vpon this aduertiſement,all the heads & chiefe men did giue very good eare vnto it:ſauing only Phrynichus,one of the captains,& of the town of Dirades. Who miſtruſting(that was true in deede) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward,nor who had the chiefe gouernment of Athens,the nobility,or the communalty,and did but ſeeke all the deuiſes & waies he could,to returne again if it might be poſſible, in any maner of ſort,and that he did but curry fauour with the nobility,blaming and accuſing the people:he ſtood altogether againſt the motion,wherupon Alcibiades deuiſe was not followed. And hauing now ſhewed himſelfe open enemy to Alcibiades,he did ſecretly aduertiſe Aſtiochus then admirall to the Lacedæmonians, of Alcibiades practiſe, and warned him to take heed of him,& to lay him vp ſafe,as a double dealer,& one that had inteligence with both ſides:but he vnderſtood not how it was but one traitour to ſpeake to another. For this Aſtiochus was a follower of Tiſaphernes for his priuate cõmodity: and perceiuing Alcibiades in ſuch credit with him,he did diſcouer to Alcibiades all that Phrynichus had aduertiſed him. Alcibiades ſtraight ſent men of purpoſe to Samos,vnto the captains there,to accuſe Phrynichus of the treaſon he had reuealed againſt them. Thoſe of the counſell there, receiuing this intelligence: were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he ſeeing no better way to ſaue himſelfe for making of this fault,went about to make amends with cõmitting a worſe fault. Therupon he ſent again to Aſtiochus,complaining much he had diſcloſed him:and yet neuertheles he promiſed him,if he would keepe his counſell,that he would deliuer the whole fleete and army of the Athenians into his hands. Howbeit this treaſon of Phrynichus did the Athenians no hurt at all,by reaſon of Aſtiochus counter treaſon: for he did let Alcibiades againe vnderſtand what offer Phrynichus had made him Phrynichus looking to be charged with this againe,the ſecond time before the counſell,by means of Alcibiades:did firſt aduertiſe the chiefe of the army of the Athenians. That their enemies would come and ſet vpon thẽ,and where,and how:& gaue them therefore warning to keepe neare their ſhips,to make a ſtrong watch,and to fortifie them ſelues with all ſpeed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other letters frõ Alcibiades, by the which he did warne them againe to take heed of Phrynichus, becauſe he had practiſed againe with their enemies, to deliuer the whole army of Athens into their hands. But they gaue no credit to his ſecond letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparations and minds of the enemies,would ſerue his own turne with the falſe accuſing of Phrynichus. Notwithſtanding this,there was ſome falſhood in fellowſhip:for one Hermon,openly in the market place,ſtabbed Phrynichus in with a dagger and killed him. The fact being pleaded in law,& throughly conſidered of: the dead body by the ſentence of the people was condemned for a traytour : and Hermon the murtherer, and his fellowes,were crowned in recompence of their fact they had done to kill a traitour to the common wealth. Wherefore thoſe that were Alcibiades frends,being at that time the ſtronger,and greateſt men of the counſell in the army at Samos:they ſent one Fiſander to Athens, to attempt to alter the gouernment,and to encourage the noble men to take vpon them the authority,and to plucke it from the people: aſſuring them that Tiſaphernes would giue them aide to doe it, by meanes of Alcibiades,who would make him their friend. This was the colour and cloke wherwith they ſerued their turns,that did change the gouernment of Athens,& that brought it into the hands of a ſmall number of nobility:for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called themſelues fiue thouſand. But ſo ſoone as they felt them ſelues ſtrong , and that they had the whole authority of gouernment,without contradiction in their hands: they made then no more reckoning of Alcibiades,and ſo they made warres more coldly and ſlackly then before. Partly becauſe they miſtruſted their citizens, who found the chaunge of gouernment very ſtrange: and partly alſo becauſe they were of opinion that the Lacedæmonians ( who at all times did moſt fauour the gouernment of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common people that remained ſtill in the city , ſturred not, but were quiet againſt their wils,for feare of danger,becauſe there were many of them ſlaine, that boldly tooke vpon them in open preſence to reſiſt theſe foure hundred. But thoſe that were in the campe, in the Ile of Samos,hearing theſe newes,were ſo grieuouſly offended:that they reſolued to returne incontinently againe, vnto the hauen of Pyræa. First of all,they ſent for Alcibiades, whom they choſe their captaine: then they commaunded him ſtraightly to leade them againſt theſe tyraunts, who had vſurped the libertie of the people of ATHENS. But neuertheleſſe hee did not therein, as another would haue done in this caſe, ſeeing him ſelfe ſo ſodainely crept againe in fauour with the common people: for he did not thinke he ſhould incontinently pleaſe and gratifie them in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their ſhips, and ſo great an army, being before but a baniſhed man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But to the contrary, as it became a generall worthy of ſuch a charge, he conſidered with him ſelfe, that it was his part wiſely to ſtay thoſe, who would in a rage and fury careleſly caſt them ſelues away, and not ſuffer them to doe it. And truely Alcibiades was the cauſe of the preſeruing of the city of ATHENS at that time, from vtter deſtruction. For if they had ſodainely (according to their determination) departed from SAMOS to goe to ATHENS: the enemies finding no man to let them, might eaſely haue won all the countrey of IONIA, of HELLESPONT, and of al the other Iles without ſtroke ſtriking, whileſt the ATHENIANS were buſie fighting one againſt another in ciuill warres, and within the compaſſe of their owne wals. This Alcibiades alone, and no other, did preuent, not onely by perſwading the whole army, and declaring the inconuenience thereof, which would fall out vpon their ſodaine departure: but alſo by intreating ſome particularly apart, and keeping a number backe by very force. To bring this about, one Thraſibulus of the towne of STIRA, did helpe him much: who went through the armie, and cried out vpon them that were bent to enterpriſe this iourney. For he had the biggeſt and loudeſt voice as they ſay, of any man that was in all the city of ATHENS. This was a notable act, and a great peece of ſeruice done by Alcibiades: that hee promiſed fiue hundred ſaile of the PHENICIANS (which the LACEDÆMONIANS aſſuredly looked for, in their aide frō the king of PERSIA) ſhould not come at all, or elſe if they came, it ſhould be in the fauour of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediatly, and went with great ſpeede to Tiſaphernes: whom he handled in ſuch ſort, that he brought not the ſhippes that lay at rode before the city of ASPENDA, and ſo he brake promiſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was maruellouſly blamed and accuſed, both of the one and the other ſide, to haue altered Tiſaphernes mind, but chiefely of the LACEDÆMONIANS: who ſaide that he had perſwaded this barbarous captaine, he ſhould neither aide the one nor the other, but rather to ſuffer them one to deuour and deſtroy each other. For it had beene out of doubt, if this great fleete and nauy of the Kings had come, to ioyne their force with either party: that they had taken from the one of them, the ſigniory and domination of the ſea. Shortly after, the foure hundred noble men that had vſurped the authority and gouernment of ATHENS, were vtterly driuen away and ouerthrowen, by meanes of the friendly aide and aſſiſtaunce that Alcibiades friendes gaue thoſe that tooke the peoples part. So the citizens were very well pleaſed with Alcibiades, in ſo much as they ſent for him to returne when he thought good. But he iudging with him ſelfe it would be no honour nor grace vnto him to returne without ſome well deſeruing, & before he had done ſome greater exploite, as only vppon the peoples fauour and good will, whereas otherwiſe his returne might bee both glorious and triumphant: departed firſt from SAMOS with a ſmall number of gallies, and went ſayling vp and downe the Iles of COS and of GNIDOS. There he was aduertiſed, that Mindarus, the admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was gone with all his fleete vnto the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and that the captaines of the ATHENIANS gaue chaſe vnto him. Thereupon he went alſo and ſayled thither with ſpeede, to aide the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with eighteene gallies euen at the very inſtant, when they were both in the middeſt of their fight, with all their ſhips before the city of ABYDOS. The battell was cruelly foughten betweene them from morning till night, both the one and the other hauing the better in one part of the battell, and the worſt in another place. Now at the firſt diſcouery of Alcibiades comming, both partes had in deede contrary imaginations of him. For the enemies tooke heart vnto them: and the ATHENIANS beganne to be afeard. But Alcibiades ſet vp ſtraight his flagge in the toppe of the gallie of his admirall, to ſhew what he was. Wherewithall, he ſet vpon the PELOPONNESIANS, that had the better, and had certaine gallies of the ATHENIANS in chaſe: whereupon the PELOPONNESIANS gaue ouer their chaſe, and fled. But Alcibiades followed them ſo luſtely, that hee ran diuerſe of them a ground, and brake their ſhips, and ſlue a great number of men that leapt into the ſea, in hope to ſaue themſelues by ſwimming a land. So notwithſtanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did his beſt indeuour to ſaue their gallies by the ſea ſhore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end wan thirty gallies of their enemies, and ſaued all their owne, and ſo did ſet vp certaine flagges of triumph and victorie. Alcibiades hauing now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs goe ſhew him ſelfe in triumph vnto Tiſaphernes. So hauing prepared to preſent him with goodly rich preſents, and appointed alſo a conuenient traine and number of ſaile meete for a generall, hee tooke his courſe directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for. For Tiſaphernes ſtāding in great hazard of diſpleaſure, and feare of puniſhment at the Kinges handes, hauing long time before bene defamed by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who had complained of him, that hee did not fulfill the Kings commandement, thought that Alcibiades was arriued in very happy houre: whereupon he kept him priſoner in the city of SARDIS, ſuppoſing the wrong hee had done, would by this meanes eaſily diſcharge, and purge him to the King. Yet at the end of thirty daies, Alcibiades by fortune got a horſe, and ſtealing from his keepers, fled vnto the city of CLAZOMENES: and this did more increaſe the ſuſpition they had of Taſiphernes, becauſe they thought that vnder hand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades tooke then ſea again, and went to ſeeke out the army of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had found, & heard newes that Mindarus, and Pharnabazus were together in the city of CIZICVM: he made an oration to his ſouldiers, and declared vnto them how it was very requiſit they ſhould fight with their enemies, both by ſea and by land, and moreouer that they ſhould aſſault them within their forts and caſtels, becauſe otherwiſe they could haue no money to defray their charges. His oration ended, he made them immediatly hoiſe ſaile, and ſo to go lie at anker in the Ile of PROCONESVS: where he tooke order that they ſhould keepe in all the pinnaſes and brigantines among the ſhippes of warre, that thē enemy might haue no manner of intelligence of his comming. The great ſhowres of raine alſo, with thunder and darke weather that fell out ſodainly vpon it, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterpriſe: in ſo much as not onely his enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knew nothing of his comming. So ſome made their reckonning, that they could doe litle or nothing all that day: yet he made them ſodainely imbarke, and hoiſe ſaile. They were no ſooner in the maine ſea, but they diſcried a farre off the gallies of their enemies, which lay at rode before the hauen of CYZICVM. And fearing leaſt the great number of his fleete would make them flie, and take land before hee could come to them: he commaunded certaine captaines to ſtay behinde, and to rowe ſoftely after him, and him ſelfe with forty gallies with him, went towardes the enemies to prouoke them to fight. The enemies ſuppoſing there had beene no more ſhippes, then thoſe that were in ſight: did ſet out preſently to fight with them. They were no ſooner ioyned together, but Alcibiades ſhippes that came behinde, were alſo deſcried: the enemies were ſo afeard thereat, that they caſt about, and fled ſtraight. Alcibiades leauing his fleete, followed the chaſe with twenty of the beſt gallies he had, and draue them a land. Thereupon he landed alſo, and purſued them ſo couragiouſly at their heeles, that he ſlue a great number of thē on the maine land, who thought by flying to haue ſaued them ſelues. Moreouer, Mindarus, & Pharnabazus, being come out of the city to reſcue their people, were ouerthrowen both. He ſlue Mindarus in the field, fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS ſpoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and tooke beſides all their enemies ſhippes. After they tooke the city of CIZYCVM. Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being ſlaine, they had not only the poſſeſſion of the whole country of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemis by force out of all partes of the ſea. There were at that time certaine letters intercepted, whereby a ſecretary gaue aduertiſement vnto the Ephori at SPARTA, of the ouerthrow in this ſort. All is loſt, Mindarus is ſlaine, our people die for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the ſouldiers of ATHENS that had beene at this iourney and ouerthrow, grew to ſuch a pride and reputation of them ſelues, that they would not, and diſdained alſo to ſerue with the other ſouldiers that had bene beaten many times, & went away with the worſe. Where they to the contrary had neuer beene ouercome, as a litle before it happened, that the captaine Thraſyllus had bene ouerthrowen by the city of EPHESVS. And for this ouerthow, the EPHESIANS had ſet vp a triumph, and token of braſſe, to the vtter ſhame and ignominie of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades ſouldiers did verie much rebuke Thraſillus men, and did exceedingly extoll their captaine and them ſelues, and would neither encampe with them, neither haue to doe with them, nor yet keepe them companie. Vntill ſuch time as Pharnabazus came with a great armie againſt them, as well of footemen as horſemen, when they ran a forraging vpon the ABYDENIANS: and then Alcibiades went to the reſcue of them, and gaue Pharnabazus battell, and ouerthrew him once againe, and did together with Thraſyllus chaſe him euen vntill darke night. Then both Alcibiades and Thraſyllus ſouldiers did company together, one reioyſing with another: and ſo returned all with great ioy into one campe. The next morning Alcibiades ſet vp a triumph for the victorie hee had the daie before, and then went to ſpoile and deſtroy Pharnabazus countrey, where he was gouernor, and no man durſt once come out to meete him. In this rode there were taken priſoners, certaine prieſtes and Nuns of the countrey: but Alcibiades freely deliuered them afterwards without ranſome. And preparing to make wars againſt the CHALCEDONIANS, who were reuolted frõ the ATHENIANS, and had receiued a garriſon and gouernor of the LACEDÆMONIANS into their city: he was aduertiſed that they had brought in all their goods & cattels out of their fieldes, & had deliuered them to the ſafe cuſtody of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbors & friẽds. Hereupon he led his army into their borders, and ſent a herauld before to ſummon the BITHYNIANS, to make amends for the wrong they had done the ATHENIANS. The BITHYNIANS fearing leaſt Alcibiades would ſet vpon them, did ſtraight deliuer him the goods they had as before in their cuſtody, and moreouer, made a league with the ATHENIANS beſides. That done, he went and laid ſiege to the city of CHALCEDON, the which he enuironed all about from the one ſide of the ſea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thinking to haue raiſed the ſiege. And Hippocrates, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that was gouernour of the city, aſſembled all the force he was able to make within the ſame, and made a ſaly out alſo vpon the ATHENIANS at the very ſame time. Whereupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battell, ſo as they might giue charge vppon them both at one inſtant: hee fought ſo valiantly, that he forced Pharnabazus to run his way with ſhame enough, & ſlue Hippocrates in the field, with a great number of his men. Then tooke he the ſeas againe, to goe towards the countrey of HELLESPONT, to get ſome money, where vpon the ſodaine he did take the city of SELYBREA: becauſe he valiantly put him ſelfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certain of his friends within, with whom he had ſecret practiſe, had giuen him a token, that when time ſerued, they would ſhew a burning torch in the aire at midnight: but they were compelled to ſhew this fire in the aire before they were ready, for feare leaſt one of their confederacie would bewraie the matter, who ſodainely repented him. Now this torch burning in the aire, was ſet vp before Alcibiades was readie with his company. But hee perceiuing the ſigne ſet, tooke about thirtie men with him in his company, and ran with them to the wals of the city, hauing commaunded the reſt of his army to follow him with all ſpeede poſſible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirty men: beſides them there followed twenty other light armed men. Howbeit they were no ſooner entred the city, but they heard the citizens armed come againſt them: ſo that there was no hope to ſcape, if they did tarie their comming. Neuertheles, conſidering that vntill that preſent time he was neuer ouercome in battell, where he had taken charge, it grieued him verie much to flie: wherefore it ſtraight came in his head to make ſilence by ſound of trumpet, and after ſilence made, he cauſed one of them that were about him to make proclamation with a loude voice, that the SELYBRIANIANS ſhould not take armes againſt the ATHENIANS. This cooled them a litle that would faine haue beene doing, becauſe they ſuppoſed that all the army of the ATHENIANS had bene alreadie in the city: the other on the contrary ſide, were verie glad to talke of peace, without any further daunger. And as they beganne to parle vpon compoſition, the reſt of Alcibiades army was come on. Now he thinking in deede (which was true) that the SALYBRIANIANS ſought nothing but peace, & fearing leaſt the THRACIANS which were many in number (& came with good will to ſerue him in that iourney) would ſacke and ſpoile the citie, he made them all to goe out againe: and ſo concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt vpon their humble ſubmiſsion, but made them pay him a ſumme of money, and ſo leauing a garriſon of the ATHENIANS within the citie, he departed thence. Whileſt Alcibiades was in treatie with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that lay at the ſiege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he ſhould giue them a ſumme of money, and giue vp the towne into the ATHENIANS hands, to enioy it as they had before. And with expreſſe condition alſo, that the ATHENIANS ſhould make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurt or ſpoile any of his: and likewiſe ſhould be bound to giue good ſafe conduct vnto the ambaſſadours of the ATHENIANS, to go and come ſafe from time to time, to the King of PERSIA. The other captaines being ſworne to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned alſo that Alcibiades at his returne ſhould likewiſe be ſworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades ſaid he would not be ſworne at all, vnleſſe Pharnabazus were firſt ſworne for his part. Thus when othes were taken of either ſide, Alcibiades went alſo againſt thoſe of BYZANTIVM, who in like caſe had rebelled againſt the ATHENIANS. At his firſt comming thither, he enuironned the citie round about with a wall. Afterwards he practiſed with two ſecret friends of his, Anaxilaus & Lycurgus, & certain other within the citie, who promiſed him to deliuer it into his handes, ſo they might be aſſured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practiſe, he gaue it out, that he muſt needes leaue the ſiege, and depart with ſpeed, for certaine news that were come out of IONIA: & thereupon he imbarked preſently, and went out of the hauen at none daies with all his ſhips, howbeit he returned againe the ſame night. And going a land with the choiceſt and beſt armed men he had, he approached the walles of the citie, without any manner of noiſe, hauing left order with them that remained in the ſhips, that in the meane ſeaſon they ſhould rowe with all force into the hauen, with as great cries and ſhoutes as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies: partly to feare the BIZANTINES the more with their ſodaine comming among them, & partly that his confederates within the citie, might with better opportunitie receiue him and his companie, into the towne with the more aſſured ſafetie, whileſt euery man ran to the hauen, to reſiſt them that were vpon the gallies. Neuertheleſſe they went not away vnfought with. For thoſe that lay in garriſon within the citie, ſome of thē PELOPONNESIANS, other BOEOTIANS, & other MEGARIANS, did ſo valiantly repulſe them that came out of their gallies, that they draue them to retire abord againe. Afterwards hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred the city on the other ſide, they put themſelues in battell ray, & went to meet them. The battell was terrible of both parts: but Alcibiades in the end obtained victorie, leading the right wing of his battell, & Theramenes the left. The victory being gotten, he toke 300 of his enemies priſoners, who had eſcaped the furie of the battell. But after the battell, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither baniſhed, nor his goods confiſcated: becauſe it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his confederats, that neither he, nor his, ſhould hurt any of the BIZANTINES either in perſon of goods, nor any way ſhould riflle them. And Anaxilaus being afterwardes accuſed of treaſon in LACEDÆMON, for this practiſe: he anſwered and iuſtified himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that they could not find he had committed the fault laide vnto his charge. For he ſayd, that he was no LACEDÆMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: and that hee ſaw not LACEDÆMON in daunger, but BYZANTIVM, which the enemies had compaſſed about with a wall they had built, that it was vnpoſſible to bring any thing into the city. Moreouer he alledged, that they hauing very ſmall ſtore of corne within the city (as was true indeed) the PELOPONNESIANS, and BOEOTIANS, that laie there in garriſon did eate it vp, while the poore BYZANTINES them ſelues, their wiues and children, died for very hunger. Therefore it could not be ſaide of him, that he had betrayed his countrey, but rather that he had deliuered it from the miſeries and calamities the warres brought vpon it: wherein hee had followed the example of the honeſteſt men of LACEDÆMON, who did acknowledge nothing honeſt and iuſt, but that which was neceſſary and profitable for their country. The LACEDÆMONIANS hearing his reaſons he alledged for his purgation, were aſhamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him goe. Now Alcibiades deſirous in the end to ſee his natiue countrey againe (or to ſpeake more truely, that his countrimen ſhould ſee him) after he had ſo many times ouerthrowen their enemies in battell: he hoiſed ſaile and directed his courſe towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallies of the ATHENIANS, richly furniſhed and decked all about with skutchines & targets, and other armor & weapon gotten amongſt the ſpoiles of his enemis. Moreouer, he brought with him many other ſhips which he had wonne and broken in the warres, beſides many enſignes and other ornaments: all which being counted together one with the other, made vp the number of two hundred ſhips. Furthermore, where Duris SAMIAN writeth (who challengeth that he came of his houſe) that at his returne one Chryſogonus, an excellent plaier on the flute (that had wonne certaine of the Pythian games) did play ſuch a note, that at the ſound thereof the galley ſlaues would keepe ſtroke with their owers, and that Callipides another excellent player of tragedies, playing the part of a comedie, did ſtirre them to row, being in ſuch plaiers garments as euerie maſter of ſuch ſcience vſeth commonly to weare, preſenting himſelfe in Theater or ſtage before the people to ſhew his art: and that the admirall galley wherein him ſelfe was, entred the hauen with a purple ſaile, as if ſome maske had come into a mans houſe after ſome great banquet made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at all. Furthermore, me thinkes it ſhould not be true, that he returning from exile after ſo long a baniſhment, and hauing paſſed ouer ſuch ſorrowes and calamities as he had ſuſtained, would ſo proudly and preſumptuouſly ſhew himſelfe vnto the ATHENIANS. But merely contrarie, it is moſt certaine, that he returned in great feare and doubt. For when he was arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, he would not ſet foote a land, before he firſt ſaw his nephew Euryptolemus, and diuerſe other of his friends from the hatches of his ſhip, ſtanding vpon the ſandes in the hauen mouthe. Who were come thither to receiue and welcome him, and tolde him that he might be bolde to land, without feare of any thing. He was no ſooner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to ſee him, with ſo great loue and affection, that they tooke no heed of the other captaines that came with him, but cluſtred all to him onely, and cried out for ioy to ſee him. Thoſe that could come neere him, did welcome and imbrace him: but all the people wholly followed him. And ſome that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head: and thoſe that could not come neere him, ſaw him a far off, and the olde folkes did point him out to the yonger ſort. But this common ioy was mingled notwithſtanding, with teares and ſorow, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes & calamities, and to compare them with their preſent proſperitie: waying with themſelues alſo how they had not loſt SICILIA, nor their hope in all things els had failed them, if they had deliuered themſelues & the charge of their armie into Alcibiades hands, when they ſent for him to appeare in perſon before them. Conſidering alſo how he found the citie of ATHENS in manner put from the ſeigniorie and commaundement on the ſea, and on the other ſide how their force by land was brought vnto ſuch extreamitie, that ATHENS ſcantly could defend her ſuburbes, the city ſelfe being ſo deuided and turmoiled with ciuill diſſention: yet he gathered together thoſe few, and ſmall force that remained, and had not only reſtored ATHENS to her former power and ſouerainty on the ſea, but had made her alſo a conquerer by land. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, was paſt before by the people, at the inſtant requeſt of Callias, the ſonne of Callæſchrus, who did prefer it: as he him ſelfe did teſtifie in his elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembraunce of the good turne he had done him, ſaying:

I was the firſt that moued in open conference,
the peoples voice to call thee home, when thou wert baniſht hence.
So was I eke the firſt, which thereto gaue conſent,
and therefore may I boldly ſay, by truth of ſuch intent:
I was the onely meane, to call thee home againe,
by ſuch requeſt ſo rightly made, to moue the peoples vaine.
And this may ſerue for pledge, what friendſhip I thee beare:
faſt ſealed with a faithfull tongue, as plainely ſhall appeare.

But notwithſtanding, the people being aſſembled all in counſaile, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he firſt lamented all his miſhappes, and found him ſelfe grieued a litle with the wronges they had offered him, yet he imputed all in the end to his curſed ſed fortune, and ſome ſpightfull god that enuied his glorie and proſperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope their enemies had to haue aduantage of them: and therewithall perſwaded the people to be of good courage, and a feard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of golde, and choſe him generall againe of ATHENS, with ſoueraigne power & authority both by land and by ſea. And at that very inſtant it was decreed by the people, that hee ſhould be reſtored againe to his goods, and that the prieſtes Eumolpides ſhould abſolue him of all their curſes, and that the herauldes ſhould with open proclamation reuoke the execrations and curſings they had thundered out againſt him before, by commaundement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, ſauing Theodorus the Biſhop, who ſaide: I did neither excommunicate him, nor curſe him, if he hath done no hurt to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades flouriſhed in his chiefeſt proſperitie, yet were there ſome notwithſtanding that miſliked very much the time of his landing: ſaying it was very vnlucky and vnfortunate. For the verie day of his returne and arriuall, fell out by chaunce on the feaſt which they call Plynteria, as you would ſay, the waſhing day, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which day, the prieſtes that they call Praxiergides, do make certain ſecret and hidden ſacrifices and ceremonies, being the fiue and twentieth day of the moneth of September, and do take from the image of this goddeſſe, all her rayment and iewels, and keepe the image cloſe couered ouer. Hereupon the ATHENIANS do aſcribe that day, for a moſt vnfortunate day, and are very circumſpect to do any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly ſcanned abroade of euery body, that it ſeemed the goddeſſe was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that ſhe did hide her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe would not ſee him, nor haue him come neere her. Notwithſtanding all theſe toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found euery thing fall out well at his returne, and as he would haue wiſhed it: he armed a hundred galleys preſentlie, to returne againe to the warres. Howbeit he wiſely regarded the time and ſolemnitie of celebration of theſe myſteries, and conſiderately ſtaied vntill they had finiſhed all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDÆMONIANS had taken & fortified the citie of DECELEA, within the territorie of ATTICA, and that the enemies being the ſtronger in the field, did keepe the way going from ATHENS to ELEVSIN, ſo as by no poſſible meanes they could make their ſolemne proceſsiō by land, with ſuch honour and deuotion as they were before accuſtomed to do: and thereby all the ſacrifices, daunces, and many other holy deuoute ceremonies they were wonte to do by the way, in ſinging the holy ſonge of Iacchus, came of very neceſsitie to be left off, and cleane laide a ſide. Then Alcibiades thought he ſhould do a meritorious deed to the goddes, and an acceptable to men, to bring the olde ceremonies vp againe vpon the ſaid feaſt: and thereupon purpoſed to accompanie the proceſsion, & defend it by power againſt all inuaſion and diſturbance by the enemies. As one that foreſawe one of thoſe two things would come to paſſe. Either that Agis king of the LACEDÆMONIANS would not ſturre at all againſt the ſacred ceremonies, and by this meanes ſhould much imbaſe and diminiſh his reputation and glory: or if he did come out to the field, that he would make the battell very gratefull to the goddes, conſidering it ſhould be in defence of their moſt holy feaſt and worſhippe, and in the ſight of his countrey, where the people ſhould ſee and witneſſe both his valiantneſſe, and alſo his courage. Alcibiades being fully reſolued vpon this proceſſion, went and made the prieſts Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their miniſters and officers of theſe myſteries, priuy to his determination. Then he ſent out skoutes to watch on the ſide of the hilles thereabouts, and to view the way of their perambulation. The next morning very early hee ſent out light horſemen alſo to ſcowre the countrey. Then he made the prieſts, the profeſſed, and all the miniſters of religion, goe in proceſſion, together with thoſe that followed the ſame: and he him ſelfe compaſſed them about with his army on euery ſide, marching in battell ray, and verie good order, and with great ſilence. This was an honourable and deuout leading of an army, and ſuch as if his greateſt enemies would confeſſe a troth, they could not but ſay, Alcibiades had as much ſhewed the office of a high biſhoppe, as of a noble ſouldier and good captaine. So he ended this proceſſion, returning to ATHENS in all ſafe order againe, and not an enemy that durſt once looke out into the field to ſet vppon them. Now this did more increaſe the greatneſſe of his minde, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his ſufficiencie, and wiſe conduction of an armie: inſomuch as they thought him vnuincible, hauing the ſoueraigne power and authoritie of a generall. Furthermore, he ſpake ſo faire to the poore people, and meaner ſort, that they chiefely wiſhed & deſired he would take vpon him like a king: yea, and many went to him to perſwade him in it, as though he ſhould thereby withſtand all enuie, and driue away the lawes and cuſtomes of trying of matters by the voices of the people, and all ſuch fond deuiſes, as did deſtroy the ſtate of the common weale. And furthermore, they ſaid it was very needfull that he alone ſhould take vpon him the whole rule and gouernment of the citie, that he might diſpoſe all things according to his will, and not ſtande in feare of ſlaunderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades euer had any mind to vſurpe the kingdome, the matter is ſomewhat doubtfull. But this is certaine, the greateſt men of the citie fearing leaſt in deede he ment ſome ſuch thing, did haſten his departure as ſoone as they could poſſible, doing all other thinges according to his minde: and did aſſigne him ſuch aſſociates in his charge of generall, as he himſelfe beſt liked. So in the end he departed with a fleete of a hundred gallies, and firſt of all he fell with the Ile of ANDROS, where he ouercame by fight the inhabitants of the ſaid Ile, and certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that were amongeſt them: but he tooke not the citie, which was one of the firſt matters his enemies did accuſe him for. For if euer man was ouerthrowen and enuied for the eſtimation they had of his valure and ſufficiencie, truly Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and ſundrie ſeruices he had done, wonne him ſuch eſtimation of wiſedom and valiantneſſe, that where he ſlacked in any ſeruice whatſoeuer, he was preſently ſuſpected, iudging the ill ſucceſſe not in that he could not, but for that he would not: and that where he vndertooke any enterpriſe, nothing could withſtand or lie in his way. Hereupon the people perſwading themſelues, that immediatly after his departure, they ſhould heare that the Ile of CHIO was taken, with all the countrie of IONIA: they were angrie they could haue no newes ſo ſodainely from him as they looked for. Moreouer, they did not conſider the lacke of money he had, and ſpecially making warre with ſuch enemies, as were euer relieued with the great King of PERSIAES aide, and that for neceſsities ſake he was ſundrie times driuen to leaue his campe, to ſeeke money where he could get it, to pay his ſouldiers, and to maintaine his armie. Now for teſtimonie hereof, the laſt accuſation that was againſt him, was onely for this matter. Lyſander being ſent by the LACEDÆMONIANS for admirall and generall of their armie by ſea, vſed ſuch policie with Cyrus the king of PERSIAES brother, that he got into his hands a great ſumme of money: by meanes whereof he gaue vnto his mariners foure oboles a day for their wages, where before they were wonte to haue but three, and yet Alcibiades had much a doe to furniſh his with three onely a daye. For this cauſe, to get money, Alcibiades ſailed into CARIA. But in the meane time Antiochus, whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenant behinde him, and had giuen him charge of all the ſhippes in his abſence, being a very ſkilfull ſea man, but otherwiſe a haſtie harebraynd foole, and of ſmall capacity: hee being expreſly commaunded by Alcibiades not to fight in any caſe, though the enemies offered him battell, was ſo fooliſh raſhe, and made ſo litle reckoning of his ſtraight commaundement, that he armed his owne gally, whereof him ſelfe was captaine, and another beſides, and went to the city of EPHESVS, paſſing all along his enemies gallies, reuiling and offering villany to thoſe that ſtood vpon the hatches of their gallies. Lyſander being maruellouſly prouoked by theſe wordes, went and encountred him at the firſt with a few ſhippes. The other captaines of the gallies of the ATHENIANS, ſeeing Antiochus in daunger, went to aide him, one after another. Then Lyſander of his part alſo ſet out all his whole fleete againſt him, and in the end ouercame them, Antiochus ſelfe was killed in the conflict, and many gallies and men were taken priſoners: wherefore Lyſander ſet vp ſhewes of triumph in token of victory. Alcibiades hearing theſe ill fauoured news, returned preſently with all poſſible ſpeede to SAMOS: and when he came thither, he went with all the reſt of his fleete to offer Lyſander battell. But Lyſander quietly contenting himſelfe with his firſt victory: went not out againſt him. Now this victory was no ſooner won, but one Thraſybulus the ſonne of Thraſon, Alcibiades enemy, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS, to accuſe Alcibiades to the people: whom he informed how all went to wracke, and that he had loſt

loſt many ſhippes, for that he regarded not his charge, careleſſely putting men in truſt, whom he gaue too great credit to, becauſe they were good fellowes, and would drinke drunke with him, and were full of marriners mockes and knauiſh ieaſtes, ſuch as they vſe commonly amongſt themſelues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleaſure abroad, here and there, ſcraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheere, and feaſting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN courtiſans, when the enemies armie was ſo neere theirs as it was. Moreouer, they laide to his charge, that he did fortifie a caſtle in the countrie of THRACIA, neere vnto the citie BISANTHE, for a place to retire himſelfe vnto, either becauſe hee could not, or rather that he would not, liue any longer in his owne countrie. Vpon thoſe accuſations, the ATHENIANS giuing ouer credit to the report: did immediatly chuſe new captaines, and thereby declared their miſliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing leaſt they would doe him ſome worſe harme, did leaue ſtraight the ATHENIANS campe, and gathering a certaine number of ſtraungers together, went of himſelfe to make warre vpon certaine free people of the THRACIANS, who were ſubiect to no prince nor ſtate: where he got a maruellous maſſe of money together, by meanes whereof he did aſſure the GRECIANS inhabiting thoſe marches, from all inuaſion of forreine enemies. Now Tydeus, Menander, and Adimanthus the ATHENIANS captaines, being afterwardes in a place commonly called the goates riuer, with all the gallies the citie of ATHENS had at that time vppon that coaſt: vſed euerie morning commonly to goe to the ſea, to offer battell to Lyſander, who rode at an ancker before the city of Lampſacus, with all the LACEDÆMONIANS army by ſea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watch or warde, as men that were careleſſe of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the land not farre off, and finding their great fault and negligence: tooke his horſe, and went to them, and told them that they lay on an ill ſhore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driuen to ſeeke their vittels, as farre as to the city of SESTOS, and that they ſuffered their mariners to leaue their ſhippes, and goe a land when they lay at ancker, ſtraggling vp and downe the countrey as they would themſelues, without regard that there lay a great army of their enemies before them, readie to bee ſet out at their generals commaundement: and therefore hee aduiſed them to remoue thence, and to goe to caſt ancker before the city of SESTOS. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduiſed by him: and that which was worſt of all, Tydeus, one of the captaines, ſtoutly commaunded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to doe with the matter, and that other had charge of the army. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpoſe ſome treaſon againſt him, did depart preſently from them. And as hee went his way, he ſaide to ſome of his friends which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the ATHENIANS had not beene ſo round with him, he would haue forced the LACEDÆMONIANS to haue come to the battell in deſpight of their beardes, or elſe he would haue driuen them to forſake their ſhippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to haue done it, becauſe he could haue brought from land a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horſemen, with whom he might haue giuen a charge vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, and done great michiefe vnto their campe. But now, how wiſely Alcibiades did foreſee the faults he tolde the ATHENIANS captaines of: their great miſfortune and loſſe that followed incontinently, did too plainlie witneſſe it to the worlde. For Lyſander came ſo fiercely vpon them on a ſodaine, that of all the ſhips that they had in their whole fleete, onely eight galleys were ſaued, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much leſſe then two hundred in number, were euery one of them taken and caried away, with three thouſand priſoners whom Lyſander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the citie ſelfe of ATHENS, and raſed their long walles euen to the groud. After this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing ſore the LACEDÆMONIANS, who then without let or interruption of any, were only Lords and Princes by ſea and by land: he went into the countrie of BITHYNIA, and cauſed great good to be brought after him, and tooke a maruellous ſumme of money with him, beſides great riches he left alſo in the caſtels of THRACIA, where he did remaine before. Howbeit he loſt much of his goods in BITHYNIA, which certaine THRACIANS dwelling in that country, had robbed him of, & taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king Artaxerxes, hoping that when the king had once proued him, he ſhould find him a man of no leſſe ſeruice, then he had found Themiſtocles before him: beſides that the occaſion of his going thither, ſhould be much iuſter then his was. For he did not goe thither, to make warre againſt the citie of ATHENS and his countrie, as Themiſtocles did: but of a contrarie intent, to make interceſſion to the king, that it would pleaſe him to aide them. Now Alcibiades thinking he could vſe no better meane, then Pharnabazus helpe only, to ſee him ſafely conducted to the Kings court: he propoſed his iourney to him into the countrie of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certain time to attend vpon him, & was very honorably entertained and receiued of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS founde themſelues deſolate, and in miſerable ſtate to ſee their empire loſt: but then much more, when Lyſander had taken all their liberties, and did ſet thirtie gouernours ouer their citie.

Too late repentance of the Athenians.

Now too late, after all was loſt (where they might haue recouered againe, if they had bene wiſe) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miſeries and wretched ſtate, looking backe vpon all their wilfull faultes and follies committed: among which, they did reckon their ſecond time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greateſt fault. So they baniſhed him only of malice and diſpleaſure, not for any offence himſelfe in perſon had committed againſt them, ſauing that his lieutenant in his abſence had ſhamefully loſt a few of their ſhips: and they themſelues more ſhamefully had driuen out of their citie, the nobleſt ſouldier, and moſt skilfull captaine that they had. And yet they had ſome litle poore hope left, that they were not altogether caſt away, ſo long as Alcibiades liued, and had his health. For before, when he was a forſaken man, and led a baniſhed life: yet he could not liue idlely, and do nothing. Wherefore now much more, ſaid they to themſelues: if there be any helpe at all, he will not ſuffer out of doubt the inſolencie and pride of the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yet abide the cruelties and outrages of theſe thirtie tyrants. And ſurely the common people had ſome reaſon to haue theſe thoughts in their heads, conſidering that the 30 gouernors thẽſelues did what they could poſſibly to ſpy out Alcibiades doings, and what he went about. Inſomuch as Critias at the laſt, declared to Lyſander, that ſo long the LACEDÆMONIANS might reckon themſelues Lordes ouer all GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authoritie of the citie of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithſtanding the people of ATHENS could well away to liue like ſubiects vnder the gouernement of a fewe: yet Alcibiades whileſt he liued, would neuer ſuffer them ſo to be reigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuiſe he could to bring a change and innouation among them. Yet Lyſander would not credit theſe perſwaſions, before ſpeciall commandement was ſent to him from the Senate of LACEDÆMON, vpon his allegiance, that he ſhould deuiſe to kill Alcibiades by all meanes he could procure: either becauſe in trothe they feared the ſubtiltie of his wit, and the greatneſſe of his courage, to enterpriſe matters of great weight and danger, or elſe that they ſought to gratifie King Agis by it.

The Lacedæmonians will Lyſander to kill Alcibiades.

Lyſander being thus ſtraightly commaunded, did ſend and practiſe incontinently with Pharnabazus to execute the fact: who gaue his brother Magæas, and his vncle Suſamithres, commiſſion to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certaine village of PHRYGIA, with a concubine of his called Timandra.

Alcibiades dreame in Phrygia before his death.

So he thought hee dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how ſhee dandling him in her armes, had dreſſed his head, friſeling his haire, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other ſay, that he thought Magæus ſtrake off his head, and made his body to be burnt: and the voice goeth, this viſion was but a litle before his death. Thoſe that were ſent to kill him, durſt not enter the houſe where he was, but ſet it a fire round about. Alcibiades ſpying the fire, got ſuch apparell and hanginges as hee had, and threw it on the fire, thinking to haue put it out: and ſo caſting his cloke about his left arme, tooke his naked ſword in his other hand, and ranne out of the houſe, him ſelfe not once touched with fire, ſauing his clothes were a litle ſinged.

Theſe murderers ſo ſoone as they ſpied him, drew backe, and ſtoode a ſunder, and durſt not one of them come neare him, to ſtand and fight with him: but a farre off, they beſtowed ſo many arrowes and darts of him, that they killed him there.

Timandra the curtiſan buried Alcibiades.

Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his body which ſhee wrapped vp in the beſt linnen ſhee had, and buried him as honorably as ſhee could poſſible, with ſuch thinges as ſhe had, and could get together. Some holde opinion that Lais, the onely famous curtiſan, which they ſay was of CORINTHE (though indeede ſhee was borne in a litle towne of SICILIA, called HICCARA, where ſhe was taken) was his daughter. Notwithſtanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are ſome that agree to all the reſt I haue written, ſauing that they ſaye, it was neither Pharnabazus; nor Lyſander, nor the LACEDÆMONIANS, which cauſed him to be ſlaine: but that he keeping with a yong gentlewoman of a noble houſe, whom he had ſtolẽ away, and intiſed to follie: her bretheren to reuenge this iniurie, went to ſet fire vpon the houſe where he was, and that they killed him as we haue tolde you, thinking to leape out of the fire.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS Martius Coriolanus.

PA. RO.
CORIOLANVS

THE houſe of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which hath ſprong many noble perſonages, whereof Ancus Martius was one, king Numaes daughters ſonne, who was king of ROME after Tullus Hoſtilius. Of the ſame houſe were Publius, & Quintus, who brought to ROME their beſt water they had by conduites. Cenſorinus alſo came of that familie, that was ſo ſurnamed, becauſe the people had choſen him Cenſor twiſe. Through whoſe perſuaſion they made a lawe, that no man from thenceforth might require, or enioy the Cenſorſhippe twiſe. Caius Martius, whoſe life we intend now to write, being left an orphan by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widowe, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many diſcommodities to a childe, but doth not hinder him to become an honeſt man, and to excell in vertue aboue the common ſorte: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully doe complaine, that it is the occaſion of their caſting awaye, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to ſee them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man alſo is a good proofe to confirme ſome mens opinions. That a rare and excellent witte vntaught, doth bring forth many good and euill thinges together: like a fat ſoile bringeth forth herbes & weedes that lieth vnmanured. For this Martius naturall wit and great hart did maruellouſly ſturre vp his courage to doe and attempt notable actes. But on the other ſide for lacke of education, he was ſo chollericke and impacient, that he would yeeld to no liuing creature: which made him churliſhe, vnciuil, and altogether vnfit for any mans conuerſation. Yet men maruelling much at his conſtancie, that he was neuer ouercome with pleaſure, nor money, and how he would endure eaſilie all manner of paines and trauailles: thereupon they well liked and commended his ſtowtnes and temperancie. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one cittizen vſeth to be with another in the cittie. His behauiour was ſo vnpleaſant to them by reaſon of a certaine inſolent and ſterne manner he had, which becauſe it was too lordly, was diſliked. And to ſay truly, the greateſt benefite that learning bringeth men vnto, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compaſſe and rule of reaſon, to be ciuill and curteous, & to like better the meane ſtate, then the higher. Now in thoſe dayes, valiantnes was honoured in ROME aboue all other vertues: which they call virtus, by the name of vertue it ſelfe, as including in that generall name, all other ſpeciall vertues beſides. So that virtus in the Latin, was as much as valiantneſſe. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time: beganne from his childehood to giue himſelfe to handle weapons, and dayly did excerciſe himſelfe therein. And outward he eſteemed armour to no purpoſe, vnles one were naturally armed within. Moreouer he did ſo excerciſe his bodie to hardnes and all kind of actiuitie, that he was very ſwift in running, ſtrong in wreſtling, & mightie in griping, ſo that no man could euer caſt him. Inſomuch as thoſe that would trie maſteries with him for ſtrengh and nimblenes, would ſaye when they were ouercome: that al was by reaſon of his natural ſtrengh, and hardnes of warde, that neuer yeelded to any paine or toyle he tooke vpon him. The firſt time he went to the warres, being but a ſtripling, was when Tarquine ſurnamed the prowde (that had bene king of ROME, and was driuen out for his pride, after many attemptes made by ſundry battelles to come in againe, wherein he was euer ouercome (did come to ROME, with all the ayde of the LATINES, & many other people of ITALIE: euen as it were to ſet vp his whole reſt vpon a battell by them, who with a great & mightie armie had vndertaken to put him into his kingdome againe, not ſo much to pleaſure him, as to ouerthrow the power of the ROMAINES, whoſe greatnes they both feared and enuied. In this battell, wherein were many hotte and ſharpe encounters of either partie, Martius valliantly fought in the ſight of the Dictator: & a ROMAINE ſouldier being thrown to the groũd euen harde by him, Martius ſtraight beſtrid him, and ſlew the enemie with his owne handes that had before ouerthrown the ROMAINE. Hereupon, after the battell was wonne, the Dictator did not forget ſo noble an acte, and therefore firſt of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oken boughs. For whoſoeuer ſaueth the life of a ROMAINE, it is a mãner among them, to honour him with ſuch a garland. This was, either becauſe the lawe did this honour to the oke, in fauour of the ARCADIANS, who by the oracle of Apollo were in olde time called eaters of akornes: or elſe becauſe the ſouldiers might eaſily in euery place come by oken boughes: or laſtly, becauſe they thought it very neceſſarie, to giue him that had ſaued a cittizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of their citties, and thought amongſt other wilde trees to bring forth a profitable frute, and of plantes to be the ſtrongeſt. Moreouer, men at the firſt beginning did vſe akornes for their bread, and honie for their drinke: and further, the oke did feede their beaſtes, and giue them birdes, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made birdlime to catch ſeely birdes. They ſaye that Caſtor, and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and how incontinently after the battell, men ſawe them in the market place at ROME, all their horſes being on a white fome: and they were the firſt that brought newes of the victorie, euen in the ſame place, where remaineth at this preſent a tẽple built in the honour of them neere vnto the fountaine. And this is the cauſe, why the day of this victorie (which was the fifteenth of Iuly) is conſecrated yet to this day vnto Caſtor and Pollux. Moreouer it is daily ſeene, that honour and reputation lighting on yong men before their time, and before they haue no great courage by nature: the deſire to winne more, dieth ſtraight in them, which eaſily happeneth, the ſame hauing no deepe roote in them before. Where contrarie wiſe, the firſt honour that valliant mindes do come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, haſting them forward as with

force of winde, to enterpriſe thinges of high deſeruing praiſe. For they eſteeme not, to receiue reward for ſeruice done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them doe better in time to come: and be aſhamed alſo to caſt their honour at their heeles, not ſeeking to increaſe it ſtill by like deſert of worthie valiant deedes. This deſire being bred in Martius, he ſtrained ſtill to paſſe himſelfe in manlines: and being deſirous to ſhew a daylie increaſe of his valiantneſſe, his noble ſeruice did ſtill aduance his fame, bringing in ſpoyles vpon ſpoyles from the enemie. Whereupon, the captaines that came afterwards (for enuie of them that went before) did contend who ſhould moſt honour him, and who ſhould beare moſt honorable teſtimonie of his valiantnes. Inſomuch the ROMAINES hauing many warres and battells in thoſe dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence he returned not without ſome reward of honour. And as for other, the only reſpect that made them valiant, was they hoped to haue honour: but touching Martius, the onely thing that made him to loue honour, was the ioy he ſawe his mother did take of him. For he thought nothing made him ſo happie and honorable, as that his mother might heare euerie body praiſe and commend him, that ſhee might alwayes ſee him returne with a crowne vpon his head, and that ſhe might ſtill imbrace him with teares running downe her cheekes for ioye. Which deſire they ſay Epaminondas did auow, and confeſſe to haue beene in him: as to thinke himſelfe a moſt happie and bleſſed man, that his father and mother in their life time had ſeene the victorie he wanne in the plaine of LEVCTRES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good happe, to haue his father and mother liuing, to be partakers of his ioye and proſperitie. But Martius thinking all due to his mother, that had bene alſo due to his father if he had liued: did not only content himſelfe to reioyce and honour her, but at her deſire tooke a wife alſo, by whome he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers houſe therefore. Now he being growen to great credit & authoritie in ROME for his valiantnes, it fortuned there grewe ſedition in the cittie, becauſe the Senate did fauour the rich againſt the people, who did complaine of the ſore oppreſſion of vſurers, of whom they borrowed money. For thoſe that had litle, were yet ſpoyled of that litle they had by their creditours, for lacke of abilitie to paye the vſurie: who offered their goodes to be ſolde to them that would giue moſt. And ſuch as had nothing left, their bodies were layed hold on, and they were made their bondmen, notwithſtanding all the woundes and cuttes they ſhewed, which they had receiued in many battells, fighting for defence of their countrie and common wealth: of the which, the laſt warre they made was againſt the SABINES, wherein they fought vpon the promiſe the rich men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate them more gently and alſo vpon the word of Marcus Valerius chiefe of the Senate, who by authoritie of the Counſell, & in the behalfe of the rich, ſayed they ſhould performe that they had promiſed. But after that they had faithfully ſerued in this laſt battell of all, where they ouercame their enemies, ſeeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would giue no eare to them, but made as though they had forgotten their former promiſe, and ſuffered them to be made ſlaues and bondemen to their creditours, and beſides, to be turned out of all that euer they had: they fell then euen to flat rebellion and mutinie, and to ſturre vp daungerous tumults within the cittie. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion did ſtraight enter the territories of ROME with a maruellous great power, ſpoyling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that all thoſe that were of lawfull age to carie weapon, ſhould come and enter their names into the muſter maſters booke, to goe to the warres: but no man obeied their commaundement. Whereupon their chiefe magiſtrates, and many of the Senate, began to be of diuers opinions among themſelues. For ſome thought it was reaſon, they ſhould ſomewhat yeelde to the poore peoples requeſt, and that they ſhould a litle qualifie the ſeueritie of the lawe. Other held hard againſt that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alleaged, that the creditours loſing their money they had lent, was not the worſt thing that was thereby: but that the lenitie that was fauored, was a beginning of diſobedience, and that the proude attempt of the communaltie, was to aboliſh law, and to bring all to confuſion. Therefore he ſayed, if the Senate were wiſe, they ſhould betimes preuent and quench this ill fauored & worſe ment beginning. The Senate met many dayes in conſultation about it: but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore common people ſeeing no redreſſe, gathered themſelues one day together, and one encoraging another, they all forſooke the cittie, and encamped themſelues vpon a hill, called at that daye the holy hill, alongeſt the riuer of Tyber, offring no creature any hurt or violence, or making any ſhewe of actuall rebellion: ſauing that they cried as they went vp and downe, that the rich men had driuen them out of the cittie, and that all ITALIE through they ſhould find aire, water, and ground to burie them in. Moreouer, they ſayd, to dwell at ROME was nothing elſe but to be ſlaine, or hurt with continuall warres, and fighting for defence of the rich mens goodes. The Senate being aſeard of their departure, did ſend vnto them certaine of the pleaſanteſt olde men, and the most acceptable to the people among them. Of thoſe Menenius Agrippa was he, who was ſent for chieſe man of the meſſage from the Senate. He, after many good perſuaſions and gentle requeſtes made to the people, on the behalſe of the Senate: knit vp his oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner. That on a time all the members of mans body did rebell againſt the bellie, complaining of it, that it onely remained in the middeſt of the bodie, without doing any thing, neither did beare any labour to the maintenaunce of the reſt: whereas all other partes and members did labour paynefully, & were very carefull to ſatiſfie the appetites and deſires of the bodie. And ſo the bellie, all this notwithſtanding laughed at their follie, and ſayed. It is true, I firſt receiue all meates that noriſh mans bodie: but afterwardes I ſend it againe to the noriſhment of other partes of the ſame. Euen ſo (quoth he) ô you, my maiſters, and cittizens of ROME: the reaſon is alike betweene the Senate & you. For matters being wel digeſted, & their counſells throughly examined, touching the benefite of the common wealth: the Senatours are cauſe of the common cõmoditie that cõmeth vnto euery one of you. Theſe perſuaſions pacified the people, conditionally, that the Senate would graunt there ſhould be yerely choſen fiue magiſtrates, which they now call Tribuni plebis, whoſe office ſhould be to defend the poore people from violence and oppreſſion. So Iunius Brutus, and Sicinius Vellutus, were the firſt Tribunes of the people that were choſen, who had onely bene the cauſers & procurers of this ſedition. Hereupon the citie being grown againe to good quiet and vnitie, the people immediately went to the warres, ſhewing that they had a good will to do better then euer they did, and to be very willing to obey the magiſtrates in that they would commaund, concerning the warres. Martius alſo, though it liked him nothing to ſee the greatnes of the people thus increaſed, conſidering, it was to the preiudice, and imbaſing of the nobilitie, and alſo ſawe that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as himſelſe: he did perſuade the Patricians, to ſhew themſelues no leſſe forward and willing to fight for their countrie, then the common people were: and to let them know by their deedes and actes, that they did not ſo much paſſe the people in power and riches, as they did exceede them in true nobilitie and valiantneſſe. In the countrie of the VOLSCES againſt whom the ROMAINES made war at that time, there was a principall cittie & of moſt fame, that was called CORIOLES, before the which the Conſul Cominius did laye ſiege. Wherefore al the other VOLSCES fearing leaſt that cittie ſhould be taken by aſſault, they came from all partes of the countrie to ſaue it, entending to giue the ROMAINES battell before the cittie, and to giue an onſet on them in two ſeuerall places. The Conſul Cominius vnderſtanding this, deuided his armie alſo into two partes, and taking the one part with himſelſ, he marched towards them that were drawing to the cittie, out of the countrie: and the other part of his armie he left in the campe with Titus Latius (one of the valianteſt men the ROMAINES had at that time) to reſiſt thoſe that would make any ſaly out of the cittie vpon them. So the CORIOLANS making ſmall accompt of them that laye in campe before the cittie, made a ſalye out vpon them, in the which at the firſt the CORIOLANS had the better, and draue the ROMAINES backe againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, running out of the campe with a fewe men with him, he ſlew the firſt enemies he met withal, and made the reſt of them ſtay vpon the ſodain, crying out to the ROMAINES that had turned their backes, and calling them againe to fight with a loud voyce. For he was euen ſuch another, as Cato would haue a ſouldier and a captaine to be, not only terrible, and fierce to lay about him, but to make the enemie aſearde with the ſounde of his voyce, and grimnes of his countenance. Then there flocked about him immediately, a great number of ROMAINES: whereat the enemies were ſo afeard, that they gaue backe preſently. But Martius not ſtaying ſo, did chaſe and followe them to their owne gates, that fled for life. And there perceiuing that the ROMAINES retired backe, for the great number of dartes and arrowes which flew about their eares frõ the walles of the cittie, & that there was not one man amongeſt them that durſt venter himſelfe to follow the flying enemies into the cittie, for that it was full of men of warre, very well armed, and appointed: he did encorage his fellowes with wordes and deedes, crying out to them, that fortune had opened the gates of the cittie, more for the followers thẽ the flyers. But all this notwithſtanding, few had the hartes to follow him. Howbeit Martius being in the throng among the enemies, thruſt himſelfe into the gates of the cittie, and entred the ſame among them that fled, without that any one of them durſt at the firſt turne their face vpon him, or elſe offer to ſtay him. But he looking about him, & ſeeing he was entred the cittie with very fewe men to helpe him, and perceiuing he was enuironed by his enemies that gathered round about to ſet vpon him: did thinges as it is written, wonderfull and incredible, aſwell for the force of his hand, as alſo for the agilitie of his body, and with a wonderfull corage and valiantnes, he made a lane through the middeſt of them, and ouerthrew alſo thoſe he layed at: that ſome he made runne to the furtheſt part of the cittie and other for feare he made yeeld themſelues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Martius that was gotten out, had ſome leiſure to bring the ROMAINES with more ſafetie into the cittie. The cittie being taken in this ſorte, the moſt part of the ſouldiers beganne incontinently to ſpoile, to carry away, and to looke vp the bootie they had wonne.

But Martius was maruellous angry with them, and cryed out of them, that it was no time now to looke after ſpoyle, and to runne ſtragling heere and there to enrich themſelues, whileſt the other Conſul and their fellowe cittizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and how that leauing the ſpoyle, they ſhould ſeeke to winde them ſelues out of daunger and perill. Howbeit crie, and ſaye, to them what he could, very fewe of them would harken to him. Wherefore taking thoſe that willingly offered themſelues to followe him, he went out of the cittie, and tooke his waye towardes that part, where he vnderſtoode the reſt of the armie was: exhorting and intreating them by the waye that followed him not to be fainte harted, and ofte holding vp his handes to heauen, he beſought the goddes to be gracious and fauorable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, and in a good houre to hazarde his life in defence of his countrie-men. Now the ROMAINES when they were put in battell raye, and readye to take their targettes on their armes, and to girde them vpon their arming coates, had a cuſtome to make their willes at that very inſtant, without any manner of writing, naming him only whom they would make their heir in the preſence of three or foure witneſſes.

Martius came iuſt to that reckoning, whileſt the ſouldiers were doing after that ſorte, and that the enemies were approached ſo neere, as one ſtoode in viewe of the other. When they ſawe him at his firſt comming, all blouddy, and in a ſwet, and but with a fewe men following him: ſome thereupon beganne to be afeard. But ſoone after, when they ſawe him runne with a liuely cheere to the Conſul, and to take him by the hande, declaring howe he had taken the cittie of CORIOLES, and that they ſawe the Conſul Cominius alſo kiſſe and imbrace him: then there was not a man but tooke harte againe to him, and beganne to be of a good courage, ſome hearing him report from poynt to poynt, the happie ſucceſſe of this exployte, and other alſo coniecturing it by ſeeing their geſtures a farre off. Then they all beganne to call vpon the Conſul to martch forward, and to delaye no longer but to giue charge vpon the enemie. Martius asked him howe the order of their enemies battell was, and on which ſide they had placed their beſt fighting men.

By Coriolanus meanes, the Volſci were ouercome in battell.

The Conſul made him aunſwer, that he thought the bandes which were in the vowarde of their battell, were thoſe of the ANTIATES, whom they eſteemed to be the warlikeſt men, and which for valiaunt corage would giue no place, to any of the hoſte of their enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be ſet directly againſt them. The Conſul granted him, greatly prayſing his courage. Then Martius, when both armies came almoſt to ioyne, aduaunced himſelfe a good ſpace before his companie, and went ſo fiercely to giue charge on the voward that came right againſt him, that they could ſtand no longer in his handes: hee made ſuch a lane through them, and opened a paſſage into the battell of the enemies. But the two winges of either ſide turned one to the other, to compaſſe him in betweene them: which the Conſul Cominius perceiuing, he ſent thither ſtraight of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruellous bloudie about Martius, and in a very ſhorte ſpace many were ſlaine in the place. But in the end the ROMAINES were ſo ſtrong, that they diſtreſſed the enemies, and brake their arraye: and ſcattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, becauſe they ſawe he was able to doe no more, he was alreadie ſo wearied with the great paine he had taken, and ſo fainte with the great woundes he had vpon him. But Martius aunſwered them, that it was not for conquerours to yeelde, nor to be fainte harted: and thereupon beganne a freſhe to chaſe thoſe that fledde, vntill ſuch time as the armie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowne, and numbers of them ſlaine and taken priſoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Conſul, and the other ROMAINES with him. There the Conſul Cominius going vp to his chayr of ſtate, in the preſence of the whole armie, gaue thankes to the goddes for ſo great, glorious, and proſperous a victorie: then he ſpake to Martius, whoſe valiantneſſe he commended beyond the moone, both for that he himſelfe ſawe him do with his eyes, as alſo for that Martius had reported vnto him. So in the ende he willed Martius, that he ſhould chooſe out of all the horſes they had taken of their enemies, and of all their goodes they had wonne (whereof there was great ſtore) tenne of euerie ſorte which he liked beſt, before any diſtribution ſhould be made to other. Beſides this great honourable offer he had made him, he gaue him in teſtimonie that he had wonne that daye the price of proweſſe aboue all other, a goodly horſe with a capariſon, and all furniture to him: which the whole armie beholding, did maruellouſly praiſe and commend. But Martius ſtepping forth, told the Conſull, he moſt thankefully accepted the gift of his horſe, and was a glad man beſides, that his ſeruice had deſerued his generalles commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenarie rewarde, then an honorable recompence, he would haue none of it, but was contented to haue his equall part with other ſouldiers. Onely, this grace (ſayed he) I craue and beſeech you to graunt me. Among the VOLSCES there is an olde friend and hoaſt of mine, an honeſt wealthie man, and nowe a priſoner, who liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrie, liueth nowe a poore priſoner, in the hands of his enemies: and yet notwithſtanding all this his miſerie and misfortune, it would do me great pleaſure if I could ſaue him from this one danger: to keepe him from being ſolde as a ſlaue. The ſouldiers hearing Martius wordes, made a maruellous great ſhoute among them: and there were more that wondred at his great contentation and abſtinence, when they ſawe ſo litle couetouſnes in him, then they were that highly praiſed and extolled his valiantnes. For euen they themſelues, that did ſomewhat malice and enuie his glorie, to ſee him thus honoured, and paſſingly prayſed did thinke him ſomuch the more worthie of an honorable recompence for his valiant ſeruice, as the more careleſly he refuſed the great offer made vnto him for his profitte: and they eſteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuſe ſuch rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as vnto a worthie perſon. For it is farre more commendable, to vſe riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to deſire them then to vſe them well. After this ſhoute and noyſe of the aſſembly was ſomewhat appeaſed, the Conſul Cominius beganne to ſpeake in this ſorte. We cannot compell Martius to take theſe giftes wee offer him if he will not receiue them: but we will giue him ſuch a reward for the noble ſeruice he hath done, as he cannot refuſe. Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, vnleſſe his valiant actes haue wonne him that name before our nomination. And ſo euer ſince, he ſtill bare the third name of Coriolanus. And therby it appeareth, that the firſt name the ROMAINES haue, as Caius: was our Chriſtian name now. The ſecond as Martius: was the name of the houſe and familie they came of. The third, was ſome addition giuen, either for ſome acte or notable ſeruice, or for ſome marke on their face, or of ſome ſhape of their bodie, or elſe for ſome ſpeciall vertue they had. Euen ſo did the GRECIANS in olde time giue additions to Princes, by reaſon of ſome notable acte worthie memorie. As when they haue called ſome, Soter and Callinicos: as much to ſay ſauiour and conquerour. Or elſe of ſome notable apparant marke on ones face,or on his bodie,they haue called him Phiſcon,and Grypos:as ye would ſay,gorebelly,and hooke noſed: or elſe for ſome vertue,as Euergetes,and Phyladelphos: to wit, a benefactour,and louer of his brethren. Or otherwiſe for ones great felicitie, as Eudæmon: as much to ſay,as fortunate. For ſo was the ſecond of the* Battes ſurnamed. And ſome Kings haue had ſurnames of ieaſt and mockerie. As one of the Antigones that was called Doſon, to ſay, the Giuer: who was euer promiſing,and neuer giuing. And one of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to ſay, conceitiue. The ROMAINES vſe more then any other nation, to giue names of mockerie in this ſort. As there was one Metellus ſurnamed Diadematus, the banded: becauſe he caried a band about his head of long time,by reaſon of a ſore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne familie was called Celer: the quick flie. Becauſe a few dayes after the death of his father,he ſhewed the people the cruell fight of fenſers at vnrebated ſwords,which they found wonderfull for the ſhortneſſe of time. Other had their ſurnames deriued of ſome accident of their birth. As to this day they call him Proculeius,that is borne,his father being in ſome far voyage: and him Poſthumius,that is borne after the death of his father. And when of two brethren twins,the one doth die,and the other ſuruiueth: they call the ſuruiuer,Vopiſcus. Somtimes alſo they giue ſurnames deriued of ſome marke or misfortune of the body. As Sylla, to ſay,crooked noſed: Niger,blacke: Rufus,red: Cæcus,blinde: Claudus lame. They did wiſely in this thing to accuſtome men to thinke, that neither the loſſe of their ſight, nor other ſuch misfortunes as may chaunce to men, are any ſhame or diſgrace vnto them, but the manner was to aunſwer boldly to ſuch names,as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit theſe matters would be better amplified in other ſtories then this. Now when this warre was ended, the flatterers of the people began to ſturre vp ſedition againe, without any new occaſion,or iuſt matter offered of complaint. For they did ground this ſecond inſurrection againſt the Nobilitie and Patricians, vpon the peoples miſerie and misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reaſon of the former diſcorde and ſedition betweene them and the Nobilitie. Becauſe the moſt part of the arable land within the territorie of ROME,was become heathie and barren for lacke of plowing, for that they had no time nor meane to cauſe corne to be brought them out of other countries to ſowe,by reaſon of their wars which made the extreame dearth they had among them. Now thoſe buſie pratlers that ſought the peoples good will, by ſuch flattering words,perceiuing great ſcarſitie of corne to be within the citie, and though there had bene plenty enough,yet the common people had no money to buie it: they ſpread abroad falſe tales and rumors againſt the Nobilitie, that they in reuenge of the people, had practiſed and procured the extreame dearth among them. Furthermore,in the middeſt of this ſtur,there came ambaſſadours to ROME from the citie of VELITRES, that offered vp their citie to the ROMAINES,and praied them they would ſend new inhabitants to repleniſh the ſame: becauſe the plague had bene ſo extreame among them,and had killed ſuch a number of them, as there was not left aliue the tenth perſon of the people that had bene there before. So the wiſe men of ROME began to thinke, that the neceſſitie of the VELITRIANS fell out in a moſt happy houre, and how by this occaſion it was very meete in ſo great a ſcarſitie of victuals,to diſburden ROME of a great number of citizens: and by this meanes aſwell to take away this new ſedition, and vtterlie to rid it out of the citie, as alſo to cleare the ſame of many mutinous and ſeditious perſons, being the ſuperfluous ill humours that greeuouſlie fedde this diſeaſe. Hereupon the Conſuls prickt out all thoſe by a bill, whom they intended to ſend to VELITRES, to go dwell there as in forme of a colonie: and they leauied out of all the reſt that remained in the citie of ROME, a great number to go againſt the VOLSCES, hoping by the meanes of forraine warre, to pacifie their ſedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the riche, and the meane ſorte with the Nobilitie, ſhould by this deuiſe be abroad in the warres, and in one campe, and in one ſeruice, and in one like danger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two ſeditious Tribunes,ſpake againſt either of theſe deuiſes, and cried out vpon the noble men, that vnder the gentle name of a colonie: they would cloake and colour the moſt cruell and vnnaturall fact as might be: becauſe they ſent their poore citizens into a ſore infected citie and peſtilent ayre, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there alſo to dwell vnder the tuition of a ſtrange god, that had ſo cruelly perſecuted his people. This were (ſaid they) euen as much, as if the Senate ſhould headlong caſt downe the people into a moſt bottomleſſe pit. And are not yet contented to haue famiſhed ſome of the poore citizens heretofore to death, and to put other of them euen to the mercie of the plague: but a freſh, they haue procured a voluntarie warre, to the end they would leaue behinde no kinde of miſerie and ill, wherewith the poore ſillie people ſhould not be plagued, and onely becauſe they are wearie to ſerue the riche. The common people being ſet on a broile and brauerie with theſe wordes, would not appeare when the Conſuls called their names by a bill, to preſt them for the warres, neither would they be ſent out to this new colonie: in ſo much as the Senate knewe not well what to ſay or do in the matter. Martius then, who was now growne to great credit, and a ſtoute man beſides, and of great reputation with the nobleſt men of ROME, roſe vp, and openly ſpake againſt theſe flattering Tribunes. And for the repleniſhing of the citie of VELITRES, he did compell thoſe that were choſen, to go thither, and to depart the citie, vpon great penalties to him that ſhould diſobey: but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or conſtrained. So Martius taking his friends and followers with him, and ſuch as he could by faire words intreate to go with him, did runne certaine forreys into the dominion of the ANTIATES, where he met with great plentie of corne, and had a maruellous great ſpoile, aſwell of cattell, as of men he had taken priſoners, whom he brought away with him, and reſerued nothing for himſelfe. Afterwards, hauing brought backe againe all his men that went out with him, ſafe and ſound to ROME, and euery man riche and loden with ſpoile: then the home-tarriers and houſe-doues that kept ROME ſtill, began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him, and ſo enuied both them that had ſped ſo well in this iourney, and alſo of malice to Martius, they ſpighted to ſee his credit and eſtimation increaſe ſtill more and more, becauſe they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortly after this, Martius ſtood for the Conſulſhip: and the common people fauoured his ſute, thinking it would be a ſhame to them to denie, and refuſe the chiefeſt noble man of bloud, and moſt worthie perſon of ROME, and ſpecially him that had done ſo great ſeruice and good to the commonwealth. For the cuſtome of ROME was at that time, that ſuch as did ſue for any office, ſhould for certaine dayes before be in the market place, onely with a poore gowne on their backes, and without any coate vnderneath, to pray the cittizens to remember them at the day of election: which was thus deuiſed, either to moue the people the more, by requeſting them in ſuch meane apparell, or elſe becauſe they might ſhew them their wounds they had gotten in the warres in the ſeruice of the commonwealth, as manifeſt markes and teſtimonie of their valiantneſſe. Now it is not to be thought that the ſuters went thus loſe in a ſimple gowne in the market place, without any coate vnder it, for feare, and ſuſpition of the common people: for offices of dignitie in the citie were not then giuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and ſelling fell out in election of officers, and that the voices of the electours were bought for money. But after corruption had once gotten way into the election of offices, it hath runne from man to man, euen to the very ſentence of iudges, and alſo among captaines in the warres: ſo as in the ende, that onely turned common wealths into Kingdomes, by making armes ſubiect to money. Therefore me thinkes hee had reaſon that ſaied: hee that firſt made banckets, and gaue money to the common people, was the firſt that tooke away authoritie, and deſtroyed commonwealth. But this peſtilence crept in by litle and litle, and did ſecretly winne ground ſtill, continuing a long time in ROME, before it was openly knowne and diſcouered. For no man can tell who was the firſt man that bought the peoples voices for money, nor that corrupted the ſentence of the iudges. Howbeit at ATHENS ſome holde opinion, that Anytus, the ſonne of Anthemion, was the firſt that fedde the iudges with money, about the ende of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, being accuſed of treaſon for yeelding vp the forte of PYLE, at that time, when the golden and vnſoiled age remained yet whole in iudgement at ROME. Now Martius following this cuſtome, ſhewed many woundes and cuts vpon his bodie, which he had receiued in ſeuenteene yeares ſeruice at the warres, and in many ſundrie battels, being euer the foremoſt man that did ſet out feete to fight. So that there was not a man among the people, but was aſhamed of himſelfe, to refuſe ſo valiant a man: and one of them ſaid to another, we muſt needes chooſe him Conſull, there is no remedie. But when the day of election was come, and that Martius came to the market place with great pompe, accompanied with all the Senate, and the whole Nobilitie of the citie about him, who ſought to make him Conſull, with the greateſt inſtance and intreatie they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and good will of the common people, turned ſtraight to an hate and enuie toward him, fearing to put this office of ſoueraigne authoritie into his hands, being a man ſomewhat partiall toward the nobilitie, and of great credit and authoritie amongſt the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the libertie from the people. Whereupon for theſe conſiderations, they refuſed Martius in the end, and made two other that were ſuters, Conſuls. The Senate being maruellouſly offended with the people, did accompt the ſhame of this refuſall, rather to redound to themſelues, then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worſe parte then the Senate, and was out of all pacience. For he was a man too full of paſſion and choller, and too much giuen to ouer ſelfe will and opinion, as one of a high minde and great courage, that lacked the grauitie, and affabilitie that is gotten with iudgement of learning and reaſon, which onely is to be looked for in a gouernour of ſtate: and that remembred not how wilfulneſſe is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a commonwealth for pleaſing ſhould ſhun, being that which Plato called ſolitarineſſe. As in the end, all men that are wilfully giuen to a ſelfe opinion and obſtinate minde, and who will neuer yeeld to others reaſon, but to their owne: remaine without companie, and forſaken of all men. For a man that will liue in the world, muſt needs haue patience, which luſtie blouds make but a mocke at. So Martius being a ſtoute man of nature, that neuer yeelded in any reſpect, as one thinking that to ouercome alwaies, and to haue the vpper hand in all matters, was a token of magnanimitie, and of no baſe and faint courage, which ſpitteth out anger from the moſt weake and paſsioned part of the heart, much like the matter of an impoſtume: went home to his houſe, full fraighted with ſpight and malice againſt the people, being accompanied with all the luſtieſt young gentlemen, whoſe mindes were nobly bent, as thoſe that came of noble race, and commonly vſed for to follow and honour him. But then ſpecially they flockt about him, and kept him companie, to his much harme: for they did but kindle and inflame his choller more and more, being ſorie with him for the iniurie the people offered him, becauſe he was their captaine and leader to the warres, that taught them all marſhall diſcipline, and ſtirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valiantneſſe, and yet without enuie, praiſing them that deſerued beſt. In the meane ſeaſon, there came great plentie of corne to ROME, that had bene bought, part in ITALIE, and part was ſent out of SICILE, as giuen by Gelon the tyrant of SYRACVSA: ſo that many ſtood in great hope, that the dearth of victuals being holpẽ, the ciuill diſſention would alſo ceaſe. The Senate ſate in counſell vpon it immediatly, the common people ſtood alſo about the pallace where the counſell was kept, gaping what reſolution would fall out: perſwading themſelues, that the corne they had bought ſhould be ſolde good cheape, and that which was giuen ſhould be deuided by the polle, without paying any pennie, and the rather, becauſe certaine of the Senatours amongſt them did ſo wiſhe and perſwade the ſame. But Martius ſtanding vpon his feete, did ſomewhat ſharpely take vp thoſe, who went about to gratifie the people therein: and called them people pleaſers, and traitours to the nobilitie. Moreouer, he ſaied, they nouriſhed againſt themſelues, the naughtie ſeede and cockle of inſolencie and ſedition, “ which had bene ſowed and ſcattered abroade amongſt the people whom they ſhould haue “ cut off, if they had bene wiſe, and haue preuented their greatneſſe: and not to their owne deſtruction “ to haue ſuffered the people, to ſtabliſh a magiſtrate for themſelues, of ſo great “ power and authoritie, as that man had, to whome they had granted it. Who was alſo to “ be feared, becauſe he obtained what he would, and did nothing but what he liſted, neither “ paſſed for any obedience to the Conſuls, but liued in all libertie, acknowledging no ſuperiour “ to commaund him, ſauing the onely heads and authours of their faction, whom he called “ his magiſtrates. Therefore ſaied he, they that gaue counſell, and perſwaded that the corne “ ſhould be giuen out to the common people gratis, as they vſed to do in the cities of GRECE, “

There were only a fewe old men that ſpake againſt him, fearing leaſt ſome miſchiefe might fall out vpon it, as indeed there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being preſent at this conſultation of the Senate, when they ſawe that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voices, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would aſſemble to ſaue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ran on head in tumult together, before whom the words that Martius ſpake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people ſo ſtomaked, that euen in that furie they were ready to flie vpon the whole Senate. But the Tribunes laide all the fault and burthen wholly vpon Martius, and ſent their ſergeants forthwith to arreſt him, preſently to appeare in perſon before the people, to anſwer the words he had ſpoken in the Senate. Martius ſtoutly withſtood theſe officers that came to arreſt him. Then the Tribunes in their owne perſons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to fetche him by force, and ſo laide violent hands vpon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes giue back, and laid it ſore vpon the Ædiles: ſo for that time, the night parted them, and the tumult appeaſed. The next morning betimes, the Conſuls ſeeing the people in an vprore, running to the market place out of all parts of the citie, they were affraide leaſt all the citie would together by the eares: wherefore aſſembling the Senate in all haſt, they declared how it ſtood them vpon, to appeaſe the furie of the people, with ſome gentle words, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreouer, like wiſe men they ſhould conſider, it was now no time to ſtand at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour againſt the communaltie: they being fallen to ſo great an extremitie, and offering ſuch imminent danger. Wherefore they were to conſider temperately of things, and to deliuer ſome preſent and gentle pacification. The moſt part of the Senatours that were preſent at this counſell, thought this opinion beſt, and gaue their conſents vnto it. Whereupon the Conſuls riſing out of counſell, went to ſpeake vnto the people as gently as they could, and they did pacifie their furie and anger, purging the Senate of all the vniuſt accuſations laide vpon them, and vſed great modeſtie in perſwading them, and alſo in reprouing the faults they had committed. And as for the reſt, that touched the ſale of corne: they promiſed there ſhould be no diſliking offered them in the price. So the moſt part of the people being pacified, and appearing ſo plainly by the great ſilence and ſtill that was among them, as yeelding to the Conſuls, and liking well of their words: the Tribunes then of the people roſe out of their ſeates, and ſaid. Foraſmuch as the Senate yeelded vnto reaſon, the people alſo for their part, as became them, did likewiſe giue place vnto them: but notwithſtanding, they would that Martius ſhould come in perſon to aunſwer to the articles they had deuiſed. of their officers, why he did contemptuouſly reſiſt and diſobey. Laſtly, ſeeing he had driuen and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the world: if in doing this, hee had not done as much as in him lay, to raiſe ciuill warres, and to ſet one citizen againſt another. All this was ſpoken to one of theſe two endes, either that Martius againſt his nature ſhould be conſtrained to humble himſelf, and to abaſe his haughtie and fierce mind: or elſe if he continued ſtill in his ſtoutneſſe, he ſhould incurre the peoples diſpleaſure and ill will ſo farre, that he ſhould neuer poſſibly win them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out ſo, then otherwiſe: as in deede they geſt vnhappily, conſidering Martius nature and diſpoſition. So Martius came, and preſented himſelfe, to anſwere their accuſations againſt him, and the people held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would ſay. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly wordes come from him, he beganne not only to vſe his wonted boldnes of ſpeaking (which of it ſelfe was very rough and vnpleaſant, and did more aggrauate his accuſation, then purge his innocencie) but alſo gaue himſelfe in his wordes to thunder, and looke therewithall ſo grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This ſtirred coales among the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, & their hate and malice grew ſo toward him, that they could hold no longer, beare, nor indure his brauerie and careleſſe boldnes. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruelleſt and ſtouteſt of the Tribunes, after he had whiſpered a litle with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to die. Then preſently he commaunded the Ædiles to apprehend him, and carie him ſtraight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to caſt him hedlong downe the ſame. When the Ædiles came to lay handes vpon Martius to do that they were commaunded, diuers of the people themſelues thought it too cruell and violent a deede. The noble men alſo being much troubled to ſee ſuch force and rigour vſed, beganne to crie aloude, helpe Martius: ſo thoſe that laide handes on him being repulſed, they compaſſed him in round among themſelues, and ſome of them holding vp their handes to the people, beſought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words, nor crying out could ought preuaile, the tumult and hurly burley was ſo great, vntill ſuch time as the Tribunes owne friendes and kinſemen weying with themſelues the impoſſibleneſſe to conuey Martius to execution, without great ſlaughter & murder of the nobilitie: did perſwade and aduiſe not to proceede in ſo violent and extraordinarie a ſort, as to put ſuch a man to death, without lawfull proceſſe in lawe, but that they ſhould referre the ſentence of his death, to the free voice of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking himſelfe a litle, did aske the Patricians, for what cauſe they tooke Martius out of the officers handes that went to doe execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of themſelues ſo cruelly and wickedly put to death, ſo noble and valiant a ROMAINE as Martius was, and that without law or iuſtice? Well, then ſaid Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no more quarrell or diſſention againſt the people: for they do grant your demaund, that his cauſe ſhall be heard according to the law. Therfore ſaid he to Martius, we doe will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third day of our next ſitting and aſſembly here, to make your purgation for ſuch articles as ſhall be obiected againſt you, that by free voice the people may giue ſentence vpon you as ſhall pleaſe them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were much pleaſed they had gotten Martius out of this daunger. In the meane ſpace, before the third day of their next ceſſion came about, the ſame being kept euery ninth day continually at ROME, whereupon they call it now in Latin, Nundina: there fell out warre againſt the ANTIATES, which gaue ſome hope to the nobilitie, that this adiornment would come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them ſo long, as that the furie of the people againſt him would be well ſwaged, or vtterly forgotten, by reaſon of the trouble of the warres. But contrarie to expectation, the peace was concluded preſently with the ANTIATES, and the people returned againe to ROME. Then the Patricians aſſembled oftentimes together, to conſult how they might ſtande to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occaſion to cauſe the people to mutinie againe, and riſe againſt the nobilitie. And there Appius Clodius (one that was taken euer as an heauie enemie to the people) did auow and proteſt, that they would vtterly abaſe the authoritie of the Senate, and deſtroy the common weale, if they would ſuffer the common people to haue authoritie by voices to giue iudgement againſt the nobilitie. On the other ſide againe, the moſt auncient Senatours, and ſuch as were giuen to fauour the common people, ſaide: that when the people ſhould ſee they had authoritie of life and death in their handes, they would not be ſo cruell and fierce, but gentle and ciuill. More alſo, that it was not for contempt of nobilitie or the Senate, that they ſought to haue the authoritie of iuſtice in their handes, as a preheminence and prerogatiue of honour: but becauſe they feared, that themſelues ſhould be contemned and hated of the nobilitie. So as they were perſwaded, that ſo ſoone as they gaue them authoritie to iudge by voices: ſo ſoone would they leaue all enuie and malice to condemne any. Martius ſeeing the Senate in great doubt howe to reſolue, partly for the loue and good will the nobilitie did beare him, and partly for the feare they ſtoode in of the people: asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden him with? The Tribunes aunſwered him, that they would ſhewe howe he did aſpire to be king, and would proue that all his actions tended to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer ROME. Martius with that, riſing vp on his feete, ſaide: that thereupon he did willingly offer himſelfe to the people, to be tried vpon that accuſation. And that if it were proued by him, he had ſo much as once thought of any ſuch matter, that hee would then refuſe no kinde of puniſhment they would offer him: conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with nothing elſe beſides, and that ye doe not alſo abuſe the Senate. They promiſed they would not. Vnder theſe conditions the iudgement was agreed vpon, and the people aſſembled. And firſt of all the Tribunes would in any caſe (whatſoeuer became of it) that the people would proceede to giue their voices by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needy people (and all ſuch rable as had nothing to looſe, and had leſſe regard of honeſtie before their eies) came to be of greater force (becauſe their voices were numbred by the polle) then the noble honeſt citizens, whoſe perſons and purſe did dutifully ſerue the common wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes ſaw they could not proue he went about to make him ſelfe King: they beganne to broach a freſh the former wordes that Martius had ſpoken in the Senate, in hindering the diſtribution of the corne at meane price vnto the common people, and perſwading alſo to take the office of Tribuneſhip from them. And for the third, they charged him a new, that he had not made the common diſtribution of the ſpoyle he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iourney. But this matter was moſt ſtraunge of all to Martius, looking leaſt to haue bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the ſodaine, and hauing no readie excuſe to make euen at that inſtant: he beganne to fall a praiſing of the ſouldiers that had ſerued with him in that iourney. But thoſe that were not with him, being the greater number, cried out ſo loud, and made ſuch a noiſe that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voices of the Tribes, there were three voices odde, which condemned him to be baniſhed for life. After declaration of the ſentence, the people made ſuch ioy, as they neuer reioyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were ſo braue and liuely, and went home ſo iocondly from the aſſembly, for triumph of this ſentence. The Senate againe in contrarie manner were as ſad and heauie, repenting themſelues beyond meaſure, that they had not rather determined to haue done and ſuffered any thing whatſoeuer, before the common people ſhould ſo arrogantly and outragiouſly haue abuſed their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrant you, nor outward ſhewes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were eaſily diſcerned by their lookes. For he that was on the peoples ſide, looked cheerely on the matter: but he that was ſad, and hung downe his head, he was ſure of the noble mens ſide. Sauing Martius alone, who neither in his countenance nor in his gate, did euer ſhew himſelfe abaſhed, or once let fall his great courage: but he onely of all other gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly ſhew no manner of paſſion, nor care at all of himſelfe. Not that he did patiently beare and temper his good hap, in reſpect of any reaſon he had, or by his quiet condition: but becauſe he was ſo caried away with the vehemencie of anger, and deſire of reuenge, that he had no ſenſe nor feeling of the hard ſtate he was in, which the common people iudge not to be ſorow, although in deede it be the very ſame.

ſame. For when ſorow ( as you would ſay ) is ſet a fire, then it is conuerted into ſpite and malice, and driueth away for that time all faintneſſe of heart and naturall feare. And this is the cauſe why the cholericke man is ſo altered and mad in his actions, as a man ſet on fire with a burning agew: for when a mans heart is troubled within, his pulſe will beate maruellous ſtrongly. Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true ſoone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his houſe againe, and had taken his leaue of his mother and wife, finding them weeping and ſhreeking out for ſorrow, and had alſo comforted and perſwaded them to be content with his chaunce: he went immediatly to the gate of the citie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians that brought him thither, from whence he went on his way with three or foure of his friendes onely, taking nothing with him, nor requeſting any thing of any man. So he remained a few daies in the countrie at his houſes, turmoyled with ſundry ſorts and kinds of thoughts, ſuch as the fire of his choller did ſtirre vp. In the end, ſeeing he could reſolue no way, to take a profitable or honourable courſe, but onely was pricked forwarde ſtill to be reuenged of the ROMAINES; he thought to raiſe vp ſome great wars againſt them, by their neereſt neighbours. Whereupon he thought it his beſt way, firſt to ſtirre vp the VOLSCES againſt them, knowing they were yet able enough in ſtrength and riches to encounter them, notwithſtanding their former loſſes they had receiued not long before, and that their power was not ſo much impaired, as their malice and deſire was increaſed to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the citie of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Aufidius, who for his riches, as alſo for his nobilitie and valiantneſſe was honoured among the VOLSCES as a King. Martius knewe very well that Tullus did more malice and enuie him, then he did all the ROMAINES beſides: becauſe that many times in battels where they met, they were euer at the encounter one againſt another, like luſtie couragious youthes, ſtriuing in all emulation of honour, and had encountered many times together. Inſomuch as beſides the common quarrell betweene them, there was bred a maruellous priuate hate one againſt another. Yet notwithſtanding, conſidering that Tullus Aufidius was a man of a great mind, and that he aboue all other of the VOLSCES moſt deſired reuenge of the ROMAINES, for the iniuries they had done vnto them: hee did an acte that confirmed the true wordes of an auncient Poet, who ſaide:

It is a thing full hard, mans anger to withſtand,
if it be ſtiffely bent to take an enterpriſe in hand.
For then moſt men will haue, the thing that they deſire, although it coſt their liues therefore, ſuch force hath wicked ire.

And ſo did he. For he diſguiſed himſelfe in ſuch array and attire, as he thought no man could euer haue knowen him for the perſon he was, ſeeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Homer ſaid of Vlyſſes,

So did he enter into the enemies towne.

Coriolanus diſguiſed, goeth to Antium, a citie of the Volſces.

It was euen twy-light when he entred the citie of ANTIVM, and many people met him in the ſtreetes, but no man knew him. So he went directly to Tullus Aufidius houſe, and when he came thither, he got him vp ſtraight to the chimney harth, and ſate him downe, and ſpake not a word to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the houſe ſpying him, wondered what he ſhould be, and yet they durſt not bid him riſe. For ill fauouredly muffled and diſguiſed as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maieſtie in his countenance, and in his ſilence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at ſupper, to tell him of the ſtrange diſguiſing of this man. Tullus roſe preſently from the board, and comming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled himſelfe, and after he had pauſed a while, making no anſwere, he ſaid vnto him. If thou knoweſt me not yet, Tullus, and ſeeing me, doſt not perhappes beleeue me to be the man I am in deede, I muſt of neceſſitie bewray my ſelfe to be that I am. I am Caius Martius, who hath done to thy ſelfe particularly, and to all the VOLCES generally, great hurt and miſchief, which I cannot denie for my ſurname of Coriolanus that I beare. For I neuer had other benefite nor recompence, of all the true and painefull ſeruice I haue done, and the extreme daungers I haue bene in, but this only ſurname: a good memorie and witneſſe of the malice and diſpleaſure thou ſhouldeſt beare me. Stand vp, ô Martius, and be of good cheere, for in profering thy ſelfe vnto vs, thou doſt vs great honour: and by this meanes thou maieſt hope alſo of greater thinges, at all the VOLSCES handes. So he feaſted him for that time, and entertained him in the honourableſt manner he could, talking with him in no other matters at that preſent: but within few daies after, they fell to conſultation together in what ſort they ſhould beginne their warres. Now on the other ſide, the citie of ROME was in maruellous vprore & diſcord, the nobilitie againſt the communaltie, and chiefely for Martius condemnation and baniſhment. Moreouer the Prieſtes, the Soothſaiers, and priuate men alſo, came and declared to the Senate certaine ſightes and wonders in the aire, which they had ſeene, and were to be conſidered of: amongſt the which, ſuch a viſion happpened. There was a citizen of ROME called Titus Latinus, a man of meane qualitie & condition, but otherwiſe an honeſt ſober man, giuen to a quiet life, without ſuperſtition, and much leſſe to vanitie or lying. This man had a viſion in his dreame, in the which he thought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commaunded him to ſignifie to the Senate, that they had cauſed a verie vile lewde dauncer to goe before the proceſſion: and ſaid, the firſt time this viſion had appeared vnto him, he made no reckoning of it: and comming againe another time into his mind, he made not much more account of the matter then before. In the ende, he ſawe one of his ſonnes die, who had the beſt nature and condition of all his brethren: and ſodainely he himſelfe was ſo taken in all his limmes, that he became lame and impotent. Hereupon he tolde the whole circumſtance of this viſion before the Senate, ſitting vpon his little couch or bed, whereon he was caried on mens armes: & he had no ſooner reported this viſion to the Senate, but he preſently felt his body & lims reſtored againe to their former ſtrength & vſe. So raiſing vp himſelf vpon his couch, he got vp on his feete at that inſtant, & walked home to his houſe, without helpe of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent enquirie to vnderſtand the truth: and in the ende they found there was ſuch a thing. There was one that had deliuered a bondman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other ſlaues and bondmen, and had commaunded them to whip him vp and downe the market place, & afterwards to kill him: & as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they did ſo martyre the poore wretch, that for the cruell ſmart and paine he felt, he turned & writhed his bodie in ſtrange and pittifull ſort. The proceſſion by chaunce came by euen at the ſame time, & many that followed it, were hartily moued & offended with the ſight, ſaying: that this was no good ſight to behold, nor mete to be met in proceſſion time. But for al this, there was nothing done: ſauing they blamed and rebuked him that puniſhed his ſlaue ſo cruelly. For the ROMAINES at that time, did vſe their bondmen very gently, becauſe they themſelues did labour with their owne hands, and liued with them & among them: and therefore they did vſe them the more gently and familiarly. For the greateſt puniſhment they gaue a ſlaue that had offended, was this. They made him carie a limmer on his ſhoulders that is faſtened to the axeltree of a couch, and compelled him to goe vp and downe in that ſort amongeſt all their neighbours.

He that had once abidden this puniſhment, and was ſeene in that manner, was proclaimed and cried in euery market towne: ſo that no man would euer truſt him after, and the called him Furcifer, becauſe the LATINES call the wod that runneth into the axletree of the coch, Furca, as much to ſay, as a forke. Now when Latinus had made report to the Senate of the viſion that had happened to him, they were deuiſing whom this vnpleaſaunt daunſer ſhould be, that went before the proceſſion. Thereupon certaine that ſtoode by, remembred the poore ſlaue that was ſo cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwardes put to death: and the thing that made them remember it, was the ſtraunge and rare manner of his puniſhment. The prieſtes hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduiſe: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the ſlaue. So they cauſed the ſlaues maſter to be puniſhed, and beganne againe a new proceſſion, and all other ſhewes and ſightes in honour of Iupiter. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa did wiſely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the goddes, and ſpecially this cuſtome which he ſtabliſhed, to bring the people to religion. For when the magiſtrates, biſhoppes, prieſtes, or other religious miniſters goe about any deuine ſeruice, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out aloud, Hoc age: as to ſay, doe this, or minde this. Hereby they are ſpecially commanded, wholly to diſpoſe them ſelues to ſerue God, leauing all other buſines and matters a ſide: knowing well enough, that whatſoeuer moſt men doe, they doe it as in a manner conſtrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES did euer vſe to beginne againe their ſacrifices, proceſſions, playes, and ſuch like ſhewes done in honour of the goddes, not onely vpon ſuch an occaſion, but vppon lighter cauſes then that. As when they went a proceſſion through the city, and did carie the images of their goddes, and ſuch other like holy reliques vpon open hallowed coches or charrets, called in LATIN Thenſæ: one of the coche horſes that drue them ſtoode ſtill, and would draw no more: and becauſe alſo the coche man tooke the raines of the bridle with the left hand, they ordained that the proceſſion ſhould be begunne againe a new. Of later time alſo, they did renew and beginne a ſacrifice thirty times one after another, becauſe they thought ſtill there fell out one fault or other in the ſame, ſo holy and deuout were they to the goddes. Now Tullus and Martius had ſecret conference with the greateſt perſonages of the citie of ANTIVM, declaring vnto them, that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in diſſention one with another. They anſwered them, they were aſhamed to breake the league, conſidering that they were ſworne to keepe peace for two yeares. Howbeit ſhortly after, the ROMAINES gaue them great occaſion to make warre with them. For on a holy day common playes being kept in ROME, vpon ſome ſuſpicion, or falſe report, they made proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that all the VOLSCES ſhould auoide out of ROME before ſunne ſet. Some thinke this was a craft and deceipt of Martius, who ſent one to ROME to the Conſuls, to accuſe the VOLSCES falſely, aduertiſing them how they had made a conſpiracy to ſet vppon them, whileſt they were buſie in ſeeing theſe games, and alſo to ſet their city a fire. This open proclamation made all the VOLSCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then euer they were before: and Tullus aggrauating the matter, did ſo inflame the VOLSCES againſt them, that in the end they ſent their ambaſſadours to ROME, to ſummon them to deliuer their lands and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times paſt, or to looke for preſent warres. The ROMAINES hearing this, were maruellouſly netled: and made no other aunſwer but thus. If the VOLSCES be the firſt that beginne warre: the ROMAINES will be the laſt that will end it. Incontinently vpon returne of the VOLSCES ambaſſadours, and deliuerie of the ROMAINES aunſwer: Tullus cauſed an aſſemby generall to be made of the VOLSCES, and concluded to make warre vppon the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus did counſell them to take Martius into their ſeruice, and not to miſtruſt him for the remembraunce of any thing paſt, but boldly to truſt him in any matter to come: for he would doe them more ſeruice in fighting for them, then euer he did them diſpleaſure in fighting againſt them. So Martius was called forth, who ſpake ſo excellently in the preſence of them all, that he was thought no leſſe eloquent in tongue, then warlike in ſhew: and declared him ſelfe both expert in warres, and wiſe with valiantnes. Thus he was ioyned in commiſſion with Tullus as generall of the VOLSCES, hauing abſolute authority betweene them to follow and purſue the warres. But Martius fearing leaſt tract of time to bring this army together with all the munition and furniture of the VOLSCES, would robbe him of the meane he had to execute his purpoſe and intent: left order with the rulers and chiefe of the city, to aſſemble the reſt of their power, and to prepare all neceſſary prouiſion for the campe. Then he with the lighteſt ſouldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, ſtale away vppon the ſodaine, and marched with all ſpeede, and entred the territories of ROME, before the ROMAINS heard any newes of his comming. In ſo much as the VOLSCES found ſuch ſpoile in the fields, as they had more then they could ſpend in their campe, and were weary to driue and cary away that they had. Howbeit the gaine of the ſpoile and the hurt they did to the ROMAINS in this inuaſion, was the leaſt part of his intent. For his chiefeſt purpoſe was, to increaſe ſtill the malice and diſſention betweene the nobility, and the communalty: and to draw that on, he was very carefull to keepe the noble mens landes and goods ſafe from harme and burning, but ſpoiled all the whole countrey beſides, and would ſuffer no man to take or hurt any thing of the noble mens. This made greater ſturre and broile betwene the nobility & the people, then was before. For the noble mē fell out with the people, becauſe they had ſo vniuſtly baniſhed a man of ſo great valure and power. The people on the other ſide, accuſed the nobility, how they had procured Martius to make theſe wars, to be reuēged of them: becauſe it pleaſed them to ſee their goods burnt and ſpoiled before their eyes, whileſt themſelues were well at eaſe, and did behold the peoples loſſes and misfortunes, and knowing their owne goods ſafe and out of daunger: and how the warre was not made againſt the noble men, that had the enemy abroad, to keepe that they had in ſafety. Now Martius hauing done this firſt exploite (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and leſſe fearefull of the ROMAINES) brought home all the army againe, without loſſe of any man. After their whole army (which was maruellous great, and very forward to ſeruice) was aſſembled in one campe: they agreed to leaue part of it for garriſon in the countrey about, and the other part ſhould goe on, and make the warre vpon the ROMAINES. So Martius bad Tullus chooſe, and take which of the two charges he liked beſt. Tullus made him aunſwere, hee knew by experience that Martius was no leſſe valiant then him ſelfe, and how hee euer had better fortune and good happe in all battells, then him ſelfe had. Therefore he thought it beſt for him to haue the leading of thoſe that ſhould make the warres abroad: and him ſelfe would keepe home, to prouide for the ſafetie of the cities and of his countrey, and to furniſh the campe alſo of all neceſſary prouiſion abroade. So Martius being ſtronger then before, went firſt of all vnto the city of CERCEES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yeelded them ſelues, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entred the countrey of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there, to defend the LATINES, who were their confederats, & had many times ſent vnto the ROMAINES for their aide. But on the one ſide, the people of ROME were very ill willing to goe: and on the other ſide the Conſuls being vpon their going out of their office, would not hazard them ſelues for ſo ſmall a time: ſo that the ambaſſadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and did no good. Then Martius did beſiege their cities, and hauing taken by force the townes of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made reſiſtaunce: hee ſacked all their goods, and tooke them priſoners. Such as did yeeld them ſelues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as poſſible might be, to defend them from hurt: and becauſe they ſhould receiue no damage by his will, he remoued his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the city of BOLES by aſſault, being about an hundred furlong from ROME, where he had a maruellous great ſpoile, and put euery man to the ſword that was able to carie weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in garriſon for defence of their countrey, hearing this good newes, would tary no longer at home, but armed them ſelues, and ranne to Martius campe, ſaying they did acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through al ITALIE, and euery one praiſed him for a valiant captaine, for that by change of one man for another, ſuch and ſo ſtraunge euents fell out in the ſtate. In this while, all went ſtill to wracke at ROME. For, to come into the field to fight with the enemy, they could not abide to heare of it, they were one ſo much againſt another, and full of ſeditious wordes, the nobility againſt the people, and the people againſt the nobility. Vntill they had intelligence at the length that the enemies had laide ſiege to the city of LAVINIVM, in the which were all the temples and images of the goddes their protectours, and from whence came firſt their auncient originall, for that Æneas at his firſt arriuall into ITALIE did builde that citie. Then fell there out a maruellous ſodaine chaunge of minde among the people, and farre more ſtraunge and contrary in the nobility. For the people thought good to repeale the condemnation and exile of Martius. The Senate aſſembled vppon it, would in no caſe yeeld to that. Who either did it of a ſelfe will to bee contrary to the peoples deſire: or becauſe Martius ſhould not returne through the grace and fauour of the people. Or elſe, becauſe they were throughly angry and offended with him, that he would ſet vppon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doinges would ſhew him ſelfe an open enemy beſides vnto his countrey: notwithſtanding the moſt part of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruellous ill part, and as if the iniurie had beene done vnto them ſelues. Report being made of the Senates reſolution, the people found them ſelues in a ſtraight: for they coulde authoriſe and confirme nothing by their voices, vnleſſe it had beene firſt propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martius hearing this ſturre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before: in ſo much as he raiſed his ſiege incontinently before the city of LAVINIVM, and going towardes ROME, lodged his campe within forty furlong of the citie, at the ditches called Cluiliæ. His incamping ſo neare ROME, did put all the whole city in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the preſent time it appeaſed the ſedition and diſſention betwixt the Nobility and the people. For there was no Conſull, Senatour, nor Magiſtrate, that durſt once contrary the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they ſaw the women in a maruellous feare, running vp and downe the city: the temples of the goddes full of olde people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the goddes: and finally, not a man either wiſe or hardy to prouide for their ſafety: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reaſon to call home Martius againe, to reconcile them ſelues to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in maruellous great fault to bee angry and in choller with him, when it ſtoode them vppon rather to haue gone out and intreated him. So they all agreede together to ſend ambaſſadours vnto him, to let him vnderſtand how his countrey men did call him home againe, and reſtored him to all his goods, and beſought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambaſſadours that were ſent, were Martius familiar friends, and acquaintaunce, who looked at the leaſt for a curteous welcome of him, as of their familiar friend and kinſeman. Howbeit they found nothing leſſe. For at their comming, they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was ſet in his chaire of ſtate, with a maruellous and an vnſpeakeable maieſty, hauing the chiefeſt men of the VOLSCES about him: ſo hee commaunded them to declare openly the cauſe of their comming. Which they deliuered in the moſt humble and lowly wordes they poſſibly could deuiſe, and with all modeſt countenaunce and behauiour agreable for the ſame. When they had done their meſſage: for the iniury they had done him, he aunſwered them very whotly, and in great choller. But as generall of the VOLSCES, he willed them to reſtore vnto the VOLSCES, all their landes and cities they had taken from them in former warrres: and moreouer, that they ſhould giue them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before giuen to the LATINES. For otherwiſe they had no other meane to end this warre, if they did not graunt theſe honeſt and iuſt conditions of peace. Thereupon he gaue them thirty daies reſpit to make him aunſwere. So the ambaſſadours returned ſtraight to ROME, and Martius forthwith departed with his army out of the territories of the ROMAINES. This was the firſt matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that moſt enuied Martius glory and authority) did charge Martius with. Among thoſe, Tullus was chief: who though hee had receiued no priuate iniurie or diſpleaſure of Martius, yet the common fault and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieued him to ſee his owne reputation blemiſhed, through Martius great fame and honour, and ſo him ſelfe to bee leſſe eſteemed of the VOLSCES, then he was before. This fell out the more, becauſe euery man honoured Martius, and thought he only could do all, and that all other gouernors and captaines muſt be content with ſuch credite and authority, as he would pleaſe to countenaunce them with. From hence they deriued all their firſt accuſations and ſecret murmurings againſt Martius. For priuate captains conſpiring againſt him, were very angry with him: and gaue it out, that the remouing of the campe was a manifeſt treaſon, not of the townes, nor fortes, nor of armes, but of time and occaſion, which was a loſſe of great importaunce, becauſe it was that which in treaſon might both loſe and binde all, and preſerue the whole. Now Martius hauing giuen the ROMAINES thirty daies reſpit for their anſwer, and ſpecially becauſe the wars haue not accuſtomed to make any great changes, in leſſe ſpace of time then that: hee thought it good yet, not to lie a ſleepe and idle all the while, but went and deſtroyed the lands of the enemies allies, and tooke ſeuen great cities of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMAINES durſt not once put them ſelues into the fielde, to come to their aide and helpe: they were ſo fainte hearted, ſo miſtruſtfull, and loth beſides to make warres. In ſo much as they properly reſembled the bodies paralyticke, and loſed of their limmes and members: as thoſe which through the palſey haue loſt all their ſence and feeling. Wherefore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the ROMAINES againe with all his army, they ſent another ambaſſade vnto him, to pray peace, and the remoue of the VOLSES out of their countrey: that afterwardes they might with better leyſure fall to ſuch agreementes together, as ſhould bee thought moſt meete and neceſſary. For the ROMAINES were no men that would euer yeelde for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any ground to demaund reaſonable articles and conditions, all that they would reaſonably aske ſhould bee graunted vnto, by the ROMAINES, who of them ſelues would willingly yeelde to reaſon, conditionally, that they did lay downe armes. Martius to that aunſwered: that as generall of the VOLSCES he would reply nothing vnto it. But yet as a ROMAINE citizen, he would counſell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reaſon, if they were wiſe: and that they ſhould returne againe within three daies, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he had firſt deliuered them. Or otherwiſe, that hee would no more giue them aſſuraunce or ſafe conduite to returne againe into his campe, with ſuch vaine and friuolous meſſages. When the ambaſſadours were returned to ROME, and had reported Martius aunſwer to the Senate: their city being in extreame daunger, and as it were in a terrible ſtorme or tempeſt, they threw out (as the common prouerbe ſaieth) their holy ancker. For then they appointed all the biſhoppes, prieſtes, miniſters of the gods, and keepers of holy thinges, and all the augures or ſoothſayers, which foreſhew thinges to come by obſeruation of the flying of birdes (which is an olde auncient kinde of prophecying and diuination amongeſt the ROMAINES) to goe to Martius apparelled, as when they doe their ſacrifices: and firſt to intreate him to leaue off warre, and then that hee would ſpeake to his countrey men, and conclude peace with the VOLSCES. Martius ſuffered them to come into his campe, but yet he granted them nothing the more, neither did he entertaine them or ſpeake more curteouſly to them, then he did the firſt time that they came vnto him, ſauing onely that hee willed them to take the one of the two: eyther to accept peace vnder the firſt conditions offered, or elſe to receiue warre. When all this goodly table of ſuperſtition and prieſtes were returned, it was determined in counſell that none ſhould goe out of the gates of the citie, and that they ſhould watch and ward vppon the wals, to repulſe their enemies if they came to aſſault them: referring them ſelues and all their hope to time, and fortunes vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwiſe how to remedy the daunger. Now all the city was full of tumult, feare, and maruellous doubt what would happen: vntill at the length there fell out ſuch a like matter, as Homer oft times ſaide they would leaſt haue thought of. For in great matters, that happen ſeldome, Homer ſaieth, and crieth out in this ſort.

did put into his minde ſuch thoughts, and made him ſo deuiſe.

And in another place:

But ſure ſome god hath tane, out of the peoples minde,
both wit and vnderſtanding eke, and haue therewith aſſinde ſome other ſimple ſpirit, in ſteed thereof to bide, that ſo they might their doings all, for lacke of wit miſguide.

And in another place:

The people of themſelues, did either it conſider,
or elſe ſome god inſtructed them, and ſo they ioynde together.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters vnpoſſible, and fables of no likelyhood or troth, vnto mans reaſon, freewill, or iudgement: which in deed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of our owne free will and reaſon. For he oft ſpeaketh theſe wordes:

I haue thought it in my noble heart:

And in another place:

Achilles angrie was, and ſorie for to heare
him ſo to ſay, his heauie breſt was fraught with penſiue feare.

And againe in another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not moue with her faire tongue,
ſo honeſt and ſo vertuous, he was the reſt among.

But in wonderous and extraordinarie things, which are done by ſecret inſpirations and motions, he doth not ſay that God taketh away, from man his choice and freedom of will, but that he doth moue it: neither that he doth worke deſire in vs, but obiecteth to our mindes certaine imaginations whereby we are led to deſire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of ſucceſſe. For, either we muſt ſay, that the gods meddle not with the cauſes and beginnings of our actions: or elſe what other meanes haue they to helpe and further men? It is apparant that they handle not our bodies, nor mooue not our feete and hands, when there is occaſion to vſe them: but that part of our minde from which theſe motions proceed, is induced thereto, or caried away by ſuch obiects and reaſons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the ROMAINE ladies and gentlewomen did viſite all the temples and gods of the ſame, to make their praiers vnto them: but the greateſt ladies (and more part of them) were continuallie about the aulter of Iupiter Capitolin, among which troope by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes owne ſiſter. The ſelfe ſame Publicola, who did ſuch notable ſeruice to the ROMAINES, both in peace and warres: and was dead alſo certaine yeares before, as we haue declared in his life. His ſiſter Valeria was greatly honoured and reuerenced among all the ROMAINES: and did ſo modeſtly and wiſely behaue her ſelfe, that ſhe did not ſhame nor diſhonour the houſe ſhe came off. So ſhe ſodainly fell into ſuch a fanſie, as we haue rehearſed before, and had (by ſome god as I thinke) taken hold of a noble deuiſe. Whereupon ſhe roſe, and the other ladies with her, and they all together went ſtraight to the houſe of Volumnia, Martius mother: and comming in to her, found her, and Martius wife her daughter in law ſet together, and hauing her husband Martius young children in her lap. Now all the traine of theſe ladies ſitting in a ring round about her: Valeria firſt began to ſpeake in this ſort vnto her. We ladies, are come to viſite you ladies (my lady Volumnia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commaundement of other magiſtrate:

but through the inſpiration (as I take it) of ſome god aboue. Who hauing taken compaſſion “ and pittie of our praiers, hath moued vs to come vnto you, to intreate you in a matter, as well “ beneficiall for vs, as alſo for the whole citizens in general: but to your ſelues in eſpeciall (if it “ pleaſe you to credit me) and ſhall redound to our more fame and glorie, then the daughters of “ the SABYNES obtained in former age, when they procured louing peace, in ſtead of hatefull “ war, between their fathers and their husbands. Come on good ladies, and let vs go altogether “ vnto Martius, to intreate him to take pittie vpon vs, and alſo to report the trothe vnto him, “ how much you are bound vnto the citizens: who notwithſtanding they haue ſuſtained great “ hurt and loſſes by him, yet they haue not hitherto ſought reuenge vpon your perſons by any “ diſcourteous vſage, neither euer conceiued any ſuch thought or intent againſt you, but do de- “ liuer you ſafe into his hands, though thereby they looke for no better grace or clemencie from him. When Valeria had ſpoken this vnto them, all the other ladies together with one voice confirmed that ſhe had ſaid. Then Volumnia in this ſort did aunſwer her. My good ladies, we „ are partakers with you of the common miſerie and calamitie of our countrie, and yet our „ griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reaſon of our particular misfortune: to feele the loſſe of „ my ſonne Martius former valiancie and glorie, and to ſee his perſon enuironed now with our „ enemies in armes, rather to ſee him forth comming & ſafe kept, then of any loue to defend his „ perſon. But yet the greateſt griefe of our heaped miſhaps is, to ſee our poore country brought „ to ſuch extremitie, that all the hope of the ſafetie and preſeruation thereof, is now vnfortunately „ caſt vpon vs ſimple women: becauſe we know not what account he will make of vs, ſince

„ he hath caſt from him all care of his naturall countrie and common weale, which heretofore
„ he hath holden more deere and precious, then either his mother, wife or children. Notwithſtanding, „ if ye thinke we can do good, we will willingly do what you will haue vs: bring vs „ to him I pray you. For if we cannot preuaile, we may yet dye at his feete, as humble ſuters for the ſafetie of our countrie.

The oration of Volumnia, vnto her ſonne Coriolanus.

Her aunſwer ended, ſhe tooke her daughter in lawe, and Martius children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE ladies, they went in troupe together vnto the VOLSCES campe: whom when they ſawe, they of themſelues did both pitty and reuerence her, and there was not a man among them that once durſt ſay a word vnto her. Now was Martius ſet then in his chaire of ſtate, with all the honours of a generall, and when he had ſpied the women comming a farre off, he maruelled what the matter ment: but afterwards knowing his wife which came formoſt, he determined at the firſt to perſiſt in his obſtinate and inflexible rancker. But ouercome in the end with naturall affection, and being altogether altered to ſee them: his heart would not ſerue him to tarie their comming to his chaire, but comming downe in haſt, he went to meete them, and firſt he kiſſed his mother, and imbraced her a prety while, then his wife and litle children. And nature ſo wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he could not keepe himſelf from making much of them, but yeelded to the affection of his bloud, as if he had bene violently caried with the furie of a moſt ſwift running ſtreame. After he had thus louingly receiued them, and perceiuing that his mother Volumnia would begin to ſpeake to him, he called the chiefeſt of the counſell of the VOLSCES to heare what ſhe would ſay. Then ſhe ſpake in this ſort. If we helde our peace (my ſonne) and determined not to ſpeake, the ſtate of our poore bodies, and preſent ſight of our raiment, would eaſily bewray to thee what life we haue led at home, ſince thy „ exile and abode abroad. But thinke now with thy ſelfe, how much more vnfortunately, then
„ all the women liuing we are come hither, conſidering that the ſight which ſhould be moſt „ pleaſant to all other to behold, ſpightfull fortune hath made moſt fearefull to vs: making my „ ſelfe to ſee my ſonne, and my daughter here, her husband, beſieging the walles of his natiue „ countrie. So as that which is the onely comfort to all other in their aduerſitie and miſerie, to „ pray vnto the gods, and to call to them for aide: is the onely thing which plungeth vs into „ moſt deepe perplexitie. For we cannot (alas) together pray, both for victorie, for our countrie,
„ and for ſafetie of thy life alſo: but a world of grieuous curſes, yea more then any mortall enemie
„ can heape vpon vs, are forcibly wrapt vp in our praiers. For the bitter ſop of moſt harde
„ choice is offered thy wife and children, to forgo the one of the two: either to loſe the perſon
„ of thy ſelfe, or the nurſe of their natiue countrie. For my ſelfe (my ſonne) I am determined not „ to tarie, till fortune in my life time do make an end of this warre. For if I cannot perſwade thee, „ rather to do good vnto both parties, then to ouerthrow and deſtroy the one, preferring loue
„ and nature, before the malice and calamitie of warres: thou ſhalt ſee, my ſonne, and truſt vnto
„ it, thou ſhalt no ſooner marche forward to aſſault thy countrie, but thy foote ſhall treade vpon „ thy mothers wombe, that brought thee firſt into this world. And I may not deferre to ſee the „ day, either that my ſonne be led priſoner in triumph by his naturall countrymen, or that he „ himſelfe do triumphe of them, and of his naturall countrie. For if it were ſo, that my requeſt „ tended to ſaue thy country, in deſtroying the VOLSCES: I muſt confeſſe, thou wouldſt hardly „ and doubtfully reſolue on that. For as to deſtroy thy naturall countrie, it is altogether vnmeete „ and vnlawfull: ſo were it not iuſt, and leſſe honorable, to betray thoſe that put their truſt in „ thee: But my onely demaund conſiſteth, to make a gaile deliuerie of all euils, which deliuereth „ equall benefit and ſafetie, both to the one and the other, but moſt honorable for the VOLSCES.
„ For it ſhall appeare, that hauing victorie in their hands, they haue of ſpeciall fauour granted vs ſingular graces: peace, and amitie, albeit themſelues haue no leſſe part of both, then we. Of which good, if ſo it came to paſſe, thy ſelfe is the onely author, and ſo haſt thou the onely honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrarie: thy ſelfe alone deſeruedly ſhall carie the ſhamefull reproach and burthen of either partie. So, though the end of warre be vncertaine, yet this notwithſtanding is moſt certaine: that if it be thy chance to conquer, this benefit ſhalt thou reape of thy goodly conqueſt, to be chronicled the plague and deſtroier of thy countrie. And if fortune alſo ouerthrow thee, then the world will ſay, that through deſire to reuenge thy priuate iniuries, thou haſt for euer vndone thy good friends, who did moſt louingly and courteouſlie receiue thee. Martius gaue good eare vnto his mothers words, without interrupting her ſpeach at all: and after ſhe had ſaid what ſhe would, he held his peace a prety while, and anſwered not a word. Hereupon ſhe began againe to ſpeake vnto him, and ſaid. My ſonne, why doeſt thou not anſwer me? doeſt thou thinke it good altogether to giue place vnto thy choller and deſire of reuenge, and thinkeſt thou it not honeſtie for thee to graunt thy mothers requeſt, in ſo weighty a cauſe? doeſt thou take it honorable for a noble man, to remember the wrongs and iniuries done him: and doeſt not in like caſe thinke it an honeſt noble mans parte, to be thankfull for the goodneſſe that parents do ſhew to their children, acknowledging the dutie and reuerence they ought to beare vnto them? No man liuing is more bound to ſhew himſelfe thankefull in all parts and reſpects, then thy ſelfe: who ſo vnnaturally ſheweth all ingratitude. Moreouer (my ſonne) thou haſt ſorely taken of thy country, exacting grieuous paiments vpon them, in reuenge of the iniuries offered thee: beſides, thou haſt not hitherto ſhewed thy poore mother any courteſie. And therefore, it is not only honeſt, but due vnto me, that without compulſion I ſhould obtaine my ſo iuſt and reaſonable requeſt of thee. But ſince by reaſon I cannot perſwade thee to it, to what purpoſe do I defer my laſt hope? And with theſe words, her ſelfe, his wife and children, fell downe vpon their knees before him. Martius ſeeing that, could refraine no longer, but went ſtraight and lift her vp, crying out: Oh mother, what haue you done to me? And holding her hard by the right hand, oh mother, ſaid he, you haue wonne a happy victorie for your countrie, but mortall and vnhappy for your ſonne: for I ſee my ſelfe vanquiſhed by you alone. Theſe words being ſpoken openly, he ſpake a litle apart with his mother and wife, and then let them returne againe to ROME, for ſo they did requeſt him: and ſo remaining in campe that night, the next morning he diſlodged, and marched homewards into the VOLSCES countrie againe, who were not all of one minde, nor all alike contented. For ſome miſliked him, and that he had done. Other being well pleaſed that peace ſhould be made, ſaid: that neither the one, nor the other, deſerued blame nor reproche. Other, though they miſliked that was done, did not thinke him an ill man for that he did, but ſaid: he was not to be blamed, though he yeelded to ſuch a forcible extremitie. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but all obeied his commandement, more for reſpect of his worthineſſe and valiancie, then for feare of his authoritie. Now the citizens of ROME plainly ſhewed, in what feare and danger their citie ſtood of this war, when they were deliuered. For ſo ſoone as the watch vpon the wals of the citie perceiued the VOLSCES campe to remoue, there was not a temple in the citie but was preſently ſet open, and full of men, wearing garlands of flowers vpon their heads ſacrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do vpon the newes of ſome great obtained victorie. And this common ioy was yet more manifeſtly ſhewed, by the honourable courteſies the whole Senate, and people did beſtow on their ladies. For they were all throughly perſwaded, and did certainly beleeue, that the ladies onely were cauſe of the ſauing of the citie, and deliuering themſelues from the inſtant danger of the war. Wherupon the Senate ordained, that the magiſtrates to gratifie and honour theſe ladies, ſhould grant them all that they would require. And they onely requeſted that they would builde a temple of Fortune of the women, for the building whereof they offered themſelues to defray the whole charge of the ſacrifices, & other ceremonies belonging to the ſeruice of the gods. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate commending their goodwill and forwardneſſe, ordained, that the temple and image ſhould be made at the common charge of the citie. Notwithſtanding that, the ladies gathered money among them, and made with the ſame a ſecond image of Fortune, which the ROMAINES ſay did ſpeake as they offred her vp in the temple, and did ſet her in her place: and they affirme, that ſhe ſpake theſe words: Ladies, ye haue deuoutly offered me vp. Moreouer, that ſhe ſpake that twiſe together, making vs to beleeue things that neuer were, and are not to be credited. For to ſee images that ſeeme to ſweate or weepe, or to put forth any humor red or bloudie, it is not a thing vnpoſſible. For wood and ſtone do commonly receiue certaine moiſture, whereof is ingendred an humour, which do yeeld of themſelues, or do take of the aire, many ſorts and kinds of ſpots & colours: by which ſignes and tokens it is not amiſſe we thinke, that the gods ſometimes do warne men of things to come. And it is poſſible alſo, that theſe images and ſtatues do ſomtimes put forth ſounds, like vnto ſighes or mourning, when in the middeſt or bottome of the ſame, there is made ſome violent ſeparation, or breaking a ſunder of things, blowne or deuiſed therin: but that a body which hath neither life nor ſoule, ſhould haue any direct or exquiſite word formed in it by expreſſe voice, that is altogether vnpoſsible. For the ſoule, nor god himſelfe can diſtinctly ſpeake without a bodie, hauing neceſſarie organes and inſtruments meete for the parts of the ſame, to forme and vtter diſtinct words. But where ſtories many times do force vs to beleeue a thing reported to be true, by many graue teſtimonies: there we muſt ſay, that it is ſome paſsion contrarie to our fiue naturall ſences, which being begotten in the imaginatiue part or vnderſtanding, draweth an opinion vnto it ſelfe, euen as we do in our ſleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we do not heare: & we imagine we ſee, that we ſee not. Yet notwithſtanding, ſuch as are godly bent, & zealouſly giuen to thinke on heauenly things, ſo as they can no way be drawne from beleeuing that which is ſpoken of them, they haue this reaſon to ground the foundation of their beleefe vpō. That is, the omnipotency of God which is wonderfull, and hath no maner of reſemblance or likelineſſe of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrarie as touching our nature, our mouing, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing vnpoſsible to vs, or do bring forth & deuiſe things, without mans common reach and vnderſtanding, we muſt not therfore thinke it vnpoſsible at all. For if in other things he is far contrarie to vs, much more in his workes and ſecret operations, he farre paſſeth all the reſt: but the moſt part of Gods doings, as Heraclitus ſaith, for lack of faith, are hidden and vnknowne vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the citie of ANTIVM from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his authoritie: ſought diuerſe meanes to make him out of the way, thinking if he let ſlip that preſent time, he ſhould neuer recouer the like and fit occaſion againe. Wherefore Tullus hauing procured many other of his confederacie, required Martius might be depoſed from his eſtate, to render vp account to the VOLSCES of his charge & gouernment. Martius fearing to become a priuate man again vnder Tullus being generall (whoſe authority was greater otherwiſe, then any other among all the VOLSCES) anſwered: he was willing to giue vp his charge, and would reſigne it into the hands of the lords of the VOLSCES, if they did all command him, as by all their commandement he receiued it. And moreouer, that he would not refuſe euen at that preſent to giue vp an account vnto the people, if they would tarie the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counſell, in which aſſembly there were certaine oratours appointed, that ſtirred vp the cōmon people againſt him: & whē they had told their tales, Martius roſe vp to makethē anſwer. Now, notwithſtāding the mutinous people made a maruelos great noiſe, yet when they ſaw him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valiantneſſe, they quieted themſelues, and gaue ſtill audience to alledge with leaſure what he could for his purgation. Moreouer, the honeſteſt men of the ANTIATES, and who moſt reioyced in peace, ſhewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly, and iudge alſo according to their conſcience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him ſpeake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, becauſe amongſt other things he had an eloquent tongue, beſides that the firſt good ſeruice he had done to the people of the VOLSCES, did win him more fauour, then theſe laſt accuſations could purchaſe him diſpleaſure: and furthermore, the offence they laide to his charge, was a teſtimonie of the good will they ought him, for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the citie of ROME, if they had not bene very neere taking of it, by meanes of his approache and conduction. For theſe cauſes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterpriſe, neither to tarie for the mutining and riſing of the common people againſt him: wherefore, thoſe that were of the conſpiracie, beganne to crie out that he was not to be heard, nor that they would not ſuffer a traytour to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer the Tribe of the VOLSCES, who would not yeeld vp his eſtate and authoritie. And in ſaying theſe words, they all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to reſcue him. Howbeit it is a clere caſe, that this murder was not generally conſented vnto, of the moſt part of the VOLSCES: for men came out of all partes to honour his bodie, and did honourably burie him, ſetting out his tombe with great ſtore of armour and ſpoiles, as the tombe of a worthy perſon and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderſtanding of his death, ſhewed no other honour or malice, ſauing that they graunted the ladies the requeſt they made: that they might mourne tenne monethes for him, and that was the full time they vſed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethren, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who ſtabliſhed the ſame, as we haue enlarged more amply in the deſcription of his life. Now Martius being dead, the whole ſtate of the VOLSCES hartily wiſhed him aliue againe. For firſt of al they fell out with the ÆQVES (who were their friends & confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrel grew on ſo farre betweene them, that fraies and murders fell out vpon it one with another. After that the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was ſlaine in the field, and the flower of all their force was put to the ſword: ſo that they were compelled to accept moſt ſhamefull conditions of peace, in yeelding themſelues ſubiect vnto the conquerers, and promiſing to be obedient at their commaundement.

THE COMPARISON OF ## Alcibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

NOW that we haue written all the deedes of worthie memorie, done by either of them both: we may preſently diſcerne, that in matters of warre, the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were a like hardie & valiant for their perſons, as alſo wiſe and politike in the warres: vnleſſe they will ſay, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battels with his enemies, both by ſea and land, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had alwaies the victorie of his enemies. For otherwiſe, in this they were much a like: that where they were both preſent and had charge and power to commaund, all things proſpered notably, and with good ſucceſſe on the part they were of: and alſo when they tooke the contrarie ſide, they made the firſt haue the worſe euery way. Now for matters of gouenement, the noble men and honeſt citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man moſt diſſolute, and giuen to flatterie: becauſe he euer ſtudied by all deuiſe he could, to currie fauour with the common people. So did the Romaines malice alſo Coriolanus gouernmēt; for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithſtanding he is leſſe to be blamed, that ſeeketh to pleaſe and gratifie his common people: then he that deſpiſeth and diſdaineth them, and therefore offereth them wrong and iniurie, becauſe he would not ſeeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credit: euen ſo is it beſides diſhoneſty, and iniuſtice alſo, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make himſelfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honeſt natured man, plaine and ſimple, without art or cunning: Howbeit Alcibiades merely contrarie, for he was fine, ſubtill, and deceiptfull. And the greateſt fault they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceipt, wherewith he abuſed the ambaſſadours of the Lacedæmonians, & that he was a let that peace was not cōcluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this acte he ſodainely brought the citie of Athens into warres, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the Mantinians and the Argives, who by Alcibiades practiſe entred into league with the Athenians. And Martius, as Dionyſius the hiſtoriographer writeth: did by craft and deceipt bring the Romaines into warres againſt the Volsces, cauſing the Volsces maliciouſly and wrongfully to be ſuſpected, that went to Rome to ſee the games plaide. But the cauſe why he did it, made the fact ſo much more foule and wicked. For it was not done for any ciuill diſſention, nor for any iealouſie and contention in matters of gouernement, as Alcibiades did: but onely following his cholericke moode, that would be pleaſed with no thing, as Dion ſaid he would needes trouble and turmoyle the moſt part of Italie, and ſo being angrie with his countrie, he deſtroyed many other townes and cities that could not helpe it, nor doe withall. This is true alſo, that Alcibiades ſpight & malice did worke great miſchiefe and miſerie to his countrie: but when he ſawe they repented them of the iniurie they had done him, he came to himſelf, & did withdraw his armie. Another time alſo, when they had baniſhed Alcibiades, he would not yet ſuffer the captaines of the Athenians to run into great errors, neither would he ſee them caſt away, by following ill counſell which they tooke, neither would he forſake them in any daunger they put themſelues into. But he did the very ſame that Ariſtides had done in old time vnto Themiſtocles, for which he was then, and is yet ſo greatly praiſed. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the armie of the Athenians, although they were not his friends, and told them wherein they did amiſſe, and what they had further to doe. Where Martius to the contrarie, did firſt great hurt vnto the whole citie of Rome, though all in Rome had not generally offended him: yea, and when the beſt and chiefeſt part of the citie were grieued for his ſake, and were very ſory and angry for the iniurie done him. Furthermore, the Romaines ſought to appeaſe one onely diſpleaſure and deſpight they had done him by many ambaſſades, petitions and requeſtes they made, wherunto he neuer yeelded while his mother, wife and children came, his heart was ſo hardned. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would harken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to deſtroy and ſpoile his countrie, and not as though he ment to recouer it, or to returne thither againe. Here was in deede the difference betwene them: that ſpials being laid by the Lacedæmonians to kil Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as alſo for that they were affraide of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to Athens. Where Martius contrariwiſe, hauing bene ſo honorably receiued and entertained by the Volsces, he could not with honeſtie forſake them, conſidering that they had done him that honour, as to chuſe him their generall, & truſted him ſo farre, as they put al their whole army & power into his hands: and not as the other, whom the Lacedæmonians rather abuſed then vſed him, ſuffering him to go vp and downe their citie (and afterwardes in the middeſt of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the ende Alcibiades was compelled to put himſelfe into the hands of Tiſaphernes: vnleſſe they will ſay that he went thither of purpoſe to him, with intent to ſaue the citie of Athens frō vtter deſtruction, for the deſire he had to returne home againe. Moreouer, we read of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with money: and when he had it, he would moſt licentiouſly and diſhoneſtly ſpend it. Where Martius

in contrarie manner would not ſo much as accept giſts lawfully offered him by his captaines to honour him for his valiantneſſe. And the cauſe why the people did beare him ſuch ill will, for the controuerſie they had with the Nobilitie about clearing of debts, grew: for that they knew well enough it was not for any gaine or benefite he had gotten thereby, ſo much as it was for ſpight and diſpleaſure he thought to doe them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Ariſtotle the philoſopher, doth not without cauſe commende the ſingular giftes that were in Alcibiades, and this ineſpecially: that he paſſed all other for winning mens good willes. Whereas all Martius noble actes and vertues, wanting that affabilitie, became hatefull euen to thoſe that receiued benefite by them, who could not abide his ſeueritie and ſelfe will: which cauſeth deſolation (as Plato ſaith) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forſaken. Contrariwiſe, ſeeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainment, and a very good grace with him, & could faſhion himſelfe in all companies: it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriouſly commended, and himſelfe much honoured and beloued of the people, conſidering that ſome faultes he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of ſport, and toyes of pleaſure. And this was the cauſe, that though many times he did great hurt to the common wealth, yet they did oft make him their generall, and truſted him with the charge of the whole citie. Where Martius ſuing for an office of honour that was due to him, for the ſundrie good ſeruices he had done to the ſtate, was notwithſtanding repulſed, and put by. Thus doe we ſee, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honoured his vertue, had no liking to loue his perſon. Martius alſo did neuer any great exploit, being generall of his countrie men, but when he was generall of their enemies againſt his naturall countrie: wheras Alcibiades, being both a priuate perſon, and a generall, did notable ſeruice vnto the ATHENIANS. By reaſon whereof, Alcibiades whereſoeuer he was preſent, had the vpper hand euer of his accuſers, euen as he would himſelfe, and their accuſations tooke no place againſt him: vnleſſe it were in his abſence. Where Martius being preſent, was condemned by the ROMAINES: and in his perſon murdered and ſlaine by the VOLSCES. But here I can not ſay they haue done well, nor iuſtly, albeit himſelfe gaue them ſome colour to doe it, when he openly denied the ROMAINE Ambaſſadors peace, which after he priuately granted, at the requeſt of women. So by this deede of his, he tooke not away the enmitie that was betwene both people: but leauing warre ſtill betweene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whom he was generall) to looſe the oportunitie of noble victorie. Where in deede he ſhould (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawen his armie with their counſell & conſent, that had repoſed ſo great affiance in him, in making him their generall: if he had made that account of them, as their good will towards him did in dutie binde him. Or elſe, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterpriſe of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it off when his anger was blowen ouer: yet he had no reaſon for the loue of his mother to pardone his countrie, but rather he ſhould in pardoning his countrie, haue ſpared his mother, becauſe his mother & wife were members of the bodie of his countrie & citie, which he did beſiege. For in that he vncourteouſly reiected all publique petitions, requeſts of Ambaſſadors, intreaties of the biſhops and prieſtes, to gratifie onely the requeſt of his mother with his departure: that was no act ſo much to honour his mother with, as to diſhonour his countrie by, the which was preſerued for the pitie and interceſſion of a woman, & not for the loue of it ſelfe, as if it had not bene worthie of it. And ſo was this departure a grace, to ſay truly, very odious & cruell, and deſerued no thankes of either partie, to him that did it. For he withdrew his armie, not at the requeſt of the ROMAINES, againſt whom he made warre: nor with their conſent, at whoſe charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill hap, the auſteritie of his nature, and his haughtie obſtinate minde, was the only cauſe: the which of it ſelfe being hateful to the world, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churliſh, fierce, and intollerable. For men that haue that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, ſeeming thereby as though they made no eſtimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other ſide, if the people ſhould not giue them honour & reuerence, they would ſtraight take it in ſcorne, and litle care for the matter. For ſo did Metellus. Ariſtiades, & Epaminondas, all vſed this maner: not to ſeeke the goodwil of the cōmon people by flattery & diſſimulation: which was indeed, becauſe they deſpiſed that which the people could giue or take away. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and ſet at any fines, or that they baniſhed them, or gaue them any other repulſe: but they loued them as well as they did before, ſo ſoone as they ſhewed any token of repentance, & that they were ſorie for the wrong they had done them, & were eaſily made friends againe with them, after they were reſtored from their baniſhment. For he that diſdaineth to make much of the people, & to haue their fauour, ſhould much more ſcorne to ſeeke to be reuenged when he is repulſed. For, to take a repulſe and deniall of honour ſo inwardly to the heart, cõmeth of no other cauſe, but that he did too earneſtly deſire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not diſſemble at all, that he was not very glad to ſee himſelfe honored, and ſorie to be reiected & denied any honour: but alſo he ſought all the meanes he could to make himſelfe beloued of thoſe amongeſt whom he liued. Whereas Martius ſtoutnes, & haughtie ſtomacke, did ſtay him from making much of thoſe, that might aduance and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnaw himſelfe for ſpight and anger, when he ſaw he was deſpiſed. And this is all that reaſonably may be reproued in him: for otherwiſe he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of bribes and money, he may be compared with the moſt perfect, vertuous, and honeſt men of all GRECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was in that vndoubtedly alwaies too licentious and looſely giuen, and had too ſmall regard of his regard and honeſtie.

PAVL. AEMILIVS.

WHEN I firſt beganne to write theſe liues, my intent was to profit other: but ſince, continuing and going on, I haue much profited my ſelf by looking into theſe hiſtories, as if I looked into a glaſſe, to frame and faſhion my life, to the mould and patterne of theſe vertuous noblemen. For running ouer their manners in this ſort, and ſeeking alſo to deſcribe their liues: me thinkes I am ſtill conuerſant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruſe their hiſtories, and to waye the vertues and qualities they haue had, and what ſingularitie ech of them poſſeſſed: and to chuſe and cull out the chiefeſt things of note in them, and their beſt ſpeeches and doings moſt worthie of memorie: Then I crie out, O goddes, can there be more paſsing pleaſure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man ciuill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the philoſopher writeth, that we ſhould pray we might euer ſee happie images and ſightes in the aire, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to vs, then that is euill and vnfortunate: preſuppoſing a falſe opinion and doctrine in philoſophy, which allureth men to infinit ſuperſtitions. That there are good and bad images flying in the aire, which giue a good or ill impreſſion vnto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of auncient hiſtories, and gathering theſe lines together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping alwaies in mind the actes of the moſt noble, vertuous, and beſt giuen men of former age, and worthie memory: I doe teache and prepare my ſelfe to ſhake off and baniſh from me all lewd and diſhoneſt condition, if by chaunce the company and conuerſation of them whoſe companie I keepe, and muſt of neceſſity haunt, doe acquaint mee with ſome vnhappy or vngracious touche. This is eaſie vnto me, that do diſpoſe my quiet minde, and not troubled with any paſſion, vnto the deepe conſideration of ſo many noble examples. As I doe preſent vnto you now in this volume, the liues of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus AEmylius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good and an vpright mind with them, but were alſo fortunate and happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you ſhall hardly iudge, when you haue red ouer their liues, whether wiſedome, or good fortune brought them to atchieue to ſuch honourable actes and exploits as they did. Many ( and the moſt part of hiſtoriographers ) doe write, that the houſe and family of the AEmylians in ROME, was alwaies of the moſt auncient of the nobility, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme alſo, that the firſt of the houſe that gaue name to all the poſterity after, was Marcus, the ſonne of Pythagoras the wiſe, whom king Numa for the ſweetneſſe and pleaſaunt grace of his tongue, ſurnamed Marcus AEmylius: and thoſe ſpecially affirme it, that ſay king Numa was Pythagoras ſcholler. Howſoeuer it was, the moſt part of this family that obtained honour and eſtimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate alſo in all their doings, ſauing Lucius Paulus only, who died in the battell of CANNES. But his misfortune doth beare manifeſt teſtimony of his wiſedome and valiancy together. For he was forced to fight againſt his will, when hee ſaw he could not bridle the raſhneſſe of his fellow Conſul that would needes ioyne battell, and to doe as he did, ſauing that he fled not as the other, who being firſt procurer of the battell, was the fiſt that ranne awaie: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to let him, and did ſticke by it, and fought it valiantly vnto the laſt gaſpe. This AEmylius left a daughter behind him called AEmylia, which was maried vnto Scipio the great: and a ſonne, Paulus AEmylius, being the ſame man whoſe life we preſently treat of. His youth fortunatly fell out in a floriſhing time of glory and honour, through the ſundry vertues of many great and noble perſons liuing in thoſe daies, among whom he made his name famous alſo: and it was not by that ordinary art and courſe, which the beſt eſteemed young men of that age did take and follow. For he did not vſe to plead priuate mens cauſes in law, neither would creepe into mens fauour by fawning vpon any of them: though he ſaw it a common practiſe, and policy of men, to ſeeke the peoples fauour and good wils by ſuch meanes. Moreouer, he refuſed not that common courſe which other tooke, for that it was contray to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had beene ſo diſpoſed: but he rather ſought to winne reputation by his honeſty, his valiantneſſe, and vpright dealing, as chooſing that the better way, then either of the other two, in ſo much as in maruellous ſhort time he paſſed all thoſe that were of his age. The firſt office of honor he ſued for, was the office of AEdilis, in which ſute he was preferred before twelue other that ſued for the ſelfe ſame office: who were men of no ſmall quality, for they all came afterwardes to be Conſuls. After this, he was choſen to be one of the number of the prieſtes, whom the ROMAINES call Augures: who haue the charge of all the diuinations and ſoothſayings, in telling of things to come by flying of birdes, and ſignes in the aire. He was ſo carefull, and tooke ſuch paines to vnderſtand how the ROMAINES did vſe the ſame, and with ſuch diligence ſought the obſeruation of the auncient religion of ROMAINS in all holy matters: that where that prieſthood was before eſteemed but a title of honour, and deſired for the name only: he brought it to paſſe, that it was the moſt honorable ſcience, & beſt reputed of in ROME. Wherein he confirmed the philoſophers opinion: that religion is the knowledge how to ſerue God. For when he did any thing belonging to his office of prieſthood, he did it with great experience, iudgement, and diligence, leauing all other thoughts, and without omitting any auncient ceremony, or adding to any new, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which ſeemed light, and of ſmall moment: declaring vnto them, that though we doe preſume the goddes are eaſie to be pacified, and that they readily pardon all faultes and ſcapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for reſpect of common wealths ſake, they ſhould not ſlightly, not careleſly diſſemble or paſſe ouer faults committed in thoſe matters. For no man (ſaieth he) at the firſt that committeth any fault, doth alone trouble the ſtate of the common wealth: but withall, we muſt thinke hee leaueth the groundes of ciuill gouernment, that is not as carefull to keepe the inſtitutions of ſmall matters, as alſo of the great. So was he alſo a ſeuere captaine, and ſtrict obſeruer of all marſhall diſcipline, not ſeeking to winne the ſouldiers loue by flattery, when he was generall in the field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a ſecond charge, by ſhewing him ſelfe gentle and curteous in the firſt, vnto thoſe that ſerued vnder him: but him ſelfe did orderly ſhew them the very rules and precepts of the diſcipline of warres, euen as a prieſt that ſhould expreſſe the names and ceremonies of ſome holy ſacrifice, wherein were daunger to omitte any part or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the law of armes vpon rebellious and diſobedient ſouldiers, he kept vp thereby the ſtate of the common weale the better: iudging, to ouercome the enemy by force, was but an acceſſarie as a man may terme it, in reſpect of well training and ordering his citizens by good diſcipline. While the ROMAINES were in warres againſt king Antiochus ſurnamed the great, in the South partes: all the chiefeſt captaines of ROME being employed that waies, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the Weſt partes towardes SPAINE, where they were all vp in armes. Thither they ſent Æmylius Prætor, not with ſixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue: ſo that vnder the name of Prætor, he had the authority and dignity of a Conſull. He twiſe ouercame the barbarous people in mayne battell, and ſlue a thirty thouſand of them, and got this victory through his great skill and wiſedome, in chooſing the aduauntage of place and time, to fight with his enemies, euen as they paſſed ouer a riuer: which eaſily gaue his ſouldiers the victory. Moreouer he tooke there, two hundred and fifty cities, all which did open, and gladly receiue him in. So, leauing all that countrey quiet and in good peace, and hauing receiued their fealty by othe made betweene his hands, he returned againe to ROME, not enriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke litle regard to his expences, he ſpent ſo franckly, neither was his purſe his maiſter, though his reuenue was not great to beare it out as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had, was litle enough to ſatiſfie his wifes ioynter. His firſt wife was Papyria, the daughter of a noble Conſull Papyrius Maſſo, and after they had liued a long time together, he was diuorced from her, notwithſtanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the ſecond, and Fabius Maximus. The iuſt cauſe of the diuorce betweene them, appeareth not to vs in writing: but me thinkes the tale that is told concerning the ſeperation of a certaine mariage is true. That a certaine ROMAINE hauing forſaken his wife, her friends fell out with him, and asked him: what fault doſt thou find in her? is ſhe not honeſt of her body? is ſhee not faire? doth ſhe not bring thee goodly children? But he putting forth his foote, ſhewed them his ſhooe, and aunſwered them. Is not this a goodly ſhooe? is it not finely made? and is it not new? yet I dare ſay there is neuer a one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to ſay truely, great and open faultes are commonly occaſions to make husbands put away their wiues: but yet oftentimes houſhold wordes runne ſo betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diuerſity of natures, which ſtraungers are not priuie vnto) that in proceſſe of time they doe beget ſuch a ſtraunge alteration of loue and mindes in them, as one houſe can no longer holde them. So Æmylius, hauing put away Papyria his firſt wife, he maried another that brought him two ſonnes, which he brought vp with him ſelfe in his houſe, and gaue his two firſt ſonnes (to wit, Scipio the ſecond, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption, to two of the nobleſt and richeſt families of the city of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was fiue times Conſul, and the yonger vnto the houſe of the Cornelians, whom the ſonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN did adopt, being his coſiu germaine and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the ſonne of Cato maried the one, and AElius Tubero the other, who was a maruellous honeſt man, and did more nobly maintaine him ſelfe in his pouerty, then any other ROMAINE: for they were ſixteene perſons all of one name, and of the houſe of the AElians, very neare a kinne one to the other, who had all but one litle houſe in the city, and a ſmall farme in the countrey, wherewith they entertained them ſelues, and liued all together in one houſe, with their wiues, and many litle children. Amongeſt their wiues, one of them was the daughter of Paulus AEmylius, after he had bene twiſe Conſul, and had triumphed twiſe, not being aſhamed of her husbands pouerty, but wondering at his vertue that made him poore. Wheras bretheren and kinſemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not farre a ſunder, and in other countries, not one neare another, and that riuers part them not, or wals deuide their lands, leauing great large waſtes betweene them: they are neuer quiet, but ſtill in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this ſtory lay before the wiſe, and well aduiſed readers, to learne thereby how to frame their life, and wiſely to behaue them ſelues. Now AEmylius being choſen Conſul, went to make warre with the LIGVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, and which otherwiſe are called LIGVSTINES. Theſe are very valiaunt and warlike men, and were very good ſouldiers at that time, by reaſon of their continuall wars againſt the ROMAINES, whoſe neare neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furtheſt part of ITALY, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foote ioyneth to the THVSCAN ſea, and pointeth towards AFRICK, and are mingled with the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, neighbours vnto the ſea coaſt: who ſcowring all the Mediterraniā ſea at that time, vnto the ſtraight of Hercules pillers, did with their litle light pinnaſes of pirats, let all the trafficke and entercourſe of marchandiſe. AEmylius being gone to ſeeke them in their countrey, they taried his comming with an army of forty thouſand men: neuertheles, though he had but eight thouſand men in all, and that they were fiue to one of his, yet he gaue the onſet vpon them, and ouerthrew them, and draue them into their cities. Then he ſent to offer thē peace, for the ROMAINS would not altogether deſtroy the LIGVRIANS, becauſe their countrey was as a rampier or bulwarke againſt the inuaſion of the GAVIS, who lay lurking for oportunity and occaſion to inuade ITALIE: whereupon theſe LIGVRIANS yeelded them ſelues vnto him, and put all their fortes and ſhips into his hands. AEmylius deliuered vnto them their holdes againe, without other hurt done vnto them, ſauing that he raſed the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he tooke all their ſhippes from them, leauing them litle botes of three owers onely, and no greater, and ſet all the priſoners at liberty they had taken, both by ſea and by land, aſwell ROMAINS as other, which were a maruellous number. Theſe were all the notable actes he did worthy memory, in the firſt yeare of his Conſulſhip. Afterwards, he oſtentimes ſhewed himſelfe very deſirous to be Conſul againe, and did put forth himſelfe to ſue for it: but when he was denied it, he neuer after made ſute for it againe, but gaue himſelfe onely to ſtudy diuine things, and to ſee his children vertuouſly brought vp, not onely in the ROMAINE tongue which him ſelfe was taught, but alſo a litle more curiouſly in the GREEKE tongue. For he did not only retaine Grammarians, Rethoricians, and Logitians, but alſo painters, grauers of images, riders of horſes, and hunts of GREECE about his children: and he him ſelfe alſo (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with them in the ſchoole when they were at their bookes, and alſo when they otherwiſe did exerciſe them ſelues. For he loued his children as much, or more then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the ſtate of the common wealth, the ROMAINS were at wars with king Perſeus, and they much blamed the captaines they had ſent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and courage, they had ſo cowardly behaued them ſelues, as their enemies laughed them to ſcorne: and they receiued more hurt of them, then they did vnto the King. For not long before, they had driuen King Antiochus beyond mount Taurus, and had made him forſake the reſt of ASIA, and had ſhut him vp within the borders of SYRIA, who was glad that hee had bought that countrey with fifteene thouſand talents, which he paid for a fine. A litle before alſo, they had ouercome

Philip, king of MACEDON, in THESSALY, and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreouer, hauing ouercom Hanniball (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the world was comparable, either for his power or valiantnes) they thought this too great a diſhonour to them, that this warre they had againſt King Perſeus, ſhould hold ſo long of euen hand with them, as if he had beene an enemy equall with the people of ROME: conſidering alſo that they fought not againſt them, but with the refuſe and ſcattered people of the ouerthrowen army his father had loſt before, and knew not that Philip had left his army ſtronger, and more expert by reaſon of his ouerthrow, then it was before. As I will briefly rehearſe the ſtory from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greateſt power of all the captaines and ſucceſſours of Alexander the great, hauing obtained for him ſelfe and his poſterity the title of a King, had a ſonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the ſecond, that was ſurnamed Gonatas, whoſe ſonne was alſo called Demetrius, that raigned no long time, but died, and left a young ſonne called Philippe. By reaſon whereof, the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme ſhould be left without heire: they preferred one Antigonus, coſin to the laſt deceaſed King, and made him marie the mother of Philip the leſſe, giuing him the name at the firſt of the Kings protectour onely, and lieutenaunt generall of his maieſty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wiſe prince, and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the abſolute name of a King, and ſurnamed him Doſon, to ſay, the giuer: for he promiſed much and gaue litle. After him raigned Philip, who in his greene youth gaue more hope of him ſelfe, then any other of the Kings before: in ſo much they thought that one day he would reſtore MACEDON her auncient fame and glory, and that he alone would plucke downe the pride and power of the ROMAINS, who roſe againſt all the world. But after that he had loſt a great battell, and was ouerthrowen by Titus Quintus Flaminius neare vnto the city of SCOTVSA: then he beganne to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercy of the ROMAINES, thinking hee eſcaped good cheape, for any light ranſome or tribute the ROMAINES ſhould impoſe vpon him. Yet afterwards comming to vnderſtand him ſelfe, he grew to diſdaine it much, thinking that to raigne through the fauour of the ROMAINES, was but to make him ſelfe a ſlaue, to ſeeke to liue in pleaſure at his eaſe, and not for a valiaunt and noble prince borne. Whereupon he ſet all his minde, to ſtudy the diſcipline of wars, and made his preparations as wiſely and cloſely, as poſſibly he could. For he left all his towns alongſt the ſea coaſt, and ſtanding vpō any high waies, without any fortification at all, and in manner deſolate without people: to the end there might appeare no occaſion of doubt or miſtruſt in him: and in the meane time, in the high countries of his Realme farre from great beaten waies, he leauied a great number of men of war, and repleniſhed his towns and ſtrong holds that lay ſcatteringly abroad, with armour and weapon, money, and men, prouiding for war, which he kept as ſecretly as he could. For he had prouiſion of armour in his armory, to arme thirty thouſand men, and eight million buſſhels of corn ſafely lockt vp in his forts and ſtronger places, and ready money, as much as would ſerue to entertaine tenne thouſand ſtraungers in pay, to defend his countrey for the ſpace of tenne yeares. But before he could bring that to paſſe he had purpoſed, he died for griefe and ſorrow, after he knew he had vniuſtly put Demetrius the beſt of his ſonnes to death, vppon the falſe accuſation of the worſt, that was Perſeus: who as he did inherite the Kingdome of his father by ſucceſſion, ſo did he alſo inherite his fathers malice againſt the ROMAINES. But he had no ſhoulders to beare ſo heauy a burden, and eſpecially being as he was, a man of ſo vile and wicked nature: for among many lewd and naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous & miſerable. They ſay alſo, that he was not legitimate, becauſe Philippes wife had taken him from Gnathainia (a tailours wife borne at ARGOS) immediatly after he was borne, & did adopt the childe to be hers. And ſome thinke that this was the chiefeſt cauſe why he practiſed to put Demetrius to death, fearing leaſt this lawfull ſon would ſeeke occaſion to proue him a baſtard. Notwithſtanding, ſimple though he was, and of vile and baſe nature, he found the ſtrength of his Kingdome ſo great, that he was contented to take vpon him to make warre againſt the ROMAINS, which he maintained a long time, and fought againſt their Conſuls, that were their generalles, & repulſed great armies of theirs both by ſea and land, and ouercame ſome. As Publius Licinius among other, the firſt that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrowen by him in a battel of horſmen, where he ſlew at that time two thouſand fiue hundred good mē of his, & tooke ſixe hundred priſoners. And their armie by ſea, riding at ancker before the citie of OREVM, he did ſodainly ſet vpon, and tooke twentie great ſhips of burden, & all that was in them, and ſunke the reſt, which were all loden with corne: and tooke of all ſorts beſides, about 54. foyſtes, and galliots of fiftie owers a peece. The ſecond Conſull and generall he fought with all, was Hoſtilius, whom he repulſed, attempting by force to inuade MACEDON by way of the citie of ELVMIA. Another time againe, when he entred in by ſtealth vpon the coaſt of THESSALY, he offred him battell, but the other durſt not abide it. Furthermore, as though the war troubled him nothing at all, & that he had cared litle for the ROMAINES: he went & fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he ſlew ten thouſand of thoſe barbarous people, & brought a maruellous great ſpoile away with him. Moreouer he procured the nation of the GAVLES dwelling vpon the riuer of Danubie, which they call Baſtarnæ (men very warlike, & excellent good horſemē) & did practiſe with the ILLYRIANS alſo by mean of their king Gentius, to make them ioine with him in theſe wars: ſo that there ran a rumour all about, that for money he had gotten theſe GAVLES to come downe into ITALIE, from the high country of GAVLE, al alongſt the Adriatike ſea. The ROMAINES being aduertiſed of theſe news, thought the time ſerued not now to diſpoſe their offices in warres any more by grace and fauour vnto thoſe that ſued for them: but contrariwiſe, that they ſhould call ſome noble man that were very ſkilful and a wiſe captain, and could diſcreetly gouerne & performe things of great charge. As Paulus Æmilius, a man well ſtepped on in yeres, being three ſcore yere old, and yet of good power, by reaſon of the luſtie young men his ſonnes, & ſonnes in law, beſides a great number of his friends and kinſefolke. So all that bare great authoritie, did altogether with one conſent counſell him to obey the people, which called him to the Conſulſhip. At the beginning indeede he delayed the people much that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them: ſaying, he was no meete man neither to deſire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the end, ſeeing the people did vrge it vpon him, by knocking continually at his gates, & calling him aloud in the ſtreetes, willing him to come into the market place, & perceiuing they were angrie with him, becauſe he refuſed it: he was content to be perſwaded. And when he ſtood among them that ſued for the Conſulſhip, the people thought ſtraight that he ſtood not there ſo much for deſire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of aſſured victorie, and happie ſucceſſe of this begunne warre: ſo great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they choſe him Conſull againe the ſecond time. Wherefore ſo ſoone as he was choſen, they would not proceede to drawing of lots according to their cuſtome, which of the two Conſuls ſhould happen to go into MACEDON: but preſently with a full and whole conſent of them all, they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Conſull now, and appointed to make warre vpon king Perſeus, all the people did honourably companie him home vnto his houſe: where a litle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making much of her: asked her why ſhe wept. The poore girle anſwered, colling him about the neck, and kiſsing him: Alas, father, wote you what? our Perſeus is dead. She ment it by a little whelpe ſo called, which was her play fellow. In good houre, my girle, ſaid he, I like the ſigne well. Thus doth Cicero the orator report of it in his booke of diuinations. The ROMAINES had a cuſtome at that time, that ſuch as were elected Conſuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) ſhould make an oration of thankes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had ſhewed him. The people then (according to the cuſtome) being gathered together to heare Æmylius ſpeake, he made this oration vnto them. That the firſt time he ſued to be Conſull, was in reſpect of himſelfe, ſtanding at that time in neede of ſuch honour: now he offered himſelfe the ſecond time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who ſtood in neede of a generall, wherefore he thought himſelfe nothing bound nor beholding vnto them now. And if they did thinke alſo this warre might be better followed by any other, then by himſelfe, he would preſently with all his heart reſigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any truſt or confidence in him, that they thought him a man ſufficient to diſcharge it: then that they would not ſpeake nor meddle in » any matter that concerned his dutie, and the office of a generall, ſauing onely, that they would » be diligent (without any words) to do whatſoeuer he commaunded, and ſhould be neceſſarie » for the warre and ſeruice they tooke in hand. For if euery man would be a commander, as they » had bene heretofore, of thoſe by whom they ſhould be commaunded: then the world would » more laugh them to ſcorne in this ſeruice, then euer before had bin accuſtomed. Theſe words made the ROMAINES very obedient to him, and conceiued good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refuſed thoſe ambitious flatterers that ſued for the charge, and had giuen it vnto a man, that durſt boldly and frankely tell them the troth. Marke how the ROMAINES by yeelding vnto reaſon and vertue, came to commaund all other, and to make themſelues the mightieſt people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius ſetting forward to this warre, had winde at will, and faire paſſage to bring him at his iourneys end: I impute it to good fortune, that ſo quickly and ſafely conueighed him to his campe. But for the reſt of his exploites, he did in all this warre, when part of them were performed by his owne hardineſſe, other by his wiſedome and good counſell, other by the diligence of his friends in ſeruing him with good will, other by his owne reſolute conſtancie and courage in extreameſt danger, and laſt, by his maruellous skil in determining at an inſtant what was to be done: I cannot attribute any notable acte or worthy ſeruice vnto this his good fortune, they talke of ſo much, as they may do in other captains doings. Vnles they wil ſay peraduenture, that Perſeus couetouſnes & miſerie was Æmylius good fortune: for his miſerable feare of ſpending money, was the only cauſe and deſtruction of the whole realme of MACEDON, which was in good ſtate and hope of continuing in proſperitie. For there came downe into the countrie of MACEDON at king Perſeus requeſt, ten thouſand Baſtarnæ a horſe back, and as many footemen to them, who alwaies ioyned with them in battell, all mercenary ſouldiers, depending vpon pay and entertainment of warres, as men that could not plowe nor ſowe, nor trafficke marchandiſe by ſea, nor skill of graſing to gaine their liuing with: and to be ſhort, that had no other occupation or marchandiſe, but to ſerue in the warres, and to ouercome thoſe with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incampe and lodge in the MEDICA, neere to the MACEDONIANS, who ſaw them ſo goodly great men, and ſo well trained & exerciſed in handling all kinde of weapons, ſo braue and luſty in words and threats againſt their enemies: they began to plucke vp their hearts, and to looke big, imagining that the ROMAINES would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to looke them in the face, and onely to ſee their marche, it was ſo terrible and fearfull. But Perſeus, after he had incouraged his men in this ſort, and had put them in ſuch a hope and iollitie, when this barbarous ſupply came to aske him a thouſand crownes in hand for euery captaine, he was ſo damped and troubled withall in his minde, caſting vp the ſumme it came to, that his onely couetouſneſſe and miſerie made him returne them back, and refuſe their ſeruice: not as one that ment to fight with the ROMAINES, but rather to ſpare his treaſure, and to be a husband for them, as if he ſhould haue giuen vp a ſtraight account vnto them of his charges in this warre, againſt whom he made it. And notwithſtanding alſo his enemies did teach him what he had to do, conſidering that beſides all other their warlike furniture and munition, they had no leſſe then a hundred thouſand fighting men lying in campe together, ready to execute the Conſuls commaundement. Yet he taking vpon him to reſiſt ſo puiſſant an armie, and to maintaine the wars, which forced his enemies to be at extreame charge in enterteining ſuch multitudes of men, and more then needed: hardly would depart with his gold and ſiluer, but kept it ſafe locked vp in his treaſurie, as if he had bene affraide to touche it, & had bene none of his. And he did not ſhew that he came of the noble race of theſe kings of LYDIA, and of PHOENICIA, who gloried to be riche: but ſhewed how by inheritance of bloud he chalenged ſome part of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both becauſe they eſteemed to buie victorie with money, not money with victorie, did many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common ſaying in olde time, that it was not Phillip, but his gold and ſiluer that wonne the cities of GRECE. And Alexander when he went to conquer the INDES, ſeeing the MACEDONIANS caty with them all the welth of PERSIA, which made his campe very heauie, and ſlowe to marche: he himſelfe first of all ſet fire of his owne cariage that conueied all his neceſſaries, and perſwaded other to do the like, that they might marche marche more lightlie, and eaſlier go on the iourney. But Perſeus contrarily would not ſpend any part of his goods, to ſaue himſelfe, his children and realme, but rather yeelded to be led priſoner in triumphe with a great ranſome, to ſhewe the ROMAINES how good a husband he had bene for them. For he did not onely ſend away the GAVLES without giuing them pay as he had promiſed, but moreouer hauing perſwaded Gentius king of ILLYRIA to take his part in theſe warres, for the ſumme of three hundred talents which he had promiſed to furniſh him with: he cauſed the money to be told, and put vp in bags by thoſe whom Gentius ſent to receiue it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himſelfe ſure of the money promiſed, committed a fond and fowle part: for he ſtayed the ambaſſadours the ROMAINES ſent vnto him, and committed them to priſon. This part being come to Perſeus eares, he thought now he needed not hire him with money to be an enemie to the ROMAINES, conſidering he had waded ſo farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifeſt ſigne of his ill will towards them, and that it was too late to looke back and repent him, now that his foule part had plunged him into certaine warres, for an vncertaine hope. So did he abuſe the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promiſed him. And worſe then this, ſhortly after he ſuffered Lucius Anicius the ROMAINE Prætor, whom they ſent againſt him with an armie, to pluck king Gentius, his wife, and children, out of his realme and kingdome, and to carie them priſoners with him. Now when AEmylius was arriued in MACEDON, to make warre againſt ſuch an enemie: he made no manner of reckoning of his perſon, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one campe he had foure thouſand horſemen, & no leſſe then fortie thouſand footemen, with the which armie he had planted himſelfe alongſt the ſea ſide, by the foote of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpoſſible to be approached: & there he had ſo well fortified all the ſtraites and paſſages vnto him with fortifications of wood, that he thought himſelfe to lie ſafe out of all danger, and imagined to dally with AEmylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. AEmylius in the meane ſeaſon lay not idle, but occupied his wits throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put ſome thing in proofe. And perceiuing that his ſouldiers by ouermuch licentious libertie (wherein by ſufferance they liued before) were angrie with delaying and lying ſtill, and that they did buſilie occupie themſelues in the generals office, ſaying this, and ſuch a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundly, and commaunded them they ſhould medle no more too curiouſlie in matters that pertained not to them, and that they ſhould take care for nothing elſe, but to ſee their armour, and weapon readie to ſerue valiantly, and to vſe their ſwords after the ROMAINES faſhion, when their generall ſhould appoint and commaund them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to themſelues, he commanded thoſe that watched, ſhould haue no ſpeares nor pikes, becauſe they ſhould be more wakefull, hauing no long weapon to reſiſt the enemie, if they were aſſaulted. The greateſt trouble his armie had, was lack of freſh water, becauſe the water that ranne to the ſea was very little, & maruellous foule by the ſea ſide. But AEmylius conſidering they were at the foote of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruellous height, and full of wood withall) coniectured, ſeeing the trees ſo freſh and greene, that there ſhould be ſome little pretie ſprings among them, which ran vnder the ground. So he made them dig many holes and wels alongſt the mountaine, which were ſtraight filled with faire water, being pent within ground before for lack of breaking open the heads, which then ran downe in ſtreames, and met together in ſundrie places. And yet ſome do denie, that there is any meeting of waters within the ground, from whence the ſprings do come. For they ſay, that running out of the earth as they do, it is not for that, that the water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendreth and riſeth at the ſame time and place where it runneth out, turning the ſubſtance into water, which is a moiſt vapour, thickneth & waxeth cold by the coldneſſe of the earth, and ſo becommeth a ſtreame, and runneth downe. Euen ſo, ſay they, as womens breſts are not alwaies full of milke, as milke pans are that continually keepe milke, but do of themſelues conuert the nutriment women take into milke, and after commeth forth at their nipples: the very like are ſprings and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, which haue no meeting of hidden waters, nor hollow places capable, readily to deliuer water frō them, as one would draw it out of a pompe or ſeſterne, from ſo many great brookes, and deepe riuers. But by their naturall coldneſſe & moiſture, they waxe thick, and put forth the vapour and aire ſo ſtrong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reaſon why the places where they dig and open the earth, do put forth more abundance of water by opening the ground: like as womens breſts do giue more milke, when they are moſt drawne and suckt, becauſe in a ſort they do better feed the vapour within them, and conuert it thereby into a running humour. Where, to the contrarie, thoſe parts of the earth that are not digged, nor haue no vent outward, are the more vnable, and leſſe meete to ingender water, hauing not that prouocation and courſe to run, that cauſeth the bringing forth of moiſture. Yet ſuch as maintaine this opinion, do giue them occaſion that loue argument, to contrarie them thus. Then we may ſay by like reaſon alſo, that in the bodies of beaſts there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendreth vpon a ſodaine, when they are hurt, by transferring of ſome ſpirit or fleſh that readily changeth into ſome running licoure. And moreouer, they are confuted by the common experience of theſe mine men, that dig in the mines for mettall, or that vndermine caſtels to win them: who when they dig any great depth, do many times meete in the bowels of the earth with running riuers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle and litle, as of neceſſitie it ſhould be, if it were true, that vpon the preſent opening of the ground, the humour ſhould immediatly be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we ſee oftentimes that in cutting through a mountaine or rock, ſodainly there runneth out a great quantitie of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to returne to our hiſtorie againe, AEmylius lay there a conuenient time, and ſtirred not: and it is ſaid there were neuer ſeene two ſo great armies one ſo neere to the other, and to be ſo quiet. In the end, caſting manie things with himſelfe, and deuiſing ſundrie practiſes, he was enformed of another way to enter into Macedon, through the countrie of Perræbia, ouer againſt the temple called Pythion, and the rock vpon which it is built, where there lay no garriſon: which gaue him better hope to paſſe that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrowneſſe and hardneſſe of the way vnto it. So, he brake the matter to his counſell. Thereupon Scipio called Naſica (the ſonne adopted of that great Scipio the African, who became afterwards a great mã, & was preſident of the Senate or counſell) was the firſt man that offred himſelfe to lead them, whom it would pleaſe him to ſend to take that paſſage, & to aſſault their enemies behind. The ſecond was Fabius Maximus, the eldeſt ſonne of AEmylius, who being but a very young man, roſe notwithſtanding, & offred himſelf very willingly. AEmylius was very glad of their offers, and gaue them not ſo many men as Polybius writeth, but ſo many as Naſica himſelfe declareth, in a letter of his he wrot to a king, where he reporteth all the ſtory of this iorney. There were 3000 Italians leauied in Italy, by the cõfederats of the Romains, who were not of the Romaine legions, & in the left wing about 5000. Beſides thoſe, Naſica toke alſo 120 men at armes, & about 200 Cretans & Thracians mingled together, of thoſe Harpalus had ſent thither. With this number Naſica departed from the campe, & tooke his way toward the ſea ſide, & lodged by the temple of Hercules, as if he had determined to do this feat by ſea, to enuiron the campe of the enemies behind. But when the ſoldiers had ſupped, and that it was darke night, he made the captaines of euery band priuie to his enterpriſe, and ſo marched all night a contrary way from the ſea, vntill at the length they came vnder the temple of Pythion, where he lodged to reſt the ſoldiers that were ſore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus is aboue ten furlong high, as appeareth in a place ingrauen by him that meaſured it.

Yet the Geometricians ſay, that there is no mountaine higher, nor ſea deeper, then the length of tenne furlongs: ſo that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his meaſure at auenture, and by geſſe, but by true rules of the arte, and inſtrumentes Geometricall. There Naſica reſted all night. King Perſeus perceiuing in the meane time that Æmilius ſtirred not from the place where he lay, miſtruſted nothing his practiſe, and the comming of Naſica who was at hand: vntill ſuch time as a traytour of CRETA (ſtealing from Naſica) did reueale vnto him the pretended practiſe, as alſo the ROMAINES compaſſing of him about. He wondred much at theſe newes, howbeit he remoued not his campe from the place he laie in, but diſpatched one of his captaines called Milon, with tenne thouſand ſtraungers, and two thouſand MACEDONIANS: and ſtraightly commanded him with all the poſſible ſpeede he could, to get the toppe of the hill before them. Polybius ſaieth, that the ROMAINES came and gaue them an alarom, when they were ſleeping. But Naſica writeth, that there was a maruellous ſharpe and terrible battell on the toppe of the mountaine: and ſaide plainely, that a THRACIAN ſouldier comming towardes him, he threw his dart at him, and hitting him right in the breaſt, ſlew him ſtarke dead: and hauing repulſed their enemies, Milon their captaine ſhamefully running away in his coat without armour or weapon, he followed him without any daunger, and ſo went downe to the valley, with the ſafetie of all his companie. This conflict fortuning thus, Perſeus raiſed his campe in great haſte from the place where he was, and being diſapointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits ende, and not knowing how to determine. Yet was he conſtrained either to ſtay, and incampe before the citie of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battell: or elſe to deuide his armie into his cities & ſtrong holdes, and to receiue the warres within his owne countrie, the which being once crept in, could neuer be driuen out againe, without great murder & bloudſhed. Hereupon his friends did counſell him, to chuſe rather the fortune of battell: alledging vnto him, that he was the ſtronger in men a great way, and that the MACEDONIANS would fight luſtily with all the courage they could, conſidering that they fought for the ſafetie of their wiues & children, and alſo in the preſence of their king, who ſhould both ſee euery mans doing, & fight himſelfe in perſon alſo for them. The king moued by theſe perſwaſions, determined to venter the chance of battell. So he pitched his campe, and viewed the ſituation of the places all about, and deuided the companies amongeſt his captaines, purpoſing to giue a whotte charge vpon the enemies when they ſhould draw neere. The place and countrie was ſuch, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to raunge a battell of footemen in, and litle pretie hils alſo one depending vpon another, which were very commodious for archers, naked men, and ſuch as were lightly armed, to retire themſelues vnto being diſtreſſed, & alſo to enuiron their enemies behind. There were two ſmall riuers alſo, Æſon and Leucus that ranne through the ſame, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the latter end of the ſommer, yet they would annoy the ROMAINES notwithſtanding. Now when Æmilius was ioyned with Naſica, he marched on ſtraight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiuing a farre off their battell marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the ſame: hee wondred to behold it, and ſodainely ſtaied his armie, conſidering with himſelfe what he had to doe. Then the young captaines hauing charge vnder him, deſirous to fight it out preſently, went vnto him to pray him to giue the onſet: but Naſica ſpecially aboue the reſt, hauing good hope in the former good lucke he had at his firſt encounter. Æmilius ſmiling, aunſwered him: ſo would I doe, if I were as young as thou. But the ſundry victories I haue wonne heretofore, hauing taught me by experience the faultes the vanquiſhed doe commit: do forbid me to goe ſo whotly to worke (before my ſouldiers haue reſted, which did returne but now) to aſſault an armie ſet in ſuch order of battell. When he had aunſwered him thus, he commaunded the firſt bands that were now in view of the enemies, ſhould imbattell themſelues, ſhewing a countenance to the enemie as though they would fight: and that thoſe in the rereward ſhould lodge in the meane time, and fortifie the campe. So, bringing the foremoſt men to be hindmoſt, by chaunging from man to man before the enemies were ware of it: he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noiſe, and the enemies neuer perceiuing it. But when night came, and euery man had ſupped, as they were going to ſleepe and take their reſt: the moone which was at the full, and of a great height, beganne to darken and to chaunge into many ſorts of colours, loſing her light, vntill ſuch time as ſhee vaniſhed away, and was eclipſed altogether.

Then the ROMAINES beganne to make a noyſe with baſons aud pannes, as their faſhion is to doe in ſuch a chaunce, thinking by this ſound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting vp many torches lighted, and firebrands into the aire. The MACEDONIANS on the other ſide did no ſuch matter within their campe, but were all together ſtriken with an horrible feare: and there ranne ſtraight a whiſpering rumour through the people, that this ſigne in the element ſignified the eclipſe of the King.

For Æmylius was not ignorant of the diuerſities of the eclipſes, and he had heard ſay the cauſe is, by reaſon that the moone making her ordinarie courſe about the world (after certaine reuolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round ſhadowe of the earth, within the which ſhe remaineth hidden: vntill ſuch time as hauing paſt the darke region of the ſhadow, ſhe commeth afterwardes to recouer her light which ſhe taketh of the ſunne. Neuertheleſſe, he being a godly deuout man, ſo ſoone as he perceiued the moone had recouered her former brightneſſe againe, he ſacrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning alſo by the breake of day, making ſacrifice to Hercules, he could neuer haue any ſignes or tokens that promiſed him good lucke, in ſacrificing twentie oxen one after another: but at the one & twentieth he had ſignes that promiſed him victorie, ſo he defended himſelf. Wherfore, after he had vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice of a hundred oxen to Hercules, and alſo games of prices at the weapons, he commaunded his captaines to put their men in readines to fight: and ſo ſought to winne time, tarying till the ſunne came about in the after noone towardes the Weſt, to the end that the ROMAINES which were turned towards the Eaſt, ſhould not haue it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he repoſed him ſelfe in his tent, which was all open behind towardes the ſide that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemies lay. When it grew towardes night, to make the enemies ſet vpon his men: ſome ſay he vſed this policie. He made a horſe be driuen towards them without a bridell, & certaine ROMAINES followed him, as they would haue taken him againe: and this was the cauſe of procuring the skirmiſh.

Other ſay, that the THRACIANS ſeruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, did ſet vpon certaine forragers of the ROMAINES, that brought forage into the campe: out of the which, ſeuen hundred of the LIGVRIANS ranne ſodainely to the reſcue, and reliefe comming ſtill from both armies, at the laſt the maine battell followed after. Wherefore Æmylius like a wiſe generall foreſeeing by the daunger of this skirmiſh, and the ſtirring of both campes, what the furie of the battell would come to: came out of his tent, and paſſing by the bandes did encourage them, and praied them to ſticke to it like men. In the meane time, Naſica thruſting himſelfe into the place where the skirmiſh was whotteſt, perceiued the armie of the enemies marching in battell, readie to ioine.

The firſt that marched in the voward, were the THRACIANS, who ſeemed terrible to looke vpon, as he writeth himſelfe: for they were mightie made men, and caried maruellous bright targets of ſteele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, and their thighes with taſes, their coates were blacke, and marched ſhaking heauie halberds vpon their ſhoulders. Next vnto theſe THRACIANS, there followed them all the other ſtraungers and ſouldiers whom the King had hired, diuerſely armed and ſet forth: for they were people of ſundrie nations gathered together, among whom the PÆONIANS were mingled. The third ſquadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them choſen men, aſwell for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantneſſe of their perſons: and they were all in goodly gilt armours, & braue purple caſſocks vpon them, ſpicke and ſpanne new. And at their backes came after them, the old bandes to ſhew themſelues out of the campe, with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to ſhine with the brightneſſe of their ſteele and copper. And all the hilles and mountaines thereabouts did ring againe like an Eccho, with the crie and noyſe of ſo many fighting men, one incouraging another. In this order they marched ſo fiercely with ſo great heart burning, and ſuch ſwiftneſſe: that the firſt which were ſlain at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs frō the camp of the ROMAINES.

The battell betwixt Perſeus and Æmylius

The charge being giuen and the battell begunne, Æmylius galloping to the voward of his battell, perceiued that the captaines of the MACEDONIANS which were in the firſt ranckes, had alreadie thruſt their pikes into the Romaines targets, ſo as they could not come neere them with their ſwodes: and that the other Macedonians carying their targets behinde them, had now plucked them before them, and did baſe their pickes all at one time, and made a violent thruſt into the targets of the Romaines. Which when he had conſidered, and of what ſtrength and force his wall and ranke of targets was, one ioyning ſo neere another, and what a terrour it was to ſee a front of a battell with ſo many armed pikes and ſteele heades: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any ſight he euer ſaw before. Neuertheleſſe he could wiſely diſſemble it at that time. And ſo paſſing by the companies of his horſemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he ſhewed a noble chearefull countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrarie ſide, Perſeus the king of Macedon, as Polybius writeth, ſo ſoone as the battell was begunne, withdrew himſelfe, and got into the citie of Pydne, vnder pretence to goe to doe ſacrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept the faint ſacrifice of cowardes, neither doth receiue their praiers, becauſe they be vnreaſonable. For it is no reaſon, that he that ſhooteth not, ſhould hit the white: nor that he ſhould winne the victorie, that bideth not the battell: neither that he ſhould haue any good, that doeth nothing toward it: nor that a naughtie man ſhould be fortunate, and proſper. The goddes did fauour Æmylius praiers, becauſe he prayed for victorie with his ſworde in his hande, and fighting did call to them for aide. Howbeit there is one Poſidonius a writer, who ſaieth he was in that time, and moreouer, that he was at the battell: and he hath written an hiſtorie containing many bookes of the actes of king Perſeus, where he ſaith that it was not for faint heart, nor vnder colour to ſacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perſeus went from the battell: but becauſe he had a ſtripe of a horſe on the thigh the day before. Who though he could not verie well helpe himſelfe, and that all his friends ſought to perſwade him not to go to the battell: yet he cauſed one of his horſe to be brought to him notwithſtanding (which he commonly vſed to ride vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of darts were throwen at him from both ſides. And among thoſe, he had a blow with a dart that hurt him ſomewhat, but it was ouerthwart, and not with the point, and did hit him on the left ſide glaunſing wiſe, with ſuch a force, that it rent his coate, and raſed his skinne vnderneath, ſo as it left a marke behinde a long time after. And this is all that Poſidonius writeth to defend and excuſe Perſeus. The Romaines hauing their hands full, and being ſtaied by the battell of the Macedonians that they could make no breach into them: there was a captaine of the Pelignians called Salius, who tooke the enſigne of his band, and caſt it among the preaſe of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians brake in vpon them, with a maruellous force and furie into that place: for all Italians thinke it too great a ſhame and diſhonour for ſouldiers to loſe or forſake their enſigne. Thus was there maruellous force of both ſides vſed in that place: for the Pelignians proued to cut the Macedonians pikes with their ſwordes, or elſe to make them giue backe with their great targets, or to make a breach into them, and to take the pikes with their handes. But the Macedonians to the contrarie, holding their pikes faſt with both handes, ranne them thorow that came neere vnto them: ſo that neither target nor corſelet could hold out the force and violence of the puſh of their pikes, in ſo much as they turned vp the heeles of the Pelignians and Terracinians, who like deſperate beaſtes without reaſon, ſhutting in themſelues among their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deathes, and their firſt rancke were ſlaine euerie man of them. Thereupon thoſe that were behind, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backes, and only retired giuing backe towards the mountaine Olocrus. Æmilius ſeeing that (as Poſidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, becauſe that ſome of his men gaue backe: other durſt not front the battell of the Macedonians, which was ſo ſtrongly imbattelled on euerie ſide, and ſo mured in with a wall of pikes, preſenting their armed heads on euery ſide a man could come, that it was impoſſible to breake into them, no not ſo much as come neere them onely. Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe the fielde was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the front, could not alwayes keepe that wall, continuing their targets cloſe one to another, but they were driuen of neceſſitie to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the ſouldiers: that in one place they thruſt forward, and in another they giue backe, and leaue a hole. Wherefore AEmilius ſodainely taking the vantage of this occaſion deuided his men into ſmall companies, and commaunded them they ſhould quickly thruſt in betwene their enemies, and occupie the places they ſaw voide in the front of their enemies, and that they ſhould ſet on them in that ſort, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with diuers companies in ſundry places. AEmilius gaue this charge vnto the priuate captaines of euery band and their lieutenantes, and the captaines alſo gaue the like charge vnto their ſouldiers that could skilfully execute their commaundement. For they went preſently into thoſe parts where they ſawe the places open, and being once entred in among them, ſome gaue charge vpon the flankes of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and vnarmed: other ſet vpon them behind: ſo that the ſtrength of all the corpes of the battell (which conſiſteth in keeping cloſe together) being opened in this ſort, was ſtraight ouerthrowen. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a fewe againſt a fewe: the MACEDONIANS with their litle ſhort ſwordes, came to ſtrike vpon the great ſhields of the ROMAINES, which were very ſtrong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrarie, were driuen of neceſſitie to receiue the blowes of the ſtrong heauie ſwordes of the ROMAINES, vpon their litle weake targets: ſo that what with their heauineſſe, and the vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corſelet, but they paſſed it through, and ranne them in. By reaſon whereof they could make no long reſiſtance, whereupon they turned their backes and ranne away.

But when they came to the ſquadron of the olde beaten ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelleſt fight and moſt deſperate ſeruice, where they ſay that Marcus Cato (ſonne of great Cato, and ſonne in lawe of AEmylius) ſhewing all the valiantneſſe in his perſon that a noble minde could poſſibly performe, loſt his ſword which fell out of his hand. But he like a young man of noble courage, that had bene valiantly brought vp in all diſcipline, and knew how to follow the ſteppes of his father (the nobleſt perſon that euer man ſawe) was to ſhewe then his value and worthineſſe: and thought it more honour for him there to die, then liuing to ſuffer his enemies to enioy any ſpoile of his. So, by and by he ranne into the ROMAINE armie, to find out ſome of his friends, whom he tolde what had befallen him, and prayed them to helpe him to recouer his ſword: whereto they agreed. And being a good companie of luſtie valiant ſouldiers together, they ruſhed ſtraight in among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and ſo did ſet vpon them with ſuch force and furie, that they made a lane through the middeſt of them, and with great ſlaughter and ſpilling of bloud, euen by plaine force, they cleared the way ſtill before them. Now when the place was voyded, they ſought for the ſword, and in the ende found it with great a doe, amongeſt a heape of other ſwordes and dead bodies, whereat they reioyced maruellouſly. Then ſinging a ſong of victorie, they went againe more fiercely then before to giue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not yet broken a ſunder: vntill ſuch time as at the length, the three thouſand choſen MACEDONIANS fighting valiantly euen to the laſt man, and neuer forſaking their rankes, were all ſlaine in the place.

After whoſe ouerthrow, there was a great ſlaughter of other alſo that fled: ſo that all the vallie and foote of the mountaines thereaboutes was couered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the ROMAINES did paſſe ouer the riuer of Leucus, they found it running all a bloud. For it is ſaide there were ſlaine at this fielde, of Perſeus men, aboue fiue and twentie thouſand: and of the ROMAINES ſide, as Poſidonius ſaieth, not aboue ſixe ſcore, or as Naſica writeth, but foureſcore onely. And for ſo great an ouerthrowe, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done and executed.

For they beganne to fight about three of the clocke in the after noone, and had wonne the victorie before foure, and all the reſt of the day they followed their enemies in chaſe, an hundred and twentie furlongs from the place where the battell was fought: ſo that it was verie late, and farre foorth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So ſuch as returned, were receiued with maruellous great ioye of their pages that went out with linckes and torches lighted, to bring their maſters into their tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes and garlands of laurell, ſauing the generals tent onely: who was very heauie, for that of his two ſonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loued beſt of the twaine, becauſe he ſaw he was of a better nature then the reſt of his bretheren. For euen then, being new crept out of the ſhell as it were, he was maruellous valiaunt and hardy, and deſired honour wonderfully. Now AEmylius thought he had bene caſt away, fearing leaſt for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the raſhneſſe of his youth, he had put himſelfe too farre in fight amongſt the preaſe of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard ſtraight what ſorrow AEmylius was in, and how grieuouſly he tooke it. The ROMAINS being ſet at ſupper, roſe from their meate, and with torch light ſome ran to AEmylius tent, other went out of the campe to ſeek him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: ſo al the campe was full of ſorrow and mourning, the vallies and hilles all aboutes did ring againe with the cries of thoſe that called Scipio aloude. For euen from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and ſingular parts required in a captaine and wiſe gouernour of the common weale aboue all the young men of his time. At the laſt, when they were out of all hope of his comming againe, he happily returned from the chaſe of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new bloud (like a ſwift running greyhound fleſhed with the bloud of the hare) hauing purſued very farre for ioy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards deſtroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NVMANTIVM, who was the greateſt man of warre, and valianteſt captaine of the ROMAINES in his time, and of the greateſt authority and reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her ſpite, which ſhee did beare to ſo noble an exploite, ſuffered AEmylius for that time, to take his full pleaſure of that noble victory. And as for Perſeus, he fled firſt from the city of PYDNE, vnto the city of PELLA, with his horſemen, which were in manner all ſaued. Whereupon the footmen that ſaued them ſelues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traytours, cowards, and villaines: and worſe then that, they turned them off their horſe backes, and fought it out luſtely with them. Perſeus ſeeing that, and fearing leaſt this mutiny might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horſe out of the high way, and pulled off his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing leaſt they ſhould know him by theſe tokens: and becauſe he might more eaſily ſpeake with his friendes by the way, he lighted a foote, and led his horſe in his hand. But ſuch as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latchet of his ſhooe, another ſeemed to water his horſe, another as though he would drinke: ſo that one dragging after another in this ſort, they all left him at the laſt, and ranne their way, not fearing the enemies fury ſo much, as their Kinges cruelty: who being grieued with his misfortune, ſought to lay the fault of the ouerthrow vpon all other, but him ſelfe. Now he being come into the city of PELLA by night, Euctus and Eudaus, two of his treaſurers came vnto him, & ſpeaking boldly (but out of time) preſumed to tel him the great fault he had committed, and did counſell him alſo what he ſhould do. The King was ſo moued with their preſumption, that with his owne hands hee ſtabbed his dagger in them both, and ſlue them outright. But after this fact, all his ſeruaunts and friends refuſed him, and there onely taried with him but Euander CRETAN, Archedamus ÆTOLIAN, and Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the mean ſouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the loue of his gold and ſiluer, as Bees that keepe their hiues for loue of the hony. For he caried with him a great treaſure, and gaue them leaue to ſpoile certaine plate and veſſell of golde and ſiluer, to the value of fifty talents. But firſt of all, when he was come into the city of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the city of ALEPSE, and that the feare was well blowen ouer: he returned againe to his old humor, which was borne and bred with him, and that was, auarice and miſery. For he made his complaint vnto thoſe that were about him, that he had vnwares giuẽ to the ſouldiers of CRETA, his plate and veſſell of gold to be ſpoiled, being thoſe which in old time belonged vnto Alexander the great: and praied them with tears in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to chãge it for ready money. Now ſuch as knew his nature, found ſtraight this was but a fraude and a CRETAN lie, to deceiue the CRETANS with: but thoſe that truſted him, and did reſtore againe the plate they had, did loſe it euery iotte, for he neuer paid them penny of it. So he got of his friends, the value of thirty talents, which his enemies ſoone after did take from him. And with that ſumme he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the ſanctuary and priuiledge of the temple of Caſtor and Pollux. They ſay, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance did naturally loue their Kings: but then ſeeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hearts failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and ſubmitted them ſelues vnto AEmylius, and made him Lord of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two daies: and this doth ſeeme to confirme their wordes, who impute all AEmylius doings vnto his good fortune. And ſurely, the maruellous fortune he happened on in the city, AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it much, which a man cannot aſcribe otherwiſe, but to the ſpeciall grace of the goddes. For one day beginning to doe ſacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and ſet all the wodde a fire vpon the aulter, and ſanctified the ſacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure daies after Perſeus had loſt the battell, and that the city of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the liſtes or ſhew place, ſeeing horſes runne for games: ſodainly there roſe a rumor at the entring into the liſtes where the games were, how AEmylius had wonne a great battell of king Perſeus, and had conquered all MACEDON. Theſe newes was riſe ſtraight in euery mans mouth, and there followed vppon it a maruellous ioy and great cheere in euery corner, with ſhouts and clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the city of ROME. Afterwardes they made diligent enquiry, how this rumor firſt came vp, but no certaine author could be knowen, and euery man ſaide they heard it ſpoken: ſo as in the end it came to nothing, and paſſed away in that ſort for a time. But ſhortly after, there came letters, and certaine newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the meſſenger came that reported the firſt newes of it: which could be deuiſed by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwardes. We doe read alſo of a battell that was fought in ITALIE, neare vnto the riuer of SAGRA, whereof newes was brought the very ſame day vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another alſo in like maner that was fought in ASIA againſt the MEDES, before the city of MYCALA: the newes whereof came the ſame day vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the city of PLATOEES. And in that great iourney where the ROMAINES ouerthrew the Tarquines, and the army of the LATINES: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they ſaw two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victory to ROME, and they iudged they were Caſtor and Pollux. The firſt man that ſpake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horſe being all of a white fome, told them: that they wondred how they could ſo quickly bring theſe newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him ſoftly by the beard with both their handes, and euen in the market place his haire being blacke before, was preſently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeue the report the man made, who euer after was called AEnobarbus, as you would ſay, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like matter that happened in our time, maketh all ſuch newes credible. For when Antonius rebelled againſt the Emperour Domitian, the city of ROME was in a maruellous perplexity, becauſe they looked for great warres towardes GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grew a ſodaine rumor of victory, and it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius him ſelfe was ſlaine, and all his army ouerthrowen, & not a man left a liue. This rumor was ſo riſe, that many of the chiefeſt men of ROME beleeued it, and did ſacrifice thereupon vnto the gods, giuing them thankes for the victory. But when the matter came to ſifting, who was the firſt author of the rumor: no man could tell. For one put it ouer ſtill to another, & it died ſo in the end amongſt the people, as in a bottomleſſe matter, for they could neuer boult out any certaine ground of it: but euen as it came flying into ROME, ſo went it flying away againe, no man can tell how. Notwithſtanding, Domitian holding on his iourney to make this warre, met with poſtes that brought him letters for the certaine victory: and remembring the rumor of the victory that ranne before in ROME, he found it true, that it was on the very ſame day the victory was gotten, and the diſtance betweene ROME and the place where the fielde was wonne, was aboue twentie thouſand furlongs off. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe to our hiſtory. Cn. Octauius, lieutenant of the army of AEmylius by ſea, came to ancker vnder the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he would not take Perſeus by force out of the ſanctuary where hee was, for the reuerence he did beare vnto the goddes Caſtor and Pollux: but he did beſiege him in ſuch ſort, as he could not ſcape him, nor flie by ſea out of the Iland. Yet he had ſecretly practiſed with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a priſe with him for a ſumme of money to conuay him away by night: but the CRETAN ſerued him a right CRETANS tricke.. For when he had taken a bord by night into his veſſell, all the Kings treaſure of golde and ſiluer, he ſent him word that he ſhould not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and ſeruants, where in deed was no poſſibility to take ſhipping: but the next night following he hoiſed ſaile, and got him away. It was a pittifull thing that Perſeus was driuen to do and ſuffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a litle ſtraight window vpon the wals, and not only him ſelfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knew before what flying and hardnes ment. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter ſigh, when one told him on the peere, that he ſaw Oroandes the CRETAN vnder ſaile in the main ſeas. Then day beginning to breake, & ſeeing him ſelf voide of all hope, he ran with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the ſanctuary againe, before the ROMAINES that ſaw him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had giuen them him ſelfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruellouſly loued, and who then did traiterouſly betray him: for he deliuered his children vnto the ROMAINES. Which part was one of the chiefeſt cauſes that draue him (as a beaſt that will follow her litle ones being taken from her) to yeeld him ſelfe into their hands that had his children. Now hee had a ſpecial confidence in Scipio Naſica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld him ſelfe. but it was aunſwered him, that he was not there. Then hee beganne to lament his hard and miſerable fortune euery way. And in the end, conſidering how neceſſity enforced him, he yeelded him ſelfe into the handes of Cneus Octauius, wherein he ſhewed plainely, that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then auarice: that was, a faint heart, and fear to die.

But hereby he depriued him ſelfe of others pity and compaſſion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny and take from the afflicted, and ſpecially from them that haue a noble hart. For he made requeſt they wold bring him vnto the generall AEmylius, who roſe from his chaire when he ſaw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water ſtanding in his eyes, to meete a great King by fortune of warre, and by the will of the gods, fallen into that moſt lamentable fact. But he to the contrary, vnmanly, and ſhamefully behaued him ſelfe. For he fell downe at his feete, and embraced his knees, and vttered ſuch vncomely ſpeach and vile requeſtes, as AEmylius ſelfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes againſt him, being heartely offended, he ſpake thus vnto him. Alas poore man, why doſt thou diſcharge fortune of this fault, wher thou mighteſt iuſtly charge & accuſe her to thy diſcharge, doing things, for the which euery one iudgeth thou haſt deſerued thy preſent miſery, and art vnworthy alſo of thy former honor? why doſt thou defame my victory, and blemiſh ” the glory of my doings, ſhewing thy ſelfe ſo baſe a man, as my honor is not great to ouercome ” ſo vnworthy an enemy? The ROMAINES haue euer eſteemed magnanimity, euen in their ” greateſt enemies: but daſtardlines, though it be fortunate, yet it is hated of euery body. Notwithſtanding, ” he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hand, gaue him into the cuſtody of AElius ” Tubero. Then Amylius went into his tent, and caried his ſonnes, and ſons in law with him, and other men of quality, and ſpecially the younger ſort And being ſet downe, he continued a great ſpace very penſiue with himſelfe, not ſpeaking a word: in ſo much that all the ſtanders by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into diſcourſe and talke of fortune, and the vnconſtancy of theſe worldly things, and ſaid vnto them. Is there any man liuing, my friends, who hauing fortune at will, ſhould therefore boaſt and glory in the proſperitie of his doings, for that he hath conquered a countrey, city, or Realme? and not rather to feare the vnconſtancy of fortune? who laying before our eyes, and all thoſe that profeſſe armes at this preſent, ” ſo notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainely teach vs to thinke, ” that there is nothing conſtant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men may think ” them ſelues aſſured, conſidering that when they haue ouercome others, then are they driuen ” to miſtruſt fortune moſt, and to mingle fear & miſtruſt, with ioy of victory: if they will wiſely ” conſider the cõmon courſe of fatall deſtiny that altereth daily, ſometime fauouring one, otherwhile ” throwing down another? you ſee, that in an houres ſpace we haue troden vnder our feet ”

„ the houſe of Alexander the great: who hath bene the mightieſt and moſt redoubted prince of „ the world. You ſee a king, that not long ſince was followed and accõpanied, with many thouſand „ ſouldiers of horſemen and footemen: brought at this preſent into ſuch miſerable extremity, „ that he is inforced to receiue his meat and drinke dayly at the hands of his enemies. Should „ we haue any better hope then, that fortune will alwaies fauour our doings, more then ſhe doth „ his now, at this preſent? no out of doubt. Therefore digeſting this matter well, you young „ men I ſay, be not too brag nor fooliſh proude, of this conqueſt and noble victory: but thinke
„ what may happen hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuy of this our preſent „ proſperity. Such were AEmylius wordes to theſe yong men, as it is reported, brideling by „ theſe and ſuch like perſwaſions, the luſty brauery of this youth, euen as with the bit and bridle of reaſon. Afterwards he put his army into garriſons to refreſh them: and went him ſelf in perſon in the meane time to viſite GREECE, making it an honorable progreſſe, and alſo a cõmendable. For as he paſſed through the cities, he releeued the people, reformed the gouernment of their ſtate, and euer gaue them ſome gift or preſent. Vnto ſome he gaue corne, which king Perſeus had gathered for the wars: and vnto other he gaue oyles, meeting with ſo great ſtore of prouiſion, that he rather lacked people to giue it vnto, to receiue it at his hands, then wanting to giue, there was ſo much. As he paſſed by the city of DELPHES, hee ſaw there a great piller, foure ſquare, of white ſtone, which they had ſet vp, to put king Perſeus image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commanded them to ſet vp his in that place, ſaying: it was reaſon the conquered ſhould giue place vnto the conquerours. And being in the city of OLYMPIA, viſiting the temple of Iupiter Olympian, he ſpake this openly, which euer ſince hath bene remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Iupiter, as Homer had deſcribed him. Afterwardes when the tenne ambaſſadors were arriued that were ſent from ROME to eſtabliſh with him the realm of MACEDON, he redeliuered the MACEDONIANS their countrey and townes againe, to liue at liberty, according to their lawes, paying yearely to the ROMAINS for tribute, a hundred talents: where before they were wont to pay vnto their Kinges tenne times as much. And he made playes and games of all ſortes, and did celebrate ſumptuous ſacrifices vnto the goddes. He kept open court to all commers, and made noble feaſts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treaſure Perſeus had gathered together, ſparing for no coſt. But through his care and foreſight there was ſuch a ſpeciall good order taken, euery man ſo curteouſly receiued and welcommed, and ſo orderly marſhalled at the table according to their eſtate and calling: that the GRECIANS wondred to ſee him ſo carefull in matters of ſport and pleaſure: and that he tooke as great paines in his own perſon, to ſee that ſmall matters ſhould be ordered as they ought: as he took regard for diſcharge of more weighty cauſes. But this was a maruellous pleaſure to him, to ſee that among ſuch ſumptuous ſightes prepared to ſhew pleaſure to the perſons inuited, no ſight nor ſtately ſhew did ſo delight them, as to enioy the ſight and company of his perſon. So he told them, that ſeemed to wonder at his diligence and care in theſe matters: that to order a feaſt well, required as great iudgement and diſcretion, as to ſet a battell: to make the one fearefull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friends. But men eſteemed his bountie and magnanimitie for his beſt vertue and qualitie. For he did not onely refuſe to ſee the kings wonderfull treaſure of golde and ſiluer, but cauſed it to be told, and deliuered to the cuſtodie of the treaſurers, to carie to the coffers of ſtore in ROME: and only ſuffered his ſonnes that were learned, to take the bookes of the kings librarie. When he did rewarde the ſouldiers for their valiant ſeruice in this battell, he gaue his ſonne in law Æmylius Tubero a cup, weying fiue talents. It is the ſame Tubero we tolde you of before, who liued with ſixteene other of his kin all in one houſe, and of the onely reuenue they had of a litle farme in the countrie. Some ſay, that cup was the firſt peece of plate that euer came into the houſe of the Ælians, and yet it came for honour and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither themſelues, nor their wiues, would euer haue, or weare, any golde or ſiluer. After he had very well ordered and diſpoſed all things, at the laſt he tooke leaue of the GRÆCIANS, and counſelled the MACEDONIANS to remember the libertie the ROMAINES had giuen them, and that they ſhould be carefull to keepe it, by their good gouernement and concorde together. Then he departed from them, and tooke his iourney towards the countrie of EPIRVS, hauing receiued commiſsion from the Senate of Rome, to ſuffer his ſouldiers who had done ſeruice in the battell, and ouerthrowe of king Perſeus, to ſpoile all the cities of that countrie. Wherefore that he might ſurpriſe them on a ſodaine, and that they ſhould miſtruſt nothing, he ſent to all the cities that they ſhould ſend him by a certaine day, tenne of the chiefeſt men of euerie citie. Who when they were come, he commaunded them to go and bring him by ſuch a day, all the gold and ſiluer they had within their cities, aſwell in their priuate houſes, as in their temples and Churches, and gaue vnto euerie one of them a captaine and garriſon with them, as if it had beene onely to haue receiued and ſearched for the golde and ſiluer he demaunded. But when the day appointed was come, the ſouldiers in diuers places (and all at one time) ſet vpon their enemies, and did rifle and ſpoile them of that they had, and made them alſo pay ranſome euerie man: So as by this policie, there were taken and made ſlaues in one day, a hundred and fiftie thouſand perſons, and three ſcore and tenne cities ſpoiled and ſacked euery one. And yet when they came to deuide the ſpoile of this generall deſtruction of a whole Realme by the polle, it came not to euerie ſouldiers part, aboue eleuen ſiluer Drachmes a peece. Which made euerie one to wonder greatly, and to feare alſo the terrour of the warres, to ſee the wealth and riches of ſo great a Realme, to amount to ſo litle for euerie mans ſhare. When AEmylius had done this fact againſt his owne nature, which was verie gentle and courteous: he went vnto the ſea ſide to the citie of Orica, and there imbarked with his army bound for Italie. Where when he was arriued, he went vp the riuer of Tyber againſt the ſtreame, in king Perſeus cheefe galley, which had ſixteene owers on a ſide, richely ſet out with the armour of the priſoners, riche clothes of purple colour, and other ſuch ſpoiles of the enemies: ſo that the Romaines running out of Rome in multitudes of people to ſee this galley, and going ſide by ſide by her as they rowed ſoftly, Æmylius tooke as great pleaſure in it, as in any open games or feaſtes, or triumphe that had bene ſhewed in deed. But when the ſouldiers ſaw, that the golde and ſiluer of king Perſeus treaſure was not deuided amongſt them according vnto promiſe, and that they had a great deale leſſe then they looked for, they were maruellouſlie offended, and inwardly grudged Æmylius in their hearts. Neuertheleſſe they durſt not ſpeake it openly, but did accuſe him, that he had bene too ſtraight vnto them in this warre: and therefore they did ſhewe no great deſire, nor forwardneſſe, to procure him the honour of triumphe. Which Seruius Galba vnderſtanding, that had bene an olde enemie of his, notwithſtanding he had the charge of a thouſand men vnder him in this warre: he like an enuious viper tolde the people, how Æmylius had not deſerued the honor of triumph, and ſowed ſeditious words againſt him among the ſouldiers, to aggrauate their ill will the more againſt him. Moreouer, he craued a day of the Tribunes of the people, to haue reſpit to bring forth ſuch matter as they determined to obiect againſt him: ſaying the time then was farre ſpent, the ſunne being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leyſure. The Tribunes made him aunſwer, that he ſhould ſpeake then what hee had to ſay againſt him, or otherwiſe they would not graunt him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long oration in his diſpraiſe, full of railing wordes, and ſpent all the reſt of the day in that railing oration. Afterwardes when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the aſſembly, and the next morning the ſouldiers being incouraged by Galbaes oration, and hauing confedered together, did flocke about Galba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had giuen warning they would keepe their aſſembly. Now being broad day, AEmylius triumphe was referred to the moſt number of voices of the people, and the firſt tribe flatly did deny his triumphe. The Senate, and the reſidue of the people hearing that, were very ſory to ſee they did AEmylius ſo open wrong and iniury. The common people ſaide nothing to it, but ſeemed to be very ſory, howbeit they ſought no redreſſe. The Lords of the Senate cried out vpon them, and ſaide it was too much ſhame, and exhorted one another to bridle the inſolency and boldneſſe of theſe ſouldiers, who would grow in the end to ſuch tumult and diſorder, that they would commit all miſchiefe and wickedneſſe, if betimes they were not looked to, and preuented, ſeeing they did ſo openly ſtand againſt their generall, ſeeking to depriue him of the honour of his triumphe and victory. So they aſſembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would ſtay to take the voices of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with ſuch needefull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The Tribunes graunted to it, and ſilence was made. A notable deſcription of AEmylius triumphe.

Firſt, the people hauing ſet vp ſundry ſcaffoldes, aſwell in the liſts and field (called Circos by the LATINES) where the games and common running of horſes and charrets are made, as alſo about the market place, and in other ſtreetes of the citie, the which, the ſhew of the triumph ſhould paſſe: they all preſented them ſelues in their beſt gownes to ſee the magnificence and ſtate thereof. All the temples of the goddes alſo were ſet wide open, hanged full of garlandes of flowers, and all perfumed within: and there were ſet through all the quarters of the city, numbers of ſergeaunts and other officers holding tipſtaues in their handes to order the ſtragling people, and to keepe them vp in corners and lanes endes, that they ſhould not peſter the ſtreetes, and hinder the triumphe. Furthermore, the ſight of this triumphe was to continue three daies, whereof the firſt was ſcant ſufficient to ſee the paſſing by of the images, tables, and pictures, and ſtatues of wonderfull bignes, all wonne and gotten of their enemies, and drawen in the ſhew vppon two hundred and fifty charrets. The ſecond day, there were caried vppon a number of cartes, all the faireſt and richeſt armor of the MACEDONIANS, aſwell of copper, as alſo of iron and ſteele, all gliſtering bright, being newly furbiſhed, and artificially layed in order (and yet in ſuch ſort, as if they had bene caſt in heaps one vpon an other, without taking any care otherwiſe for the ordering and laying of them) faire burganets vpon targets: habergions, or brigantines and corſelets, vppon greaues:

round targets of the CRETANS, and iauelings of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongſt the armed pikes: all this armour and cariage, being bound one to another ſo trimly (neither being too loſe, nor too ſtraight) that one hitting againſt another, as they drew them vpon the cartes through the citie, they made ſuch a ſound and noiſe, as it was fearefull to heare it: ſo that the only ſight of theſe ſpoiles of the captaines being ouercome, made the ſight ſo much more terrible to behold it. After theſe carts loden with armor, there followed three thouſand men, which caried the ready money in ſeuen hundred and fiftie veſſels, which waighed about three talents a peece, and euery one of them were caried by foure men: and there were other that caried great bowles of ſiluer, cups and goblets faſhioned like hornes, and other pots to drinke in, goodly to behold, aſwell for ther bignes, as for their great and ſingular imboſſed workes about it. The third day early in the morning, the trumpets beganne to ſound and ſet forwards, ſounding no march nor ſweet note, to beautifie the triũph withall: but they blew out the braue alarõ they ſound at an aſſault, to giue the ſouldiers courage for to fight. After them followed ſixe ſcore goodly fat oxen, hauing all their hornes gilt, and garlands of flowers & noſegaies about their heads, and there went by them certaine young men, with aprons of needle worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the ſacrifice, & young boyes with them alſo, that caried goodly baſons of gold and ſiluer, to caſt & ſprinkle the bloud of the ſacrifices about. And after theſe, folowed thoſe that caried all coynes of gold deuided by baſons & veſſels, and euery one of them waying three talents as they did before, that caried the great holy cup, which Æmylius had cauſed to be made of maſsie gold, ſet full of precious ſtones, waying the weight of ten talents, to make an offering vnto the gods. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made & wrought after antike faſhion, and notable cups of the ancient kings of MACEDON: as the cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and to be ſhort, all the whole cubberd of plate of golde and ſiluer of king Perſeus. And next them came the charret of his armour, in the which was all king Perſeus harneſſe, and his royall band (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle ſpace betweene them, followed next the Kings children, whom they led priſoners, with the traine of their ſcholemaſters and other officers, & their ſeruants, weeping and lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked vpon them, and taught the kings young children to do the like, to aske mercie and grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two ſonnes and a daughter amongſt them, whoſe tender yeares and lacke of vnderſtanding, made them (poore ſoules) they could not feele their preſent miſerie, which made the people ſo much more to pittie them, when they ſaw the poore litle infants, that they knew not the change of their hard fortune: ſo that for the compaſsion they had of them, they almoſt let the father paſſe without looking vpon him. Many peoples hearts did melt for very pittie, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, ſo as this ſight brought both pleaſure & ſorow, together to the lookers on, vntil they were paſt & gone a good way out of ſight. King Perſeus the father, followed after his children and their traine, and he was clothed in a blacke gowne, wearing a paire of ſlippers on his feete after his country maner. He ſhewed by his countenance his troubled mind, oppreſt with ſorrow of his moſt miſerable ſtate and fortune. He was followed with his kinſefolks, his familiar friends, his officers and houſhold ſeruants, their faces diſfigured by blubbering, ſhewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and ſorrowfull eyes caſt vpon their vnfortunate maiſter, how much they ſorrowed & bewailed his moſt hard and cruell fortune, litle accounting of their own miſery. The voice goeth, that Perſeus ſent vnto Æmylius to intreat him, that he ſhould not be led through the city in the ſhew & ſight of the triumph. But AEmylius mocking (as he deſerued) his cowardly faint heart, aunſwered: as for that, it was before, and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let him vnderſtand thereby, that he might rather chuſe to die, then liuing to receiue ſuch open ſhame. Howbeit his hart would not ſerue him, he was ſo cowardly, and made ſo effeminate, by a certaine vaine hope hee knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his owne ſpoils. After all this, there folowed 400. princely crownes of gold, which the cities and towns of GREECE had purpoſely ſent by their ambaſſadours vnto AEmylius, to honour his victory: and next vnto them, he came him ſelfe in his charret triumphing, which was paſſing ſumptuouſly ſet forth and adorned. It was a noble ſight to behold: and yet the perſon of him ſelfe onely was worth the loo-

Foure hundred crowns of gold ſent vnto AEmylius by the cities of Greece king on,without al that great pomp & magnificence.For he was apparelled in a purple gown branched with gold,& caried in his right hand a laurell bough,as all his army did beſides:the which being deuided by bands & companies, followed the triumphing charret of their captaine,ſome of the ſouldiers ſinging ſongs of victorie,which the ROMAINES vſe to ſing in like triumphs,mingling them with merrie pleaſant toyes,reioycing at their captaine.Other of thē alſo did ſing ſongs of triumph, in the honor & praiſe of Æmylius noble conqueſt and victorie. He was openly praiſed,bleſſed, & honored of euery bodie,& neither hated nor enuied of honeſt men. Sauing the ordinarie vſe of ſome god,whoſe propertie is alwaies to leſſon or cut off ſome part of mans exceeding proſperitie & felicitie,mingling with mans life the ſence & feeling of good and euill together: becauſe that no liuing perſon ſhould paſſe all his time of life, without ſome aduerſitie or misfortune, but that ſuch(as Homer ſaith) ſhould only thinke them ſelues happie, to whom fortune hath equally ſorted the good with the euill.

And this I ſpeake becauſe Æmylius had 4. ſonnes, two of the which he gaue in adoption vnto the families of Scipio & of Fabius, as we haue ſaid before: and two other which he had by his ſecond wife, he brought vp with him in his owne houſe,& were both yet very young. Of the which the one died,being 14.yeres of age fiue daies before his fathers triumph:and the other died alſo 3.daies after the pompe of triumph,at 12.yeres of age.When this ſorowfull chance had befallen him, euerie one in ROME did pittie him in their hearts: but fortunes ſpight and crueltie did more greeue and feare them,to ſee her litle regard towards him,to put into a houſe of triumphe (full of honour and glorie,and of ſacrifices and ioy)ſuch a pittifull mourning,and mingling of ſorrowes and lamentations of death,amongſt ſuch ſongs of triumphe and victory.

Æmylius fortitude in his great aduerſity

Notwithſtanding this,Æmylius taking things like a wiſe man,thought that he was not only to vſe conſtancie & magnanimitie, againſt the ſword and pike of the enemy: but a like alſo againſt all aduerſitie and enmitie of ſpightfull fortune. So, he wiſely waied and conſidered his preſent miſfortune,with his former proſperitie: & finding his misfortune counterpeaſed with felicity,& his priuate grieues cut off with common ioy, he gaue no place to his ſorowes & miſchances, neither blemiſhed any way the dignity of his triumphe & victory.

For when he had buried the eldeſt of his two laſt ſonnes,he left not to make his triumphant entrie, as you haue heard before.And his ſecond ſonne alſo being deceaſed after his triumph,he cauſed the people to aſſemble,and in face of the whole city he made an oration,not like a diſcomforted man,but like one „ rather that did comfort his ſorowfull countrimen for his miſchance. He told them,that concerning „ mens matters,neuer any thing did feare him: but for things aboue,he euer feared fortune, „ miſtruſting her change and inconſtancie,and ſpecially in the laſt warre, doubting for ſo „ great proſperitie as could be wiſhed,to be paide home with an after intollerable aduerſitie,and „ ſiniſter chance.For as I went(ſaid he)I paſſed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatike ſea,from BRINDES „ vnto CORFV in one day. And from thence in fiue daies after, I arriued in the cittie of „ DELPHES, where I did ſacrifice vnto Apollo. And within fiue other daies, I arriued in my „ campe, where I found mine army in MACEDON. And after I had done the ſacrifice, and due „ ceremonies for purifying of the ſame, I preſently began to follow the purpoſe and cauſe of my „ comming: ſo as in 15. daies after, I made an honorable end of all thoſe warres. But yet,miſtruſting
„ fortune alwaies, ſeeing the proſperous courſe of my affaires, and conſidering that there „ were no other enemies,nor dangers I needed to feare:I feared ſorely ſhe would change at my „ returne,when I ſhould be vpon the ſea,bringing home ſo goodly & victorious an army, with „ ſo many ſpoiles,and ſo many Princes and Kings taken priſoners. And yet when I was ſafely „ arriued in the hauen,and ſeeing all the city at my returne full of ioy,and of feaſts and ſacrifices:I „ ſtill ſuſpected fortune,knowing her manner well enough, that ſhe vſeth not to gratifie men ſo „ franckly, nor to graunt them ſo great things clearly,without ſome certain ſparke of enuy waiting „ on them. Neither did my minde being ſtill occupied in feare of ſome thing to happen to „ the common wealth,ſhake off this fear behind me:but that I ſaw,this home miſhap and miſery

this aſſured hope, that this good fortune henceforth ſhall remaine with vs euermore, without feare of other vnlucky or ſiniſter chance. For ſhe hath ſufficiently countervailed the fauorable victorie ſhe gaue you, with the enuious miſhap wherewith ſhe hath plagued both me & mine: ſhewing the conquerer and triumpher, as noble an example of mans miſerie & weaknes, as the partie conquered, that had bene led in triumph. Sauing that Perſeus yet conquered as he is, hath this comfort left him: to ſee his children liuing, & that the conquerour Aemylius hath loſt his. And this was the ſumme of Æmylius notable oration he made vnto the people of ROME, proceeding of a noble and honorable diſpoſed minde. And though it pitied him in his heart to ſee the ſtraunge chaunge of king Perſeus fortune, and that he heartily deſired to helpe him, and to doe him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but onely to remoue him from the common priſon (which the ROMAINES call Carcer) into a more cleanly and ſweeter houſe: where being ſtraightly garded & looked vnto, he killed himſelfe by abſtinence from meate, as the moſt part of hiſtoriographers do write. Yet ſome writers tell a maruellous ſtraunge tale, and manner of his death. For they ſay the ſouldiers that garded him, kept him from ſleepe, watching him ſtraightly when ſleepe tooke him, & would not ſuffer him to ſhut his eye liddes (onely vpon malice they did beare him, becauſe they could not otherwiſe hurt him) keeping him awake by force, not ſuffering him to take reſt: vntill ſuch time as nature being forced to giue ouer, he gaue vp the ghoſt. Two of his ſonnes died alſo: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent turner and ioyner, and was learned, and could ſpeake the ROMAINE tongue very well, and did write it ſo trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magiſtrates of ROME, and did wiſely and diſcreetly behaue himſelfe in his office. Furthermore, they do adde to this goodly conqueſt of the realme of MACEDON, that Æmylius conquered another ſpeciall good thing, that made him maruellouſlie well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought ſo much golde and ſiluer vnto the treaſurie ſtore of ROME, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yeare that Hircius and Panſa were Conſuls, which was about the beginning of the firſt warres of Auguſtus and Antonius. And yet AEmylius had one ſingular good gift in him: that though the people did greatly loue and honour him, yet he euer tooke part with the Senate aud nobilitie, and did neuer by worde nor deed any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or pleaſe them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he did euer leane to the nobilitie and good men. And this did Appius afterwards caſt in his ſonnes teethe, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefeſt men of their time, and contending together for the office of Cenſor: Appius had about him to fauour his ſute, all the Senate and Nobilitie, as of auncient time the familie of the Appians had euer held on their part. And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himſelfe, yet he was in all times fauoured and beloued of the common people. Whereupon when Appius ſawe him come into the market place, followed with men of ſmall quality and baſe condition, that had bene ſlaues before, but otherwiſe could ſkilfully handle ſuch practiſes, bring the people together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voices (if neede were) obtaine what they would in the aſſemblies of the city: he ſpake out aloud, and ſaide. O Paulus AEmylius, now haſt thou good cauſe to ſighe and mourne in thy graue where thou lieſt (if the dead doe know what we doe here on earth) to ſee AEmylius a common ſergeant, and Licinius a pratling fellow, how they bring thy ſonne vnto the dignity of a Cenſor. And as for Scipio, he was alwaies beloued of the common people, becauſe he did fauour them in all things. But AEmylius alſo, although hee tooke euer the noble mens part, he was not therefore leſſe beloued of the common people, then thoſe that alwaies flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to pleaſe them: which the common people did witneſſe, aſwell by other honors and offices they offred him, as in the dignity of the Cenſor which they gaue him. For it was the holieſt office of all other at that time, & of greateſt power and authority, ſpecially for inquiry and reformation of euery mans life & manners. For he that was Cenſor, had authority to put any Senatour of the counſell, and ſo diſgrade him, if he did not worthely behaue him ſelfe according to his place and calling: & might name and declare any one of the Senat, whom he thought to be moſt honeſt, and fitteſt for the place again. Moreouer, they might by their authority, take frō licẽtious yong men, their horſe which was kept at the charge of the common weale. Furthermore, they be the ſeſſours of the people, and the muſter maſters, keeping bookes of the number of perſons at euery muſtering. So there appeared numbred in the regiſter booke Æmilius made then of them, three hundred ſeuen and thirtie thouſand, foure hundred and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named preſident of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and did put of the counſell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he and his companion, Martius Philippus kept, vpon view and muſter taken of the ROMAINE horſemen. And after he had ordered and diſpoſed the greateſt matters of his charge and office,

he fell ſicke of a diſeaſe that at the beginning ſeemed very daungerous, but in the ende there was no other daunger, ſauing that it was a lingring diſeaſe, and hard to cure.

So, following the counſell of phiſitians, who willed him to goe to a citie in ITALY called VELIA, he tooke ſea and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleaſant houſes vpon the ſea ſide quietly and out of all noiſe. But during this time of his abſence, the ROMAINES wiſhed for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to ſee the playes and ſportes, they cryed out diuerſe times for him: whereby they ſhewed that they had a great deſire to ſee him againe. Time being come about when they vſed to make a ſolemne yearely ſacrifice, and Æmilius finding himſelfe alſo in good perfect health: he returned againe to ROME, where he made the ſacrifice with the other prieſtes, all the people of ROME gathering about him, reioycing much to ſee him. The next day after, he made another particular ſacrifice, to giue thankes vnto the gods for recouerie of his health. After the ſacrifice was ended, he went home to his houſe, and ſate him downe to dinner:

he ſodainlie fell into a rauing (without any perſeuerance of ſickneſſe ſpied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went from him in ſuch ſort, that he dyed within three dayes after, lacking no neceſſarie thing that an earthly man could haue, to make him happy in this world.

For he was euen honoured at his funerals, and his vertue was adorned with manie goodly glorious ornaments, neither with golde, ſiluer, nor iuorie, nor with other ſuch ſumptuouſneſſe or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and good will of the people, all of them confeſsing his vertue and well doing: and this did not onely his naturall countrimen performe in memorie of him, but his very enemies alſo. For all thoſe that met in ROME by chance at that time, that were either come out of SPAINE, from GENVA, or out of MACEDON, all thoſe that were young and ſtrong, did willingly put themſelues vnder the coffin where his bodie laye, to helpe to carrie him to the churche: and the olde men followed his bodie to accompanie the ſame, calling Æmylius the benefactour, ſauiour, and father of their countrie. For he did not onely intreate them gently, and graciouſlie, whom he had ſubdued: but all his life time hee was euer readie to pleaſure them, and to ſet forwardes their cauſes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neere kinſmen.

The inuentory of all his gooddes after his death, did ſcant amount vnto the ſumme of three hundred, three ſcore, and ten thouſand ſiluer Drachmes, which his two ſonnes did inherite. But Scipio being the younger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, becauſe he was adopted into a very riche houſe, which was the houſe of the great Scipio Africanus.

THE LIFE OF Timoleon.

BEFORE Timoleon was ſent into SICILE, thus ſtoode the ſtate of the SYRACVSANS. After that Dion had driuen out the tyraunt Dionyſius, he himſelfe after was ſlaine immediatly by treaſon, and thoſe that ayded him to reſtore the SYRACVSANS to their libertie, fel out, and were at diſſention among themſelues. By reaſon whereof, the cittie of SYRACVSA chaunging continually newe tyrantes, was ſo troubled and turmoiled with all ſort of euills, that it was left in manner deſolate, & without inhabitants. The reſt of SICILE in like caſe was vtterly deſtroyed, and no cities in mãner left ſtanding, by reaſon of the long warres: and thoſe few that remained, were moſt inhabited of forreine ſouldiers & ſtraungers (a company of loſe men gathered together that tooke pay of no prince nor cittie) all the dominions of the ſame being eaſily vſurped, & as eaſie to change their lord. Inſomuch, Dionyſius the tyrant, ten yeres after Dion had driuen him out of SICILE, hauing gathered a certen number of ſouldiers together againe, and through their helpe driuen out Niſeus, that raigned at that time in SYRACVSA: he recouered the Realme againe, and made himſelfe King. So, if he was ſtrangely expulſed by a ſmal power out of the greateſt kingdom that euer was in the world: likewiſe he more ſtrangely recouered it againe, being baniſhed and very poore, making himſelfe King ouer them, who before had driuen him out. Thus were the inhabitantes of the cittie compelled to ſerue this tyrant: who beſides that of his owne nature he was neuer curteous nor ciuill, he was now growne to be far more dogged and cruell, by reaſon of the extreme miſerie and miſfortune he had endured. But the nobleſt cittizens repaired vnto Icetes, who at that time as lord ruled the cittie of the LEONTINES, and they choſe him for their generall in theſe wars: not for that he was any thing better then the opẽ tyrants, but becauſe they had no other to repaire vnto, at that time, and they truſted him beſt, for that he was borne (as themſelues) within the cittie of SYRACVSA, and becauſe alſo he had men of war about him, to make head againſt this tyrant. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great armie, and inuaded the countrie. The SYRACVSANS being afraid of them, determined to ſend ambaſſadours into GRECE vnto the CORINTHIANS, to praye

ayde of them againſt the barbarous people, hauing better hope of them, then of any other of the Grecians. And that not altogether becauſe they were lineally deſcended from them, and that they had receiued in times paſt many pleaſures at their hands: but alſo for that they knew that Corinthe was a cittie, that in all ages and times, did euer loue libertie and hate tyrants, & that had always made their greateſt wars, not for ambition of kingdoms, nor of couetous deſire to conquer and rule, but onely to defend and maintaine the libertie of the Grecians. But Icetes in another contrarie ſort, he tooke vpon him to be generall, with a minde to make himſelfe king of Syracusa. For he had ſecretly practiſed with the Carthaginians, and openly notwithſtanding, in wordes he commended the counſell and determination of the Syracusans, & ſent ambaſſadours from himſelfe alſo with theirs, vnto Peloponnesus: not that he was deſirous any ayde ſhould come from them to Syracusa, but becauſe he hoped if the Corinthians refuſed to ſend them ayde (as it was very likely they would, for the warres and troubles that were in Grece) that he might more eaſilie turne all ouer to the Carthaginians, and vſe them as his friendes, to ayde him againſt the Syracusans, or the tyrant Dionyſius. And that this was his full purpoſe and intent, it appeared plainely ſoone after. Now when their ambaſſadours arriued at Corinthe, and had deliuered their meſſage, the Corinthians, who had euer beene careful to defend ſuch citties as had ſought vnto them, and ſpecially Syracusa: very willingly determined in counſell to ſend them aide, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, hauing warres with none of the Grecians. So their onely ſtay reſted vpon chooſing of a generall to lead their armie. Now as the magiſtrates and gouernours of the cittie were naming ſuch cittizens, as willingly offered their ſeruice, deſirous to aduaunce themſelues: there ſtept vp a meane commoner who named Timoleon, Timodemus ſonne, a man that vntill that time was neuer called on for ſeruice, neither looked for any ſuch preferment. And truly it is to be thought it was the ſecret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane commoner to name Timoleon: whoſe election fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valiantnes and vertue, maruellous good ſucceſſe in all his doings afterwardes. This Timoleon was borne of noble parents, both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to loue his countrie and common weale: and was alwayes gentle and courteous to all men, ſauing that he mortally hated tyrants & wicked men. Furthermore nature had framed his bodie apt for wars and for paines: he was wiſe in his greeneſt youth, in all things he tooke in hand, and in his age he ſhewed himſelfe very valiant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a raſh harebraind man, and had a greedie deſire to reigne, being put into his head by a companie of meane men, that bare him in hand they were his friends, and by certen ſouldiers gathered together which he had alwaies about him. And becauſe he was very hotte and forward in warres, his cittizens tooke him for a noble captaine, and a man of good ſeruice, and therefore oftentimes they gaue him charge of men. And therein Timoleon did helpe him much to hide his fault he committed, or at the leaſt, made them ſeeme leſſe, & lighter then they were, ſtill increaſing that ſmall good gift that nature brought forth in him. As in a battell the Corinthians had againſt the Argives and the Cleoneians, Timoleon ſerued as a priuate ſouldier amongeſt the footemen: and Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horſemen, was in great daunger to be caſt awaye, if preſent helpe had not beene. For his horſe being hurte, threwe him on the ground in the middeſt of his enemies. Whereupon part of thoſe that were about him, were afraide and diſperſed themſelues here and there: and thoſe that remained with him, being fewe in number, and hauing many enemies to fight withall, did hardly withſtand their force and charge. But his brother Timoleon ſeeing him in ſuch inſtant danger a farre off, ranne with all ſpeede poſſible to helpe him, & clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that lay on the ground, receiuing many woundes on his body with ſword and arrowes, with great difficultie he repulſed the enemies, & ſaued his owne and his brothers life. Now the Corinthians fearing the like matter to come that before had happened vnto them, which was to loſe their cittie through default of their friends helpe: they reſolued in counſell, to entertaine in pay continually foure hundreth ſouldiers that were ſtraungers, whom they aſsigned ouer to Timophanes charge.

The Corinthians enterteined 400. ſtrāgers, & made Timophanes charge. Who, abandoning all honeſtie and regard of the truſt repoſed in him, did preſently practiſe all the wayes he could to make himſelfe lord of the cittie: and hauing put diuers of the chiefeſt cittizens to death without order of lawe, in the end he openly proclaimed himſelfe King. Timoleon being very ſorie for this, & taking his brothers wickednes would be the very high way to his fall and deſtruction: ſought firſt to winne him with all the good words and perſuaſion he could, to moue him to leaue his ambitious deſire to reigne, and to ſalue (as neere as might be) his hard dealing with the cittizens. Timophanes ſet light by his brothers perſuaſions, and would giue no eare vnto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went vnto one Æſchilus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a ſoothſayer (as Theopompus the hiſtoriographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him Orthagoras (with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three comming to him inſtantly beſought him to beleeue good counſell. And to leaue the kingdome, Timophanes at the firſt did but laugh them to ſcorne, and ſported at their perſuaſions: but afterwards he waxed warme, and grewe into great choller with them. Timoleon ſeeing that, went a litle aſide, and couering his face fell a weeping: & in the meane ſeaſon, the other two drawing out their ſwordes, ſlewe Timophanes in the place. This murther was ſtraight blowen abroade through the cittie, & the better ſorte did greatly commend the noble minde and hate Timoleon bare againſt the tyrant: conſidering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kinne, did notwithſtanding regard the benefit of his countrie, before the naturall affection of his brother, and preferred dutye and iuſtice, before nature and kinred. For, before he had ſaued his brothers life, fighting for the defence of his countrie: and now in ſeeking to make himſelfe king, and to rule the ſame, he made him to be ſlaine. Such then as miſliked popular gouernment and libertie, and allways followed the Nobilitie: they ſet a good face on the matter, as though they had bene glad of the tyrants death. Yet ſtill reprouing Timoleon for the horrible murther he had committed againſt his brother, declaring how deteſtable it was both to the gods and men: they ſo handled him, that it greeued him to the hart he had done it. But when it was told tim that his mother tooke it maruellous euill, and that ſhee pronounced horrible curſes againſt him, and gaue out terrible wordes of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit ſhe could neuer abide to ſee him, but alwayes ſhut her doore againſt him. Then he being wounded to the hart with ſorrow, tooke a conceite ſodainly, to kill himſelfe by abſteining from meate: but his friends would neuer forſake him in this deſpaire, and vrged him ſo farre by intreatie and perſuaſion that they compelled him to eate. Thereupon he reſolued thenceforth to giue himſelfe ouer to a ſolitarie life in the countrie, ſecluding himſelfe from all companie and dealings: ſo as at the beginning, he did not onely refuſe to repaire vnto the cittie, and all acceſſe of companie, but wandring vp and downe in moſt ſolitarie places, conſumed himſelfe and his time with melancholie. And thus we ſee, that counſells and iudgments are lightly caried awaye (by prayſe or diſprayſe) if they be not ſhored vp with rule of reaſon, and philoſophie, and reſt confounded in themſelues. And therefore it is very requiſite and neceſſarie, that not onely the acte be good and honeſt of it ſelfe, but that the reſolution thereof be alſo conſtant, and not ſubiect vnto chaunge: to the end we may do all things conſiderately. Leaſt wee be like vnto lickerous mouthed men, who as they deſire meates with a greedy appetite, and after are ſoone weary, diſliking the ſame: euen ſo we do ſodainely repent our actions grounded vpõ a weake imagination, of the honeſtie that moued vs thereunto. For repentance maketh the acte which before was good, nought. But determination, grounded vpon certaine knowledge and truth of reaſon, doth neuer chaunge, although the matter enterpriſed, haue not alwayes happie ſucceſſe. And therefore Photion the ATHENIAN hauing reſiſted (as much as in him laye) certen things which the generall Leoſthenes did, and which contrary to his mind tooke good effect: and perceiuing the ATHENIANS did open ſacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes for the ſame, and much reioyce at the victorie they had obteined. I would haue reioiced to (ſayed he) if I had done this: but ſo would I not for any thing, but I had giuen the counſell. And after that ſort, but more ſharply did Ariſtides LOCRIAN (a very friend and companion of Platoes) anſwer Dionyſius the elder, tyrãt of SYRACVSA: who asked his good will to marrie one of his daughters. I had rather ſee my daughter dead (ſayde hee) then maried vnto a tyrant. And within a certaine time after, the tyrant put all his ſonnes to death: and then he asked him in deriſion, to greeue him the more, if he were ſtill of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very ſorie, (ſayed he) with all my harte for that which thou haſt done: but yet I do not repent me of that I haue ſayed. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe vnto Timoleon. Whether that inward ſorrowe ſtrooke him to the harte for the death of his brother Timophanes, or that ſhame did ſo abaſhe him, as he durſt not abide his mother, twentie yeeres after, he neuer did any notable or famous acte. And therefore, when he was named to be generall of the ayde that ſhould be ſent into Sicile, the people hauing willingly choſen and accepted of him: Teleclides, who was chiefe gouernour at that time in the cittie of Corinthe, ſtanding vpon his feete before the people, ſpake vnto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behaue him ſelfe like an honeſt man, and valiant Captaine in his charge. For, ſayed he, if that you handle your ſelfe well, we will thinke you haue killed a tyrant: but if you do order your ſelfe otherwiſe then well, we will iudge you haue killed your brother. Now Timoleon being buſie in leauying of men, & preparing himſelfe: letters came to the Corinthians frõ Icetes, whereby plainely appeared, that Icetes had caried two faces in one hood, and that he was become a traytor. For he had no ſooner diſpatched his ambaſſadours vnto them, but he ſtraight tooke the Carthaginians part, and dealt openly for them, intending to driue out Dionyſius, and to make himſelfe king of Syracvsa. But fearing leaſt the Corinthians would ſend aide before he had wrought his feate: he wrote againe vnto the Corinthians, ſending them worde, that they ſhould not neede nowe to put themſelues to any charge or daunger for comming into Sicile, and ſpecially, becauſe the Carthaginians were very angrie, and did alſo lye in wayte in the waye as they ſhould come, with a great fleete of ſhippes to meete with their armie: and that for himſelfe, becauſe he ſawe they taried long, he had made league and amitie with them, againſt the tyrant Dionyſius. When they had read his letters, if any of the Corinthians were before but coldly affected to this iorney, choller did then ſo warme them againſt Icetes, that they franckly granted Timoleon what he would aske, and did helpe to furniſh him to ſet him out. When the ſhippes were readie rigged, and that the ſouldiers were furniſhed of all thinges neceſſarie for their departure, the Nunnes of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, ſayed they ſawe a viſion in their dreame, and that the goddeſſes Ceres and Proſerpina did appeare vnto them, apparelled like trauellers to take a iorney: and tolde them, that they woulde goe with Timoleon into Sicile. Vpon this ſpeech onely, the Corinthians rigged a galley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proſerpina: and Timoleon himſelfe before he would take the ſeaes, went into the cittie of Delphes, where he made ſacrifice vnto Apollo. And as he entred within the Sanctuarie where the aunſweres of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull ſigne vnto him. For amongeſt the vowes and offeringes that are hanged vppe vppon the walles of the Sanctuarie, there fell a bande directly vppon Timoleons heade, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: ſo that it ſeemed Apollo ſent him already crowned, before he had ſet out one foote towardes the iorney. He tooke ſhippe, and ſayled with ſeuen gallyes of Corinthe, two of Corphve, and tenne the Levcadians did ſet out. When he was launched out in the mayne ſea, hauing a francke gale of winde and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the ſame there came a maruellous great bright light ouer his ſhippe, and it was much like to a torche burning, when they ſhewe the ceremonies of the holy myſteries. This torche did accompanie and guide them all their voyage, and in the ende it vaniſhed awaye and ſeemed to fall downe vppon the coaſt of Italie, where the Shippemaſters had determined to arriue. The wiſe mens opinions being asked what this might ſignifie: they aunſwered. That this wonderfull ſight did betoken the dreame, the Nunnes of the goddeſſe Ceres dreamed, and that the goddeſſes fauoring this iorney, had ſhewed them the waye, by ſending of this light from heauen: becauſe that the Ile of Sicile is conſecrated vnto the goddeſſe Proſerpina, and ſpecially for that they reporte her rauiſhment was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was aſſigned vnto her for her ioynter, at the day of her mariage. Thus did this celeſtiall ſigne of the goddes both encourage thoſe that went this iorney and deliuer them alſo aſſured hope, who ſayled with all poſſible ſpeede they coulde: vntill ſuch time, as hauing croſſed the ſeaes, they arriued vpon the coaſt of ITALIE. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderſtood from SICILE put Timoleon in great perplexitie, and did maruellouſly diſcourage the ſouldiers he brought with him, for Icetes hauing ouerthrowen the battell of the tyrant Dionyſius, and poſſeſſed the greateſt part of the cittie of SYRACVSA: he did beſiege him within the caſtell, and within that part of the cittie which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and incloſed him in with walles round about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the ende that by preuenting that ayde, they might eaſily deuide SICILE betweene them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his requeſt, ſent twentie of their gallyes vnto RHEGIO, amongſt which Icetes Ambaſſadours were ſent vnto Timoleon, with teſtimonie of his doings: for they were fayre flattering wordes to cloake his wicked intent he purpoſed. For they willed Timoleon that he ſhould goe himſelfe alone (if he thought good) vnto Icetes, to counſell him, and to accompanie him in all his doinges, which were nowe ſo farre onwardes in good towardneſſe, as he had almoſt ended them all. Furthermore, they did alſo perſuade him, that he ſhould ſend backe his ſhippes and ſouldiers to CORINTHE, againe, conſidering that the warre was nowe brought to good paſſe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS would in no caſe that his men ſhoulde paſſe into SICILE, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORINTHIANS at their arriuall into the cittie of RHEGIO, finding there theſe Ambaſſadours, and ſeeing the fleete of the CARTHAGINIANS ſhippes, which did ryde at ancker not farre off from them: it ſpighted them on the one ſide to ſee they were thus mocked and abuſed by Icetes. For euery one of them were maruellous angry with him, and were greatly afearde alſo for the poore SICILIANS, whome too plainely they ſawe left a praye vnto Icetes for rewarde of his treaſon, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyrannie, which they ſuffered him to eſtabliſh. So, on the other ſide they thought it impoſſible to conquer the ſhippes of the CARTHAGINIANS, which did laye in wayte for them, and ſo neere vnto them: conſidering they were twiſe as many in number as they, and hard for them to ſubdue the armie alſo that was in the handes of Icetes in SICILE, conſidering that they were not come to him, but onely for the mayntenaunce of the warres. Notwithſtanding, Timoleon ſpake very courteouſly vnto thoſe Ambaſſadors, and captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS ſhippes, letting them vnderſtande that he would doe as much as they would haue him: and to ſay ttuly, if he would haue done otherwiſe, he could haue wonne nothing by it. Neuertheleſſe he deſired for his diſcharge, they would ſay that openly, in the preſence of the people of RHEGIO, (being a cittie of GREECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had ſpoken to him in ſecret: and that done he would departe incontinẽtly, alleadging that it ſtood him very much vpon for the ſafetie of his diſcharge, and that they themſelues alſo ſhould more faithfully keepe that they had promiſed vnto him touching the SYRACVSANS, whẽ they had agreed vpon it & promiſed it before all the people of RHEGIO, who ſhould be witnes of it. Now all this was but a fetch and pollicy deliuered by him, to ſhadow his departure, which the captaines and gouenors of RHEGIO did fauor, & ſeeme to help him in: becauſe they wiſhed SICILE ſhould fall into the hands of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cauſe they cõmanded a generall aſſembly of all the people, during which time, they cauſed the gates of the cittie to be ſhut: giuing it out, that it was becauſe the cittizens ſhould not go about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the people were aſſembled, they began to make long oratiõs without concluding any matter: the one leauing alwayes to the other a like matter to talke of, to the end they might winne time, vntill the gallyes of the CORINTHIANS, were departed. And ſtaying the CARTHAGINIANS alſo in this aſſembly they miſtruſted nothing, becauſe they ſawe Timoleon preſent: who made a countenance, as though he would riſe to ſay ſomething. But in the meane time, ſome one did ſecretly aduertiſe Timoleon, that the other gallyes were vnder ſayle, and gone awaye, and that there was but one galley left, which tarryed for him in the hauen. Thereupon he ſodainely ſtole away through the preaſe, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chayre where the orations were made: and trudgeing quickely to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hoyſed ſayle alſo. And when he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all ſafe together to lande at the cittie of TAVROMENON, which is in SICILE: there they were very well receiued by Andromachus, who long time before had ſent for them, for he gouerned this cittie as if he had beene Lorde thereof. He was the father of Timæus the Hiſtoriographer, the honeſteſt man of all thoſe that did beare rule at that time in all SICILE. For he did rule his cittizens, in all iuſtice and equitie, and did allwayes ſhewe him-ſelfe an open enemie of tyrantes. And following his affection therein, he lent his cittie at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together, and perſuaded his Cittizens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to ayde them, to deliuer SICILE from bondage, and to reſtore it againe to libertie. But the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS that were at RHEGIO, when they knewe that Timoleon was vnder ſayle and gone, after that the aſſembly of the counſell was broken vppe: they were readye to eate their fingers for ſpight to ſee themſelues thus finely mocked and deceiued. The RHEGIANS on the other ſide, were merry at the matter, to ſee howe the PHENICIANS ſtormed at it, that they had ſuch a fine parte played them. Howbeit in the eud, they determined to ſend an Ambaſſadour vnto TAVROMENION, in one of their gallyes. This ambaſſadour ſpake very boldly and barbarouſly vnto Andromachus, and in a choller: and laſt of all, he ſhewed him firſt the palme of his hande, then the backe of his hande, and did threaten him that his cittie ſhould be ſo turned ouer hand, if he did not quickely ſend awaye the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell a laughing at him, and did turne his hand vppe and downe as the Ambaſſadour had done, and commaunded him that he ſhould gette him going, and that with all ſpeede out of his cittie, if he would not ſee the keele of his gally turned vpward. Icetes nowe vnderſtanding of Timoleons comming, and being afrayed, ſent for a great number of gallyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS beganne to deſpayre vtterly when they ſawe their hauen full of the CARTHAGINIANS gallyes, the beſt parte of their cittie kept by Icetes, and the caſtell by the tyrante Dionyſius. And on the other ſide, that Timoleon was not yet come but to a litle corner of SICILE, hauing no more but the litle cittie of TAVROMENION, with a ſmall power, and leſſe hope: becauſe there was not aboue a thouſand footemen in all, to furniſh theſe warres, neither prouiſion of victualles, nor ſo much money as would ſerue to entertaine and paye them. Beſides alſo, that the other citties of SICILE did nothing truſt him. But by reaſon of the violent extorcions which they had of late ſuffered, they hated all captaines and leaders of men of war to the death, and ſpecially for the tretcherie of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDÆMONIAN. Both of them ſayed they came to ſet SICILE at libertie, and to driue out the tyrantes: and yet neuertheleſſe, they had done ſo much hurte vnto the poore SICILIANS, that the miſerie and calamitie which they had ſuffered vnder the tyrantes, ſeemed all to be golde vnto them, in reſpect of that which the Captaines had made them to abide. And they did not thinke them more happy, that had willingly ſubmitted them ſelues vnto the yoke of ſeruitude: then thoſe which they ſawe reſtored, and ſet at libertie. Therfore perſuading themſelues, that this CORINTHIAN would be no better vnto them, then the other had beene before, but ſuppoſing they were the ſelfe ſame former craftes, and alluring baytes of good hope and fayre wordes, which they had taſted of before, to drawe them to accept new tyrants: they did ſore ſuſpect it, and reiected all the CORINTHIANS perſuaſions. Sauing the ADRANITANS onely, whoſe litle cittie being conſecrated to the god Adranus (and greatly honored and reuerenced through all SICILE) was then in diſſention one againſt another: inſomuch as one part of them tooke part with Icetes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and another ſide of them ſent vnto Timoleon. So it fortuned that both the one and the other, making all the poſſible ſpeede they coulde, who ſhould come firſt: arriued both in mãner at one ſelf time. Icetes had about 5000 ſouldiers. Timoleõ had not in all, aboue 1200 men, with which he departed to go towards the cittie of ADRANVS diſtant from TAVROMENION, about three hundred & 40 furlõgs. For the firſt dayes iorney he went, no great way but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very haſtely, & had maruelous ill way.

When night was come,and day light ſhut in,he had news that Icetes did but newly arriue before ADRANVS,where he encamped. When the priuate captaines vnderſtood this,they cauſed the voward to ſtay,to eate and repoſe a litle, that they might be the luſtier, & the ſtronger to fight. But Timoleon did ſet ſtill forwards,and praied them not to ſtay, but to go on with all the ſpeed they could poſſible,that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they ſhould)being but newly arriued,and troubled with making their cabbons,and preparing for ſupper. Therewithall as he ſpake theſe words,he toke his target on his arme,and marched himſelfe the formoſt man,as brauely & couragiouſly as if he had gone to a moſt aſſured victorie. The ſouldiers ſeeing him marche with that liſe,they followed at his heeles with like courage. So they had not paſſing thirty furlongs to go, which when they had ouercome, they ſtraight ſet vpon their enemies,whom they found all out of order,and began to flie,ſo ſoone as they ſaw they were vpon their backs before they were aware. By this meanes there were not aboue three hundred men ſlaine,and twiſe as many more taken priſoners, and ſo their whole campe was poſſeſſed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yeelded vnto Timoleon, declaring vnto him with great feare,and no leſſe wonder,how at the very time when he gaue charge vpon the enemies,the dores of the temple of their god opened of themſelues, and that the Iaueling which the image of their god did hold in his hãd,did ſhake at the very end where the iron head was,and how all his face was ſeene to ſweat. This(in my opinion)did not onely ſignifie the victorie he had gotten at that time,but all the notable exploites he did afterwards, vnto the which,this firſt encounter gaue a happy beginning. For immediatly after, many cities ſent vnto Timoleon,to ioyne in league with him. And Mamercus,the tyrant of CATANA, a ſouldier,and very full of money,did alſo ſeeke his friendſhip. Furthermore,Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding himſelfe in maner forced vnto it by long continuance of ſiege: made no more reckoning of Icetes, when he knew that he was ſo ſhamefully ouerthrowne. And contrariwiſe,much eſteeming Timoleons valiantneſſe, he ſent to aduertiſe him, that he was contented to yeeld himſelfe and the caſtell into the hands of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good hap vnlooked for, ſent Euclides and Telemachus,two captaines of the CORINTHIANS, to take poſſeſſion of the caſtel,with foure hundred men,not all at a time,nor openly(for it was vnpoſſible,the enemies lying in waite in the hauen)but by ſmall companies,and by ſtealth,he conueied them all into the caſtell. So the ſouldiers poſſeſſed the caſtell,and the tyrants pallace, with all the moueables and munition of wars within the ſame. There were a great number of horſe of ſeruice, great ſtore of ſtaues and weapons offenſiue of all ſorts,and engines of batterie to ſhoot farre off, and ſundry other weapons of defence,that had bene gathered together of long time,to arme threeſcore and ten thouſand men. Moreouer, beſides all this, there were two thouſand ſouldiers, whom with all the other things rehearſed, Dionyſius deliuered vp into the hands of Timoleon: and he himſelf,with his money and a few of his friends,went his way by ſea, Icetes not knowing it,and ſo came to Timoleons campe. This was the firſt time that euer they ſaw Dionyſius a priuate man,in baſe and meane eſtate. And yet within few dayes after,Timoleon ſent him from thence vnto CORINTHE in a ſhip, with little ſtore of money. Who was borne and brought vp in the greateſt and moſt famous tyrannie,and kingdome,conquered by force,that euer was in the world: and which himſelfe had kept by the ſpace of ten yeares after the death of his father. Since Dion draue him out,he had bene maruellouſlie turmoiled in warres, by the ſpace of twelue yeares: in which time, although he had done much miſchiefe, yet he had ſuffered alſo a great deale more. For he ſaw the death of his ſonnes when they were men growne,and able to ſerue and carie armor. He ſaw his daughters rauiſhed by force, and defloured of their virginitie. He ſaw his owne ſiſter(who was alſo his wife)firſt of all ſhamed,and cruelly handled in her perſon, with the greateſt villanies and moſt vile parts done vnto her, that his enemies could deuiſe: & afterwards horribly murthered with his children,& their bodies in the end throwne into the ſea,as we haue more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionyſius was arriued in the citie of CORINTHE, euery GRÆCIAN was wonderfull deſirous to go ſee him,and to talke with him. And ſome went thither very glad of his ouerthrow,as if they had troden him downe with their feete,whom fortune had ouerthrowne,ſo bitterly did they hate him. Other pittying him in their hearts, to ſee ſo great a change, did behold him as it were with a certaine compaſſion, conſidering what great power, ſecret and diuine cauſes haue ouer mens weakeneſſe and frailtie, and thoſe things that daily paſſeth ouer our heads. For the world then, did neuer bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand ſo wonderfull, as was this of fortune. Who made the world ſee a man, that before was in maner Lord and King of all SICILE, ſit then commonly in the citie of CORINTHE, talking with a victualer, or ſitting a whole day in a perfumers ſhop, or commonly drinking in ſome celler or tauerne, or to brawle and ſcolde in the middeſt of the ſtreetes, with common whores in face of the world, or elſe to teach common minſtrels in euery lane and alley, and to diſpute with them with the beſt reaſon he had, about the harmony & muſick of the ſongs they ſang in the THEATERS. Now ſome ſay he did this, becauſe he knew not elſe how he ſhould driue the time away, for that indeed he was of a baſe minde, and an effeminate perſon, giuen ouer to all diſhoneſt luſts and deſires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the leſſe regarded, for feare leaſt the CORINTHIANS ſhould haue him in iealouſie and ſuſpition, imagining that he did take the change & ſtate of his life in grieuous part, & that he ſhould yet looke back, hoping for a time to recouer his ſtate againe: and that for this cauſe he did it, and of purpoſe fained many things againſt his nature, ſeeming to be a ſtarke ideot, to ſee him do thoſe things he did. Some notwithſtanding haue gathered together certaine of his anſwers, which do teſtifie that he did not all theſe things of a baſe brutiſh minde, but to fit himſelfe onely to his preſent miſery and miſfortune. For when he came to LEVCADES, an ancient citie built by the CORINTHIANS, as was alſo the citie of SYRACVSA: he told the inhabitants of the ſame, that he was like to yong boyes that had done a fault. For as they flie from their fathers being aſhamed to come in their ſight, & are gladder to be with their brethren: euen ſo is it with me, ſaid he: for it would pleaſe me better to dwell here with you, then to go to CORINTHE our head citie. Another time, being at CORINTHE, a ſtranger was very buſie with him, (knowing how familiar Dionyſius was with learned men and philoſophers, while he raigned in SYRACVSA) & asked him in the end in deriſion: what benefit he got by Platoes wiſedome and knowledge? he anſwered him againe: how thinkeſt thou, hath it done me no good, when thou ſeeſt me beare ſo paciently this change of fortune? Ariſtoxenus a muſitian, and other, asking him what offence Plato had done vnto him: he anſwered. That tyrants ſtate is euer vnfortunate, & ſubiect to many euils: but yet no euill in their ſtate was comparable to this. That none of all thoſe they take to be their moſt familiars, dare once tell them truely any thing: and that through their fault, he left Platoes company. Another time there commeth a pleaſant fellow to him, and thinking to mock him finely, as he entred into his chamber, he ſhooke his gowne, as the manner is when they come to tyrants, to ſhew that they haue no weapons vnder their gownes. But Dionyſius encountred him as pleaſantly, ſaying to him: do that when thou goeſt hence, to ſee if thou haſt ſtolne nothing. And againe, Philip king of MACEDON, at his table one day deſcending into talke of ſongs, verſe, and tragedies, which Dionyſius his father had made, making as though he wondred at them, how poſſibly he could haue leiſure to do thē: he anſwered him very trimly, and to good purpoſe. He did them euen at ſuch times (quod he) as you and I, and other great lords whom they reckon happy, are diſpoſed to be drunke, and play the fooles. Now for Plato he neuer ſaw Dionyſius at CORINTHE. But Diogenes Sinopian, the firſt time that euer he met with Dionyſius, ſaid vnto him. O, how vnworthy art thou of this ſtate. Dionyſius ſtaied ſodainly, and replied: Truly I thanke thee (Diogenes) that thou haſt compaſſion of my miſery. Why ſaid Diogenes againe: Doeſt thou thinke I pitty thee? Nay it ſpighteth me rather to ſee ſuch a ſlaue as thou (worthy to die in the wicked ſtate of a tyrant like thy father) to liue in ſuch ſecuritie, and idle life, as thou leadeſt amongſt vs. When I came to compare theſe words of Diogenes, with Philiſtus words the Hiſtoriographer, bewailing the hard fortune of the daughters of the LEPTINES, ſaying that they were brought from the top of all worldly felicity, honour, and goods, (whereof tyrrannicall ſtate aboundeth) vnto a baſe, priuate, and humble life: me thinkes they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that ſorroweth for the loſſe of her boxes of painting colours, or for her purple gownes, or for other ſuch prety fine trimmes of gode, as women vſe to weare. So, me thinkes theſe things I haue intermingled concerning Dionyſius, are not impertinent to the deſcription of our liues, neither are they troubleſome nor vnprofitable to the hearers, vnleſſe they haue other haſtie buſineſſe to let or trouble them. But now if the tyrant Dionyſius wretched ſtate ſeeme ſtrange, Timoleons proſperitie then was no leſſe wonderfull. For within fiftie dayes after he had ſet foote in SICILE, he had the caſtell of SYRACVSA in his poſſeſſion, & ſent Dionyſius as an exile to CORINTHE. This did ſet the CORINTHIANS in ſuch a iollitie, that they ſent him a ſupply of two thouſand footemen, and two hundred horſemen, which were appointed to land in ITALIE, in the countrie of the THVRIANS. And perceiuing that they could not poſsiblie go from thence into SICILE, becauſe the CARTHAGINIANS kept the ſeas with a great nauie of ſhips, and that thereby they were compelled to ſtay for better opportunitie: in the meane time they beſtowed their leiſure in doing a notable good acte. For the THVRIANS, being in warres at that time with the BRVTIANS, they did put their citie into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had bene their owne natiue countrie. Icetes all this while did beſiege the caſtell of SYRACVSA, preuenting all he could poſsible, that there ſhould come no corne by ſea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the caſtell: and he had hiered two ſtrange ſouldiers, which he ſent vnto the citie of ADRANVS, to kil Timoleon by treaſon, who kept no garde about his perſon, and continued amongſt the ADRANITANS, miſtruſting nothing in the world, for the truſt and confidence he had in the ſafegard of the god of the ADRANITANS. Theſe ſouldiers being ſent to do this murther, were by chance enformed that Timoleon ſhould one day do ſacrifice vnto this god. So vppon this, they came into the temple, hauing daggers vnder their gownes, and by litle and litle thruſt in through the preaſe, that they got at the length hard to the aulter. But at the preſent time as one encouraged another to diſpatche the matter, a third perſon they thought not of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his ſworde, that he fell to the grounde. The man that had hurt him thus, fled ſtraight vpon it, with his ſworde drawne in his hand, and recouered the top of a high rocke. The other ſouldier that came with him, and that was not hurt, got holde of a corner of the aulter, and beſought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would diſcouer the treaſon practiſed againſt him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he tolde him how his companion that was ſlaine, and himſelfe, were both hired, and ſent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him alſo that had taken the rocke, who cryed out aloude, he had done no more then he ſhould do: for he had killed him that had ſlaine his owne father before, in the citie of the LEONTINES. And to iuſtifie this to be true, certaine that ſtood by did affirme, it was ſo in deed. Whereat they wondered greatly to conſider the maruellous working of fortune, how ſhe doth bring one thing to paſſe by meanes of another, and gathereth all things together, how far a ſunder ſoeuer they be, and linketh them together, though they ſeeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no manner of likeneſſe or coniunction betwene them, making the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter throughly, gaue him that ſlue the ſouldier with his ſworde, a crowne of the value of ten minas, becauſe that by meanes of his iuſt anger, he had done good ſeruice to the God that had preſerued Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hap did not onely ſerue the preſent turne, but was to good purpoſe euer after. For thoſe that ſawe it, were put in better hope, and had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons perſon, becauſe he was a holy man, one that loued the gods, and that was purpoſely ſent to deliuer SICILE from captiuitie. But Icetes hauing miſſed his firſt purpoſe, and ſeeing numbers daylie drawne to Timoleons deuotion: he was mad with himſelfe, that hauing ſo great an armie of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commandement, he tooke but a few of them to ſerue his turne, as if he had bene aſhamed of his fact, and had vſed their friendſhip by ſtealth. So he ſent hereupon for Mago their generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his requeſt brought an huge army to ſee too, of a hundred and fiftie ſaile, which occupied and couered all the hauen: and afterwards landed three ſcore thouſand men, whom he lodged euery man within the citie of SYRACVSA. Then euery man imagined the time was now come, which old men had threatned SICILE with many yeares before, and that continually: that one day it ſhould be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the warres the CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the countrie of SICILE, they could neuer come to take the citie of SYRACVSA: and then through Icetes treaſon, who had receiued them, they were ſeene encamped there. On the other ſide, the CORINTHIANS that were within the caſtell, found themſelues in great diſtreſſe; becauſe their victuals waxed ſcant, and the hauen was ſo ſtraightly kept. Moreouer, they were driuen to be armed continually to defend the walles, which the enemies battered, and aſſaulted in ſundrie places, with all kindes of engines of batterie, and ſundry ſorts of deuiſed inſtruments and inuentions to take cities: by reaſon whereof, they were compelled alſo to deuide themſelues into many companies. Neuertheleſſe, Timoleon without, gaue them all the ayde he could poſſible: ſending them corne from CATANA, in little fiſher botes and ſmall crayers, which got into the caſtell many times, but ſpecially in ſtormie and foule weather, paſsing by the gallies of the barbarous people, that lay ſcatteringly one from another, diſperſed abroad by tempeſt, and great billowes of the ſea. But Mago and Icetes finding this, determined to go take the citie of CATANA, from whence thoſe of the caſtell of SYRACVSA were victualed: and taking with them the beſt ſoldiers of all their armie, they departed from SYRACVSA, and ſailed towards CATANA. Now in the meane ſpace, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all thoſe that were within the caſtell, perceiuing the enemies within the citie kept but ſlender warde: made a ſodaine ſalie out vpon them, and taking them vnwares, ſlue a great number at the firſt charge, and draue away the other. So by this occaſion he wanne a quarter of the citie, which they call ACRADINA, and was the beſt part of the citie, that had receiued leaſt hurt. For the citie of SYRACVSA ſeemeth to be built of many townes ioyned together. So hauing found there great plentie of corne, golde, and ſiluer, he would not forſake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the caſtell: but fortifying with all diligence the compaſſe and precinct of the ſame, and ioyning it vnto the caſtell with certaine fortifications he built vp in haſt, he determined to keepe both the one & the other. Now were Mago and Icetes very neere vnto CATANA, when a poſt ouertooke them, purpoſely ſent from SYRACVSA vnto them: who brought them news, that the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondred, and returned back againe with all ſpeed poſsible (hauing failed of their purpoſe they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their hands. Now for that matter, it is yet a queſtion, whether we ſhould impute it vnto wiſedome and valliancie, or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be aſcribed vnto fortune. And this it is. The two thouſand footmen and two hundred horſemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the city of the THVRIANS, partly for feare of the gallyes of the CARTHAGINIANS that laye in waite for them as they ſhould paſſe, Hanno being their admirall: and partly alſo for that the ſea was very rough and high many dayes together, and was alwaies in ſtorme and tempeſt: in the ende, they ventured to go through the country of the BRVTIANS. And partly with their good will (but rather by force) they got through, and recouered the citie of RHEGIO, the ſea being yet maruellous high and rough. Hanno the admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their paſſage, thought with himſelfe that he had deuiſed a maruellous fine policie, to deceiue the enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumphe vpon their heads, and therewithall alſo made them dreſſe vp, and ſet forth his gallyes, with targets, corſelets, and brigantines after the GRÆCIANS faſhion. So in this brauery he returned backe againe, ſailing towards SYRACVSA, & came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the caſtels ſide of SYRACVSA, with great laughing, and clapping of hands: crying out alowde to them that were in the caſtell, that he had ouerthrowne their aide which came from CORINTHE, as they thought to paſſe by the coaſt of ITALIE into SICILE, flattering themſelues, that this did much diſcourage thoſe that were beſieged. But whileſt he ſported thus with his fonde deuiſe, the two thouſand CORINTHIANS being arriued through the countrie of the BRVTIANS in the citie of RHEGIO, perceiuing the coaſt cleare, and that the paſſage by ſea was not kept, and that the raging ſeas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpoſe calme for them: they tooke ſeas forthwith in ſuch fiſher boats & paſſengers as they found ready, in the which they went into SICILE, in ſuch good ſafety, as they drue their horſe (holding them by the raines) alongeſt their boates with them. When they were all paſſed ouer, Timoleon hauing receiued them, went immediatly to take MESSINA, and marching thence in battell raie, tooke his way towards SYRACVSA, truſting better to his good fortune, thē to his force he had: for his whole number in all, were not aboue foure thouſand fighting men. Notwithſtanding Mago hearing of his comming, quaked for feare, & doubted the more vpon this occaſion. About SYRACVSA are certaine mariſhes, that receiue great quantitie of ſweete freſh water, aſwell of fountaines and ſpringes, as alſo of litle running brookes, lakes & riuers, which runne that waies towards the ſea: and therefore there are great ſtore of eeles in that place, and the fiſhing is great there at all times, but ſpecially for ſuch as delight to take eeles. Whereupon the GRECIANS that tooke pay on both ſides, when they had leaſure, and that all was quiet betweene them, they intended fiſhing. Now, they being all country men, and of one language, had no priuate quarrell one with another: but when time was to fight, they did their duties, and in time of peace alſo frequented familiarly together, and one ſpake with another, and ſpecially when they were buſie fiſhing for eeles: ſaying, that they maruelled at the ſituation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they ſtood ſo pleaſantly and commodious vpon the ſea ſide. So one of the ſouldiers that ſerued vnder the CORINTHIANS, chaunced to ſay vnto them. Is it poſſible that you that be GRECIANS borne, and haue ſo goodly a citie of your owne, & full of ſo many goodly commodities: that ye will giue it vppe vnto theſe barbarous people, the CARTHAGINIANS, and moſt cruell murderers of the world? where you ſhould rather wiſh that there were many SICILIES betwixt them and GRECE. Haue ye ſo litle conſideration or iudgement to thinke, that they haue aſſembled an armie out of all APHRICKE, vnto Hercules pillers, and to the ſea ATLANTICKE, to come hither to fight to ſtabliſh Icetes tyrannie? who, if he had bene a wiſe and ſkilfull Captaine, would not haue caſt out his aunceſtors & founders, to bring into his countrie the auncient enemies of the ſame: but might haue receiued ſuch honor and authoritie of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reaſonably haue deſired, and that with all their fauour & good will. The ſouldiers that heard this tale, reported it again in their campe: Inſomuch they made Mago ſuſpect there was treaſon in hand, and ſo ſought ſome colour to be gone. But hereupon, notwithſtanding that Icetes praied him all he could to tarie, declaring vnto him how much they were ſtronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuaile by his hardines and good fortune, then exceede him in number of men: yet he hoyſed ſaile, and returned with ſhame enough into APHRIKE, letting ſlippe the conqueſt of all SICILE out of his hands, without any ſight of reaſon or cauſe at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon preſented battell before the citie, when the GRECIANS and he vnderſtoode that the CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they ſaw the hauen rid of all the ſhips: and then beganne to ieaſt at Magoes cowardlineſſe, and in deriſion proclaimed in the citie, that they would giue him a good reward that could bring them newes, whither the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS were fled. But for all this, Icetes was bent to fight, & would not leaue the ſpoile he had gotten, but defende the quarters of the citie he had poſſeſſed, at the ſwordes point, truſting to the ſtrength and ſituation of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceiuing that, deuided his armie, and he with one part thereof did ſet vpon that ſide which was the hardeſt to approch, and did ſtande vpon the riuer of ANAPVS: then he appointed another part of his armie to aſſault all at one time, the ſide of ACRADINA, whereof Iſias CORINTHIAN had the leading. The third part of his armie that came laſt from CORINTH, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led: he appointed to aſſault the quarter called EPIPOLES. Thus, aſſault being giuen on all ſides at one time, Icetes bandes of men were broken, and ranne their way. Now that the citie was thus wonne by aſſault, and come ſo ſodainely to the handes of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled: it is good reaſon we aſcribe it to the valiantneſſe of the ſouldiers, and the captaines great wiſedome. But where there was not one CORINTHIAN ſlaine, nor hurt in this aſſault: ſure me thinkes herein, it was only the worke and deede of fortune, that did fauour and protect Timoleon, to contend againſt his valiantneſſe. To the end that thoſe which ſhould hereafter heare of his doings, ſhould haue more occaſion to wonder at his good happe: then to praiſe and commend his valiantneſſe. For the fame of this great exploite, did in fewe daies not onely runne through all ITALIE, but alſo through all GRECE. Inſomuch as the CORINTHIANS, (who could ſcant beleeue their men were paſſed with ſafetie into SICILE) vnderſtood with all that they were ſafely arriued there, and had gotten the victory of their enemies: ſo proſperous was their iorney,& fortune ſo ſpeedily did fauor his noble acts. Timoleon hauing now the caſtle of CYRACVSA in his hands, did not follow Dion. For he ſpared not the caſtle for the beautie and ſtately building thereof, but auoiding the ſuſpition that cauſed Dion firſt to be accuſed, and laſtly to be ſlaine: he cauſed it to be proclaimed by trompet, that any SYRACVSAN whatſoeuer, ſhould come with crowes of iron & mattocks, to helpe to digge downe & ouerthrow the fort of the tyrants. There was not a man in all the citie of SYRACVSA, but went thither ſtraight, and thought that proclamation and day to be a moſt happie beginning, of the recouerie of their libertie. So they did not only ouerthrow the caſtle, but the pallace alſo, and the tombes: and generally all that ſerued in any reſpect for the memorie of any of the tyrants. And hauing cleared the place in few daies, and made all plaine: Timoleon at the ſute of the citizens, made counſell hals, and places of iuſtice to be built there: and did by this meanes ſtabliſh a free ſtate and popular gouernment, and did ſuppreſſe all tyrannicall power. Now, when he ſaw he had wonne a citie that had no inhabitants, which warres before had conſumed, and feare of tyrannie had emptied, ſo as graſſe grew ſo high and ranke in the great market place of SYRACVSA, as they graſed their horſes there, and the horſekeepers lay downe by them on the graſſe as they fed: and that all the cities, a few excepted, were full of redde deare and wilde bores, ſo that men giuen to delight in hunting, hauing leaſure, might find game many times within the ſuburbes and towne ditches, hard by the wals: and that ſuch as dwelt in caſtles and ſtrong holdes in the countrie, would not leaue them to come and dwell in cities, by reaſon they were all growen ſo ſtout, and did ſo hate and deteſt aſſemblies of counſel, orations, & order of gouernment, where ſo many tyrants had raigned. Timoleon thereupon ſeeing this deſolation, and alſo ſo few SYRACVSANS borne that had eſcaped, thought good, and all his Captaines, to write to the CORINTHIANS, to ſend people out of GRECE to inhabite the citie of SYRACVSA againe. For otherwiſe the countrie would grow barren and vnprofitable, if the ground were not plowed. Beſides, that they looked alſo for great warres out of AFRICKE: being aduertiſed that the CARTHAGINIANS had hung vp the bodie of Mago their generall vpon a croſſe (who had ſlaine himſelfe for that he could not anſwere the diſhonour laid to his charge) and that they did leauy another great mightie armie, to returne again the next yere following, to make warres in SICILE. Theſe letters of Timoleon being brought vnto CORINTH, and the Ambaſſadors of SYRACVSA being arriued with them alſo, who beſought the people to take care & protection ouer their poore citie, and that they would once againe be founders of the ſame: the CORINTHIANS did not greedily deſire to be Lords of ſo goodly and great a citie, but firſt proclaimed by the trumpet in all the aſſemblies, ſolemne feaſtes, and common plaies of GRECE, that the CORINTHIANS hauing deſtroyed the tyrannie that was in the citie of SYRACVSA, and driuen out the tyrants, did call the SYRACVSANS that were fugitiues out of their countrie, home againe, and all other SICILIANS that liked to come and dwell there, to enioy all freedome and libertie, with promiſe to make iuſt and equall diuiſion of the landes among them, the one to haue as much as the other. Moreouer they ſent out poſtes and meſſengers into ASIA, and into all the Ilands where they vnderſtoode the baniſhed SYRACVSANS remained: to perſwade and intreat them to come to CORINTH, and that the CORINTHIANS would giue them ſhips, Captaines, and meanes to conduct them ſafely vnto SYRACVSA, at their owne proper coſtes and charges. In recompence whereof, the citie of CORINTHE receiued euerie mans moſt noble praiſe and bleſſing, aſwell for deliuering SICILE in that ſort from the bondage of tyrantes: as alſo for keeping it out of the handes of the barbarous people, and reſtored the naturall SYRACVSANS and SICILIANS, to their home and countrie againe. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch SICILIANS as repaired to CORINTH vpon this proclamation (themſelues being but a ſmall number to inhabite the countrie) beſought the CORINTHIANS to ioyne to them ſome other inhabitants, aſwell of CORINTHE it ſelfe, as out of the reſt of GRECE: the which was performed. For they gathered together about tenne thouſande perſons, whom they ſhipped, and ſent to SYRACVSA. Where there were alreadie a great number of other come vnto Timoleon, aſwell out of SICILE it ſelfe, as out of all ITALIE beſides: ſo that the whole number (as Athanis writeth) came to three ſcore thouſand perſons. Amongeſt them he deuided the whole countrie, and

and ſold them houſes of the citie, vnto the value of a thouſand talents. And becauſe he would leaue the old SYRACVSANS able to recouer their owne, and make the poore people by this meanes to haue money in common, to defray the common charge of the citie, as alſo their expences in time of warres: the ſtatues or images were ſold, and the people by moſt voices did condemne them. For they were ſolemnely indited, accuſed, and arraigned, as if they had bene men aliue to be condemned. And it is reported that the SYRACVSANS, did reſerue the ſtatue of Gelon, an auncient tyrant of their citie, honouring his memorie becauſe of a great victorie he had wonne of the CARTHAGINIANS, neere the citie of HIMERA: and condemned all the reſt to be taken away out of euery corner of the citie, and to be ſold. Thus beganne the citie of SYRACVSA to repleniſh againe, and by litle and litle to recouer it ſelfe, many people comming thither from all parts to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to ſet all other cities at libertie alſo, and vtterly to roote out all the tyrants of SICILE and to obtaine his purpoſe, hee went to make warres with them at their owne doores. The firſt he went againſt was Icetes, whom he compelled to forſake the league of the CARTHAGINIANS, and to promiſe alſo that he would raſe al the fortreſſes he kept, & to liue like a priuate mã within the city of the LEONTINES. Leptines in like maner, that was tyrant of the citie of APPOLLONIA; and of many other litle villages thereabouts: when he ſaw himſelfe in daunger to be taken by force, did yeeld himſelfe. Whereupon Timoleon ſaued his life, & ſent him vnto CORINTHE: thinking it honorable for his countrie, that the other GRECIANS ſhould ſee the tyrants of SICILE in their chiefe citie of fame, liuing meanely and poorely like baniſhed people. When he had brought this to paſſe, hee returned forthwith to SYRACVSA about the ſtabliſhment of the common weale, aſſiſting Cephalus & Dionyſius, two notable men ſent from CORINTHE to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to ſtabliſh the goodlieſt ordinances for their common weale. And now in the meane time, becauſe the ſouldiers had a mind to get ſome thing of their enemies, & to auoid idleneſſe: he ſent them out abroad to a countrie ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, vnder the charge of Dimarchus, & Demaratus. Where they made many litle townes rebell againſt the barbarous people, and did not only liue in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered money together alſo to maintaine the warres. The CARTHAGINIANS on the other ſide, while they were buſie about the matters, came downe into LILYBEA, with an army of three ſcore & ten thouſand men, two hundred gallies, & a thouſand other ſhips & veſſels that caried engines of batterie, carts, victuals, munition, and other neceſſary prouiſion for a campe, intending to make ſporting wars no more, but at once to driue all the GRECIANS againe quite out of SICILE. For indeede it was an able army to ouercome all the SICILIANS, if they had bene whole of themſelues, & not deuided. Now they being aduertiſed that the SICILIANS had inuaded their countrie, they went towards them in great furie led by Aſdrubal & Amilcar, generals of the armie. This newes was ſtraight brought to SYRACVSA, & the inhabitants were ſo ſtriken with feare of the report of their armie: that being a maruellous great number of them within the citie, ſcant three thouſand of them had the harts to arme themſelues, and to goe to the field with Timoleon. Now the ſtrangers that tooke pay, were not aboue foure thouſand in all: and of them, a thouſand of their harts failed, & left him in mid way, and returned home againe. Saying, that Timoleon was out of his wits, and more raſh then his yeres required, to vndertake with fiue thouſand footmen, & a thouſand horſe, to go againſt threeſcore & ten thouſand men: and beſides, to carie that ſmall force he had to defend himſelfe withall, eight great daies iorney from SYRACVSA. So that if it chaunced they were compelled to flie, they had no place whither they might retire themſelues vnto with ſafetie, nor man that would take care to burie them, when they were ſlaine. Neuertheleſſe, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, hauing incouraged thoſe that remained with him, he made them march with ſpeede towards the riuer of CRIMESVS, where he vnderſtood he ſhould meete with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting vp vpon a litle hill, from whence hee might ſee the campe of the enemies on the other ſide: by chance certaine moyles fell vpon his army, loden with ſmallage. The ſouldiers tooke a conceit at the firſt vpõ ſight of it, & thought it was a token of ill lucke: becauſe it is a maner we vſe, to hang garlands of this herbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vſe to ſpeake, when one lyeth a paſſing in his bed: he lacketh but ſmallage. Aſmuch to ſay, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw thē from this fooliſh ſuperſtition, & diſcorage they tooke, ſtaied the army. And when he had vſed certaine perſwaſions vnto them, according to the time, his leaſure, and occaſion: he told them that the garland of it ſelfe came to offer them victorie before hand. For, ſaid he, the CORINTHIANS doe crowne them that winne the ISTMIAN games (which are celebrated in their country) with garlands of ſmallage.

And at that time alſo euen in the ſolemne ISTMIAN games, they vſed the garland of ſmallage for reward and token of victorie: and at this preſent it is alſo vſed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp, that they haue vſed braunches of pine apple trees in the ISTMIAN games. Now Timoleon had thus incouraged his men, as you haue heard before: he firſt of all tooke of this ſmallage, and made himſelfe a garland, & put it on his head. When they ſaw that, the Captaines and all the ſouldiers alſo tooke of the ſame, and made themſelues the like. The ſoothſaiers in like maner at the very ſame time, perceiued two eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a ſnake in her talents, which ſhe pierced through and through, and the other as ſhe flew, gaue a terrible cry. So they ſhewed them both vnto the ſouldiers, who did then all together with one voice call vpon the goddes for helpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of the ſommer, and towards the later end of May, the ſunne drawing towards the ſolſtice of the ſommer: when there roſe a great myſt out of the riuer, that couered all the fields ouer, ſo as they could not ſee the enemies campe, but onely heard a maruellous confuſed noiſe of mens voyces, as it had come from a great armie, and riſing vp to the toppe of the hill, they laide their targets downe on the ground to take a litle breath: and the ſunne hauing drawen and ſucked vp all the moiſt vapours of the myſte vnto the toppe of the hils, the aire beganne to be ſo thicke, that the toppes of the mountaines were all couered ouer with cloudes, and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and faire, that they might eaſily ſee the riuer of CRIMESVS, and the enemies alſo, how they paſſed it ouer in this ſort.

The order of the Carthaginians armie.

Firſt they had put their cartes of warres foremoſt, which were very hotly armed and well appointed. Next vnto them there followed tenne thouſand footemen, armed with white targets vpon their armes: whom they ſeeing a far off ſo well appointed, they coniectured by their ſtately march and goodly order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS themſelues. After them, diuerſe other nations followed confuſedly one with another, and ſo they thronged ouer with great diſorder. There Timoleon cōſidering the riuer gaue him oportunity to take them before they were halfe paſt ouer, and to ſet vpon what number he would: after he had ſhewed his men with his finger, how the battel of their enemies was deuided in two parts by meanes of the riuer, ſome of them being alreadie paſſed ouer, & the other to paſſe:

He commaunded Demaratus with his horſemen to giue a charge on the voward, to keepe them from putting themſelues in order of battell. And himſelfe comming downe the hill alſo with all his footemen into the valley, he gaue to the SICILIANS the two winges of his battell, mingling with them ſome ſtrangers that ſerued vnder him: & placed with himſelf in the midſt, the SYRACVSANS, with all the choice & beſt liked ſtrangers. So he taried not long to ioine, when he ſaw the ſmall good his horſemen did.

The ſeruice of the armed cartes.

For he perceiued they could not come to giue a luſtie charge vpon the battell of the CARTHAGINIANS, becauſe they were paled in with theſe armed carts, that ranne here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (vnleſſe they would haue put themſelues in danger to haue bene vtterly ouerthrowen) & in their returnes to giue venture of charge, by turnes on their enemies. Wherfore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out aloud to his footemen, to follow him couragiouſly, and to feare nothing.

Thoſe that heard his voice, thought it more then the voice of a man, whether the furie of his deſire to fight did ſo ſtraine it beyond ordinarie courſe, or that ſome god (as many thought it then) did ſtretch his voice to crie out ſo loud and ſenſibly. His ſouldiers anſwered him againe with the like voice: and praied him to lead them without longer delay.

Then he made his horſemen vnderſtand, that they ſhould draw on the one ſide from the cartes, and that they ſhould charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the flankes: and after he did ſet the formoſt ranke of his battell, target to target againſt the enemies, commaunding the trumpets withall to ſound. Thus with great furie he went to giue a charge vpon them, who valiantly receiued the firſt charge, their bodies being armed with good iron corſelets, and their heades with faire murrions of copper, beſides the great targets they had alſo, which did eaſily receiue the force of their dartes, and the thruſt of the pike. But when they came to handle their ſwordes, where agility was more requiſite then force: a fearefull tempeſt of thunder, and flaſhing lightning withall, came from the mountaines. After that came darke thicke cloudes alſo (gathered together from the toppe of the hils) and fell vpon the vally, where the battell was fought, with a maruellous extreame ſhowre of raine, fierce violent windes, and haile withall. All this tempeſt was vpon the Grecians backes, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindefold their eies, and continually tormented them with the raine that came full vpon them with the winde, and the lightnings ſo oft flaſhing amongſt them, that one vnderſtood not another of them. Which did maruellouſly trouble them, and ſpecially thoſe that were but freſh water ſouldiers, by reaſon of the terrible thunderclaps, and the noiſe, the boyſtrous winde and haile made vpon their harnes: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captains. Moreouer, the durt did as much annoy the Carthaginians, becauſe they were not nimble in their armour, but heauily armed as we haue told you: and beſides that alſo, when the plaites of their coates were through wet with water, they did lode and hinder them ſo much the more, that they could not fight with any eaſe. This ſtood the Grecians to great purpoſe, to throw them downe the eaſier. Thus when they were tumbling in the durt with their heauy armour, vp they could riſe no more. Furthermore, the riuer of Crimesus being riſen high through the great rage of waters, and alſo for the multitude of people that paſſed ouer it, did ouerflow the vally all about: which being full of diches, many caues, and hollow places, it was ſtraight all drowned ouer, and filled with many running ſtreames, that ran ouerthwart the fielde, without any certaine channell. The Carthaginians being compaſſed all about with theſe waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being ouercome with the ſtorme that ſtill did beat vpon them, and the Grecians hauing ſlaine of their men at the firſt onſet, to the number of foure hundred of their choiceſt men, who made the firſt front of their battell: all the reſt of their army turned their backs immediatly, and fled for life. Inſomuch, ſome of them being followed very neare, were put to the ſword in the middeſt of the vally: other, holding one another hard by the armes together, in the middeſt of the riuer as they paſſed ouer, were caried downe the ſtreame and drowned, with the ſwiftnes and violence of the riuer. But the greateſt number did thinke by footemanſhip to recouer the hils thereabouts, who were ouertaken by thē that were light armed, and put to the ſword euery man. They ſay, that of ten thouſand which were ſlaine in this battell, 3. thouſand of them were meere naturall citizens of Carthage, which was a very ſorrowfull and grieuous loſſe to the city. For they were of the nobleſt, the richeſt, the luſtieſt, and valianteſt men of all Carthage. For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former wars at any time before, where there died ſo many of Carthage at one field and battell, as were ſlaine at that preſent time. For before that time, they did alwaies entertaine the Fibyans, the Spaniards, & the Nomades, in all their wars: ſo as when they loſt any battell, the loſſe lighted not on them, but the ſtrangers paid for it. The men of accompt alſo that were ſlaine, were eaſily knowen by their ſpoiles. For they that ſpoiled them, ſtood not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, becauſe they found gold and ſiluer enough. For the battell being won, the Grecians paſſed ouer the riue, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their cariages and bagage. And as for the priſoners, the ſouldiers ſtole many of them away, and ſent them going: but of them that came too ſhort to make common diuiſion of the ſpoile among them, they were about fiue thouſand men, and two hundred cartes of war that were taken beſides. Oh, it was a noble ſight to behold the tent of Timoleon their generall, how they enuironed it all about with heaps of ſpoils of euery ſort: among which there were a thouſand braue corſelets guilt, and grauen, with maruellous curious works, and brought thither with them alſo ten thouſand targets. So the conquerors being but a ſmall number, to take the ſpoile of a multitude that were ſlaine they filled their purſes euen to the top. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battell, they ſet vp a marke or token of their victory. Thē Timoleon ſent vnto Corinth, with the news of this ouerthrow, the faireſt armors that were gotten in the ſpoile: becauſe he would make his countrey & natiue city ſpo-

ken of & cõmended through the world, aboue al the other cities of GREECE. For that at CORINTH only, their chiefe temples were ſet forth and adorned, not with ſpoiles of the GRECIANS, nor offerings gotten by ſpilling the bloud of their own nation and countrey: (which to ſay truly, are vnpleaſant memories) but with the ſpoils taken from the barbarous people their enemies, with inſcriptiõs witneſſing the valiancy and iuſtice of thoſe alſo, who by victory had obtained them. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS and their captaine Timoleon, (hauing deliuered the GRECIANS dwelling in SICILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had giuen thoſe offerings vnto the gods, to giue thanks for their victory. That done, Timoleon leauing the ſtrangers he had in pay, in the country ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, to ſpoile and deſtroy it: he returned with the reſt of his army vnto SYRACVSA. Wher at his firſt comming home, he baniſhed the thouſand ſouldiers that had forſaken him in his iourney, with expreſſe charge that they ſhould depart the city before ſun ſet. So theſe thouſand cowardly and mutinous ſouldiers paſſed ouer into ITALY, where, vnder promiſe of the countrey, they were all vnfortunatly ſlaine by the BRVTIANS: ſuch was the iuſtice of the gods to pay their iuſt reward of their treaſon. Afterwards, Mamercus the tyrant of CATANA, Icetes (whether it was for the enuy they did beare to Timoleons famous deeds; or for that they were afraid of him) perceiuing tyrants could looke for no peace at his handes: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote vnto them that they ſhould ſend another army and captaine ſodainly, if they would not vtterly be driuen out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS ſent Giſco thither with threeſcore and tenne ſailes, who at his firſt comming tooke a certaine number of GRECIAN ſouldiers into pay, which were the firſt the CARTHAGINIANS euer retained in their ſeruice: for they neuer gaue them pay vntill that preſent time, when they thought them to bee men inuincible, & the beſt ſouldiers of the world. Moreouer, the inhabitants of the territory of MESSINA, hauing made a ſecret conſpiracy amongeſt them ſelues, did ſlay foure hundred men that Timoleon had ſent vnto them: and in the territories ſubiect vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, near vnto a place they call HIERES, there was another ambuſh laid for Euthimus LEVCADIAN, ſo as him ſelfe and al his ſouldiers were cut in peeces. Howbeit the loſſe of them made Timoleons doings notwithſtanding more fortunate: for they were euen thoſe that had forcibly entred the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, with Philodemus the PHOCIAN, and with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their ſacriledge. Moreouer, they were loſe people & abiects, that were abhorred of euery body, who vacabondlike wãdred vp & down the country of PELOPONNESVS, when Timoleon for lack of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into SICILE, they alwaies ouercame in all battels they fought, whileſt they were in his cõpany. But in the end, when the fury of wars was pacified, Timoleon ſending them about ſome ſpeciall ſeruice to the aide of ſome of his, they were caſt away euery man of them: and not altogether, but at diuers times. So as it ſeemed that gods iuſtice, in fauor of Timoleon, did ſeperat them from the reſt, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deſertes, fearing leaſt good men ſhould ſuffer hurt by puniſhing of the euil. And ſo was the grace & good wil of the gods wonderfull towards Timoleon, not onely in matters againſt him, but in thoſe things that proſpered well with him. Notwithſtanding, the common people of SYRACVSA tooke the ieſting words and writings of the tyrants againſt them, in maruellous euill part. For Mamercus amongſt other, thinking wel of him ſelfe, becauſe he could make verſes & tragedies, hauing in certain battels gotten the better hand of the ſtrãgers, which the SYRACVSANS gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offered vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the temples of the gods: he ſet vp alſo theſe cutting verſes, in deriſion of them that were vanquiſhed.

Mamercus verſes, tyraunt of Catana.

VVith bucklers potlid like, which of no value were,
we haue theſe goodly targets wonne, ſo richly trimmed here, with purple colours finely wrought, and deckt with Ebonie.
All gorgeouſly with golde, and eke with Iuorie,

Calauria, a city of Sicile.

Theſe things done, Timoleon led his army before the city of CALAVRIA, and Icetes therewhile entred the confines of the SYRACVSANS with a maine army, & caried away a maruellous great ſpoile. And after he had done great hurt, and ſpoiled the country, he returned backe againe, and came by CALAVRIA, to deſpite Timoleon, knowing well enough hee had at that time but few men about him. Timoleon ſuffered him to paſſe by, but followed him afterwards with his horſemen and lighteſt armed footemen. Icetes vnderſtanding that, paſſed ouer the riuer called DAMIRIAS, and ſo ſtaied on the other ſide as though he would fight, truſting to the ſwift running of the riuer, and the height of the bankes on either ſide of the ſame. Now the captaines of Timoleons bands fell out maruellouſly amongeſt them ſelues, ſtriuing for honour of this ſeruice, which was cauſe of delaying the battell. For none would willingly come behind, but euery man deſired to lead the voward, for honor to begin the charge: ſo as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thruſting another to get before his companion. Wherfore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them ſhould paſſe ouer firſt, & tooke a ring of euery one of them, & caſt them all within the lap of his cloke: ſo rolling them together, by chance he pluckt one at the firſt, whereon was grauen the marks and tokens of a triūph. The yong captains ſeeing that, gaue a ſhout of ioy, & without tarying drawing of other lots, they began euery man to paſſe the riuer as quickly as they could, and to ſet vpon the enemies as ſodainly. But they being not able to abide their force, ran their waies, and were faine to caſt their armour away to make more haſt: howbeit there were a thouſand of thē lay dead in the field. And within few daies after, Timoleon leading his army to the city of LEONTINES, tooke Icetes aliue there, with his ſon Eupolemus, and the generall of his horſemen, who were deliuered into his hands by his own ſouldiers. So Icetes & his ſon were put to death, like the traytors & tyrants: and ſo was Euthydemus alſo, who though he was a valiant ſouldier, had no better mercy ſhewed him, then the father and the ſon, becauſe they did burdē him with certaine iniurious words he ſpake againſt the CORINTHIANS. For they ſay, that when the CORINTHIANS came firſt out of their country into SICILE, to make wars againſt the tyrants: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, ſaid amongſt other things, that they ſhould not need to be afraid, if

The women of Corinth were come out of their countrey.

Timoleon taketh Icetes, and Eupolemus his ſon aliue, and did put them to death.

Thus we ſee, that men do rather ſuffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: & do pardon their enemies, though they reuēge by deeds, becauſe they can do no leſſe. But as for iniurious words they ſeeme to proceed of a deadly hate, and of a canckred malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned again to SYRACVSA, the SYRACVSANS arrained the wiues of Icetes, and his ſon, and their daughters: who being arrained, were alſo condemned to die by the iudgement of the people. Of all the actes Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the fowleſt deede: for if he had liſted, he might haue ſaued the poore women from death. But he paſſed not for them, and ſo left them to the wrath of the citizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the iniuries that were done to Dion, after he had driuen out the tirant Dionyſius. For it was Icetes that cauſed Arete, the wife of Dion, to be caſt into the ſea, his ſiſter Ariſtomache, and his ſon that was yet a ſucking child, as we haue written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he wēt to CATANA againſt Mamercus, who taried him by the riuer of ABOLVS, where Mamercus was ouerthrowen in battell, & aboue two thouſand men ſlaine, the greateſt part whereof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whō Giſco had ſent for his reliefe. Afterwards he granted peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, vpō earneſt ſute made to him, with cōdition, that they ſhould keep on the other ſide of the riuer of LYCVS, and that it ſhould be lawfull for any of the inhabitants there that would, to come & dwell in the territory of the SYRACVSANS, and to bring away with them their gods, their wiues & their children: and furthermore, that frō thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS ſhould renoūce al league, confederacy, & alliance with the tyrants. Wherupon Mamercus hauing no hope of good ſucceſſe in his doings, hee would go into ITALY, to ſtir vp the LVCANIANS againſt Timoleon, and the SYRACVSANS. But they that were in his company, returned backe again with their gallies in the mid way: and when they were returned into SICILE, they deliuered vp the city of CATANA into the hands of Timoleon, ſo as Mamercus was conſtrained to ſaue him ſelf, and to flie vnto MESSINA, to Hippon the tyrant thereof. But Timoleon followed him, & beſieged the city both by ſea and by land. Whereat Hippon quaked for feare, and thought to flie by taking ſhippe, but hee was taken ſtatting. And the MESSINIANS hauing him in their hands, made al the children come from the ſchoole to the THEATER, to ſee one of the goodlieſt ſights that they could deuiſe: to wit, to ſee the tyraunt puniſhed, who was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeeld him ſelfe vnto Timoleon, to be iudged by the SYRACVSANS, ſo that Timoleon might not be his accuſer. So that he was brought vnto SYRACVSA, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But ſeeing that the people cried out, and made a great noiſe, becauſe they would not heare him, and that there was no likelyhood they would pardon him: he ranne ouerthwart the THEATER, and knocked his head as hard as he could driue, vppon one of the degrees whereon they ſate there to ſee their ſportes, thinking to haue daſhed out his brains, and haue rid him ſelfe ſodainely out of his paine. But he was not happy to die ſo, for he was taken ſtraight being yet aliue, & put to death as theeues and murtherers are. Thus did Timoleon roote all tyrants out of SICILE, and made an end of all wars there. And whereas he found the whole Ile, wilde, ſauage, and hated of the natural countrey men and inhabitants of the ſame, for the extreame calamities and miſeries they ſuffered, he brought it to be ſo ciuil, and ſo much deſired of ſtrangers, that they came far and neare to dwell there, where the naturall inhabitants of the countrey ſelfe before, were glad to flie and forſake it. For AGRIGENTVM, and GELA, two great cities, did witnes this, which after the wars of the ATHENIANS, had bene vtterly forſaken and deſtroied by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe. The one, by Megellus and Pheriſtus, two Captaines that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the Ile of CEO. And as neare as they could, they gathered again together the firſt ancient citizens and inhabitants of the ſame: whom Timoleon did not only aſſure of peace and ſafety to liue there, to ſettle them quietly together: but willingly did helpe them beſides, with all other things neceſſary, to his vttermoſt meane and abilitie, for which they loued and honored him as their father & founder. And this his good loue and fauour was common alſo to all other people of SICILE whatſoeuer. So that in all SICILE there was no truce taken in wars, not lawes eſtabliſhed, nor lands deuided, nor inſtitution of any pollicy or gouernment thought good or auaileable, if Timoleons deuiſe had not bene in it, as chief director of ſuch matters: which gaue him a ſingular grace to be acceptable to the gods, and generally to be beloued of all men. For in thoſe daies, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did maruellous great things: amongſt whom were theſe, Timotheus, Ageſilaus, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, which Epaminondas Timoleon ſought to followe in all thinges, as neare as he could, aboue any of them all. But in all the actions of theſe other great Captaines, their glory was alway mingled with violence, paine, and labor: ſo as ſome of them haue beene touched with reproch, and other with repentance. Wheras contrariwiſe, in all Timoleons doings (that only excepted which he was forced to do to his brother) there was nothing but they might with troth (as Timæus ſaid) proclaime the ſaying of Sophocles:

Timoleon compared with the famouſeſt men in Greece.

or Cupid, (god) haue thus yput, their handes vnto this ſame?

And like as Antimachus verſes, and Dionyſius painting both COLOPHONIANS, are full of ſinewes and ſtrength, and yet at this preſent we ſee they are things greatly labored, and traueled with much paine: and that contrariwiſe in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verſes, beſides the paſſing workmanſhip and ſingular grace in them, a man findeth at the firſt ſight, that they were eaſily made, and without great paine. Euen ſo in like manner, whoſoeuer will compare the painefull bloudy warres and battells of Epaminondas, and Ageſilaus, with the warres of Timoleon, in the which, beſides equity and iuſtice, there is alſo great eaſe and quietneſſe: he ſhall finde, waying things indifferently, that they haue not beene fortunes doings ſimply, but that they came of a moſt noble and fortunate courage. Yet he him ſelfe doth wiſely impute it vnto his good happe, and fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar friendes at CORINTHE, and in ſome other orations he made to the people of SYRACVSA: hee ſpake it many times, that he thanked the almighty goddes, that it had pleaſed them to ſaue and deliuer SICILE from bondage, by his meanes and ſeruice, and to giue him the honour and dignity of the name. And hauing builded a temple in his houſe, he did dedicate it vnto fortune, and furthermore did conſecrat his whole houſe vnto her. For he dwelt in a houſe the SYRACVSANS kept for him, and gaue him in recompence of the good ſeruice he had done them in the wars, with a maruellous faire pleaſaunt houſe in the country alſo, where he kept moſt when he was at leyſure. For he neuer after returned vnto CORINTHE againe, but ſent for his wife and children to come thither, and neuer dealt afterwards with thoſe troubles that fell out amongſt the GRÆCIANS, neither did make himſelfe to be enuied of the citizens: (a miſchiefe that moſt gouernours and captaines do fall into, through their vnſatiable deſire of honour and authoritie) but liued all the reſt of his life after in SICILE, reioycing for the great good he had done, and ſpecially to ſee ſo many cities, and thouſands of people happy by his meanes. But becauſe it is an ordinarie matter, and of neceſſitie, (as Simonides ſaith) that not onely all larkes haue a tuft vpon their heads, but alſo that in all cities there be accuſers, where the people rule: there were two of thoſe at SYRACVSA, that continually made orations to the people, who did accuſe Timoleon, the one called Laphyſtius, and the other Demænetus. So this Laphyſtius appointing Timoleon a certaine day to come and anſwer to his accuſation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the citizens began to mutinie, and would not in any caſe ſuffer the day of adiornment to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie them, declaring vnto them, that he had taken all the extreame paines and labour he had done, and had paſſed ſo many dangers, becauſe euery citizen and inhabitant of SYRACVSA, might frãckly vſe the liberty of their laws. And another time Demænetus in opẽ aſſembly of the people, reprouing many things Timoleon did when he was generall: Timoleon anſwered neuer a word, but only ſaid vnto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had ſo oft requeſted of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once ſee the SYRACVSANS haue full power and libertie to ſay what they would. Now Timoleon in all mens opinion, had done the nobleſt acts that euer GRÆCIAN captaine did in his time, and had aboue deſerued the fame and glory of all the noble exploits, which the rhetoricians with all their eloquent orations perſwaded the GRÆCIANS vnto, in the open aſſemblies, & common feaſts and plaies of GRECE, out of the which fortune deliuered him ſafe and ſound before the trouble of the ciuill warres that followed ſoone after: and moreouer he made a great proofe of his valiancie and knowledge in warres, againſt the barbarous people and tyrants, and had ſhewed himſelfe alſo a iuſt and mercifull man vnto all his friends, & generally to all the GRÆCIANS. And furthermore, ſeeing he won the moſt part of all his victories and triumphes, with out the ſhedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of them mourned by his meanes, and alſo rid all SICILE of all the miſeries and calamities raigning at that time, in leſſe then eight yeares ſpace: he being now growne olde, his ſight firſt beginning a litle to faile him, ſhortly after he loſt it altogether. This happened, not through any cauſe or occaſion of ſickneſſe that came vnto him, nor that fortune had caſually done him that iniurie: but it was in my opinion, a diſeaſe inheritable to him by his parents, which by time came to lay hold on him alſo. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like caſe had alſo loſt their ſight, which by little and little with age, was cleane taken from them. Howbeit Athanis the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that during the warres he had againſt Mamercus & Hippon, as he was in his campe at MYLLES, there came a white ſpot in his eyes, that dimmed his ſight ſomwhat: ſo that euery man perceiued that he ſhould loſe his ſight altogether. Notwithſtanding that, he did not raiſe his ſiege, but continued his enterpriſe, vntill he tooke both the tyrants at laſt: and ſo ſoone as he returned to SYRACVSA againe, he did put himſelfe out of his office of generall, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather becauſe things were brought to ſo good paſſe, as they thẽſelues could deſire. Now, that he paciently tooke this misfortune to be blinde altogether, peraduenture men may ſomwhat maruell at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the SYRACVSANS after he was blind, did ſo much honor him, & acknowledge the good he had done thẽ, that they went themſelues to viſit him oft, & brought ſtrangers (that were trauellers) to his houſe in the city, and alſo in the cõtry, to make them ſee their benefactor, reioycing & thinking thẽſelues happie, that he had choſen to end his life with them, & that for this cauſe he had deſpiſed the glorious returne that was prepared for him in GRECE, for the great & happy victories he had won in SICILE. But amongſt many other things the SYRACVSANS did, and ordained to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefeſt: that they made a perpetuall lawe, ſo oft as they ſhould haue warres againſt forrein people, and not againſt their owne countrimen that they ſhould euer chooſe a CORINTHIAN for their generall. It was a goodly thing alſo to ſee how they did honor him in the aſſemblies of their counſell. For if any trifling matter fell in queſtion among them, they diſpatched it of themſelues: but if it were a thing that required great counſell and aduiſe, they cauſed Timoleon to be ſent for. So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the aſſembly of the people was, and caried in euen ſo in his litter as he ſate: and then the people did all ſalute him with one voice, and he them in like caſe. And after he had pauſed a while to heare the praiſes and bleſſings the whole aſſembly gaue him, they did propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he deliuered his opinion vpon the ſame: which being paſſed by the voices of the people, his ſeruants caried him backe againe in his litter through the Theater, and the citizens did waite on him a litle way with cries of ioy, and clapping of hands, and that done, they did repaire to diſpatch the common cauſes by themſelues, as they did before.

So his old age being thus entertained with ſuch honour, and with the loue and good will of euery man, as of a common father to them all: in the end a ſickneſſe tooke him by the backe, whereof he died. So the SYRACVSANS had a certaine time appointed them to prepare for his funeralles, and their neighbours alſo thereabouts to come vnto it.

Timoleons funerals.

By reaſon whereof his funerall was ſo much more honorably performed in all things, and ſpecially for that the people appointed the nobleſt young gentlemen of the citie to carrie his coffin vpon their ſhoulders, richely furniſhed and ſet forth, whereon his body lay, & ſo did conueigh him through the place, where the pallace and caſtell of the tyrant Dionyſius had bene, which then was raſed to the ground. There accompanied his body alſo, many thouſands of people, all crowned with garlands of flowers, and apparrelled in their beſt apparell: ſo as it ſeemed it had bene the proceſſion of ſome ſolemne feaſt, and all their words were praiſings and bleſsings of the dead, with teares running downe their cheekes, which was a good teſtimonie of the entire good will and loue they did beare him, and that they did not this as men that were glad to be diſcharged of the honour they did him, neither for that it was ſo ordained: but for the iuſt ſorowe and griefe they tooke for his death, and for very hartie good-loue they did beare him.

And laſtly, the coffin being put vpon the ſtack of wood where it ſhould be burnt, Demetrius one of the heralds that had the lowdeſt voice, proclaimed the decree that was ordained by the people, the effect whereof was this. The people of SYRACVSA hath ordained, that this preſent body of Timoleon CORINTHIAN, the ſonne of Timodemus, ſhould be buried at the charges of the commonweale, vnto the ſumme of two hundred Minas, and hath honoured his memorie with playes and games of muſicke, with running of horſes, and with other exerciſes of the bodie, which ſhall be celebrated yerely on the day of his death for euermore: and this, becauſe he did driue the tyrants out of SICILE, for that he ouercame the barbarous people, and becauſe he repleniſhed many great cities with inhabitants againe, which the warres had left deſolate and vnhabited: and laſtly, for that he had reſtored the SICILIANS againe to their libertie, and to liue after their owne lawes.

And afterwards, his tombe was built in the market place, about the which a certaine time after, they builded certaine cloiſters and galleries to exerciſe the youth in, with exerciſe of their bodies, and the places ſo walled in, was called Timoleontium: and ſo long as they did obſerue the lawes, and ciuill policie he ſtabliſhed amongſt them, they liued long time in great continuall proſperitie.

THE COMPARISON OF Paulus Æmylius with Timoleon.

PAVL. AEMILIVS.
TIMOLEON. CORIN. IMP.

SYth theſe two men were ſuch as the Hiſtoriographers haue deſcribed them to be: it is certaine, that comparing the one with the other, we ſhall finde no great oddes nor difference betweene them. For firſt of all, the warres they made, haue bene againſt great and famous enemies: the one againſt the MACEDONIANS, and the other againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the realme of MACEDON, which he tooke from the ſeuenth king that raigned by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, ſince the time of the great Antigonus: and the other draue all the tyrants out of SICILE, and reſtored the whole Ile and cities therein, vnto their former libertie. Vnleſſe ſome will alledge perhaps that there was this difference betweene them, that AEmylius fought againſt king Perſeus, when he had all his power whole and entire, and had fought with the ROMAINES many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon ſet vpon Dionyſius, when he was in greateſt deſpaire, and in manner vtterly caſt away. On the contrarie ſide, it may be obiected for Timoleon, that he ouercame many tyrants, and a mightie great armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a very ſmall number of men, and yet men of all ſorts: not as AEmylius with a great armie of well trained and expert ſouldiers in warres, but with men gathered together at aduenture of all ſorts, being mercenarie hirelings, and fighting men for pay, loſe people, and men vnruly in wars, that would do but what they liſted. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we muſt confeſſe that the praiſe is due vnto the generall. Both the one and the other kept their hands cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it ſeemeth that AEmylius came ſo faſhioned and prepared, by the good ciuill lawe, and morall diſcipline of his countrie: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards faſhioned himſelfe to be that he was. And this is to be proued: for that all the ROMAINES in that time were ſo ciuilly brought vp, and exceeded all other in ſtraight keeping the lawes of their countrie. Where to the contrarie, there was not one of the captaines of the GRÆCIANS that came then, or were ſent into SICILE, but fell ſtraight to corruption, when he had put his foote in SICILE, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine ſuſpition of him, that he aſpired to the kingdom, & imagined in his head to ſtabliſh a certaine Empire at SYRACVSA, like vnto that of LACEDÆMON. Timeus the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that the SYRACVSANS ſent Gilippus with ſhame backe againe into his countrie, for his vnſatiable greedy couetouſneſſe, and for his great thefts, and bribes taken in his charge. Diuers other haue alſo written the great treaſons and falſhoods Pharax SPARTAN, & Calippus

ATHENIAN did commit, both of them ſeeking to make themſelues lordes of SYRACVSA and yet what men are they, and what meanes had they to haue ſuch a fooliſh vaine hope and fancie in their heads? Conſidering that the one did follow & ſerue Dionyſius, after that he was driuen out of SYRACVSA: and the other alſo was but a priuate captaine of a band of footmen, of thoſe that came in with Dion. Timoleon in contrarie manner was ſent, to be generall of the SYRACVSANS, vpon their great inſtance and ſute. And he hauing no need to ſeeke or hunt after it, but onely to keepe the power and authoritie they did willingly put into his hands: ſo ſoone as he had deſtroyed and ouerthrowne all ſuch as would vniuſtly vſurpe the gouernement, he did immediatly of his owne good wil, franckly reſigne vp his office and charge, And ſure, ſo is this a notable thing to be commended, and eſteemed in Paulus Æmylius: who hauing conquered ſo great and riche a realme, he neuer increaſed his goods the value of one farthing, neither did ſee nor handle any money at all, although he was very liberall, and gaue largely vnto others. I meane not in ſpeaking this to vpbraide or deteɕt Timoleon, for that he accepted a faire houſe the SYRACVSANS gaue him in the citie, and a goodly mannor alſo in the countrie: for in ſuch caſes there is no diſhoneſtie in receiuing, but ſo is it greater honeſty to refuſe, then to take. But that vertue is moſt rare and ſingular, where we ſee they will receiue nor take nothing, though they haue iuſtly deſerued it. And if it be ſo, that the body is ſtronger and better compounded, which beſt abideth change of parching heate, and nipping colde: and that the minde is much more ſtronger & ſtable, that ſwelleth not vp with pride of proſperitie, nor droopeth for ſorow in aduerſity. Thẽ it appeareth, that Æmylius vertue was ſo much more perfeɕt, in that he ſhewed himſelfe of no leſſe graue and conſtant a minde, in the patience he endured for his loſſe and ſorrow happened vnto him: (looſing at one time in maner, both his children) then he had done before, in all his triumphe & greateſt felicitie. Where Timoleon to the contrary, hauing done a worthy aɕt againſt his brother, could with no reaſon ſuppreſſe the griefe and ſorowe he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentance, continued the ſpace of twentie yeares together, and neuer durſt once onely ſhew his face againe in the market place, nor deale any more in matters of the commonweale. Truely, for a man to beware to do euill, and to ſhun from euill, it is a very good and comely thing: ſo alſo to be ſorie, and a feard of euery reproache, and ill opinion of the worlde, it ſheweth a ſimpleneſſe of nature, and a good and well diſpoſed minde, but no manly courage.

THE LIFE OF Pelopidas.

CATO the elder, aunſwered certaine on a time, that maruellouſly commended a bolde, a venturous, and deſperate man for the warres: that there was great oddes, to eſteeme manhood ſo much, and life ſo litle. And ſurely it was wiſely ſpoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue pay to a ſouldier among other, that was verie hardie and venturous, but he had a naughtie ſickely bodie. The king asked him one day, what he ayled to be ſo pale, and euill coloured? The ſouldier told him, he had a ſecret diſeaſe vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The king hearing him ſay ſo, commaunded his Phiſitians and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they ſhould heale him with all poſſible ſpeede: and ſo they did. After the ſouldier had his health againe, he would venter no more ſo deſperately in the warres, as he did before. Inſomuch, king Antigonus ſelfe perceiuing his ſlackneſſe and drawing backe, rebuked him, and ſaide vnto him: that he wondred to ſee ſo great a chaunge and alteration in him. The ſouldier neuer ſhrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainely. Your ſelfe, and it pleaſe your maieſtie, is cauſe of my cowardlineſſe now, by healing my diſeaſe, that made my life lothſome to me. Much like were a SIBARITANS words, touching the life and manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS. That it was no maruell they had ſuch a deſire to die in the warres, ſeeing they did it to ridde themſelues of their troubles, and moſt miſerable and ſtraight life. But we muſt not wonder though the SYEARITANS, being womaniſh men, and altogether giuen to pleaſure, did ſo thinke: that thoſe men hated their liues, who feared not death, for the deſire they had to doe good, and goodwill they had to do their dutie. Which was contrarie in the LACEDÆMONIANS. For they were of opinion, that to liue and die willingly, was a vertue: as theſe funerall verſes doe witneſſe.

But euen as life did end, or death was brought to paſſe, ſo life or death, was good or bad, this their opinion was.

And in deede to flie death is no ſhame, ſo it proceede not of a cowardly heart: neither to deſire death is commendable, if it be with contempt and hate of life. This is the reaſon why Homer ſaith, the valianteſt men are euer beſt armed, when they come to battell. The law makers among the GRÆCIANS, doe euer puniſh him that caſtes away his target, but neuer him that caſteth away his ſworde or launce. For euery man muſt firſt thinke to defende himſelfe, before he ſeeke to hurt his enemie, and ſpecially ſuch as haue the whole ſtate of a realme in their hands, and be generals of the field. For if the compariſon be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captaine made, that in an armie of men, the light horſemen reſemble the handes, the men of armes the feete, the battell of footemen the ſtomacke and breaſt, the captaine, the head of a mans bodie: it ſeemeth then that the venturous captaine putting himſelfe in daunger without cauſe, is not onely careleſſe of his owne life, but alſo of all theirs whoſe liues depende vpon his ſafetie. As contrarily, he being carefull of his owne perſon, cannot but be carefull of his ſouldiers that ſerue vnder him. Therefore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, and a worthie man otherwiſe, did vnwiſely anſwere a ſoothſaier that bad him take heede to him ſelfe: for the ſignes and tokens of the ſacrifices did threaten his death. SPARTA, ſaid he, ſtandeth not vpon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by ſea or by land man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of himſelfe: but as captaine or lieuetenant generall, he had the whole power and force of the armie in his perſon. For he was not a man alone, when ſo many mens liues were loſt with his. Now old Antigonus was of a contrarie minde. For he being readie to giue battell by ſea, about the Ile of ANDROS, made a better anſwere to one that ſaide vnto him: his enemies had moe ſhips then himſelfe. For how many ſhips doeſt thou reckon then my ſelfe, ſaid he? Therein he did wiſely to make great account of the worthines of a generall, ſpecially when it is ioyned with hardineſſe and experience. For the chiefeſt point of ſeruice, is to ſaue him, that ſaueth all other. For when Chares on a time ſhewed the ATHENIANS openly, the ſundry woundes and cuts he had receiued vpon his bodie, and his target alſo thruſt through with many pikes: Timotheus ſtraight ſaid vnto him, Chares, I am not of thy minde. For when I did beſiege the citie of SAMOS, I was aſhamed to ſee a dart throwne from the wals, light hard by me, for that I ſhewed my ſelfe a raſh young man, and more venturous then became a generall of ſo great an armie. For when it ſtandeth much vpon the whole armie, and that it is neceſſarie the generall thereof do put himſelfe in daunger: then he ſhould put himſelf forward, and occupie both hands and bodie without reſpect, not regarding their words that ſay, a good wiſe captaine ſhould die for age, or at the leaſt old. But where there is ſmall honour to be wonne by very good ſucceſſe, and contrariwiſe much loſſe and deſtruction by great miſfortune: no man of wiſedome or iudgement would wiſh a generall to fight as a priuate ſouldier, to hazard the loſſe of a generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the liues of Pelopidas and of Marcellus, both which were worthie men, and died otherwiſe then they ſhould. For they both were valiant ſouldiers in the field, and did both of them honour their countrie with famous victories, and ſpecially againſt great and dreadfull enemies. For the one was the firſt (as they ſay) that ouerthrew Hanniball, who was neuer ouercome by any before. And the other alſo ouercame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battell, that ruled all GRECE at that time both by ſea and by land. Yet they both careleſſely loſt their liues, by venturing too boldly: when their countrie ſtoode in greateſt neede of ſuch men and captaines as they were. This is the cauſe why we following the reſemblance that was betweene them, haue compared their liues together. Pelopidas, the ſonne of Hippoclus, came of one of the nobleſt houſes of the citie of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left him heire of all his lands and goods, being but a young man. So he ſtraight ſhewed himſelfe willing to do good with his money, to thoſe that needed helpe, and were worthie: to let the world ſee, that his money was not his maſter. For as Ariſtotle ſaith, of theſe rich men, the moſt part of them do not vſe their goods, for extreeme couetouſneſſe: other againe do abuſe them, as being giuen to ouermuch pleaſures. So rich men became ſlaues all their life time, ſome to pleaſure, other to profit. Now, all Pelopidas other friendes would be beholding to him, and take very thankfully his curteſie & liberalitie towards them. But Epaminondas could neuer be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeit Pelopidas ſelfe folowed Epaminondas maner:

for he tooke a pride and pleaſure to go ſimply apparelled, to fare meanely, to labour willingly, and to make warres openly as he did. He was euen ſuch an other, as Euripides the Poet deſcribed Capaneus to be, when he ſaid of him:

He rich and wealthy was, yet was he therewithall,
no wight that purchaſt worldly hate, nor inſolent at all.

For he would haue beene aſhamed, that the pooreſt man of the citie of THEBES, ſhould haue worne meaner apparell vpon his backe, then himſelfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouertie was not dainty to him, becauſe his parents were euer poore and yet for all that he paſſed it ouer more eaſily by ſtudie of Philoſophie, which he gaue himſelfe vnto, & for that from his youth he liked to leade a ſpare life without exceſſe. Where Pelopidas matched in a noble houſe, and maried highly, and had two children by his wife: neuertheleſſe he had no minde to keepe or increaſe his goods the more for that, but gaue himſelfe altogether to ſerue the common weale as long as he liued. By reaſon whereof his wealth decaied, and his beſt friendes grew angrie with him, telling him how he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was ſo neceſſarie, as to haue goods. And he anſwered them: In deede they are neceſſarie I do confeſſe it, but yet for ſuch a one as this poore, lame, and blind man that ſtandeth by. They both were a like borne to all vertue, ſauing that Pelopidas tooke moſt pleaſure in exerciſe of his bodie and ſtrength, and Epaminondas in the exerciſe of his wit & learning. So as the paſtime ech of them tooke when they were at leaſure was, that the one delighted to wraſtle and to hunt, and liked any kind of exerciſe of his bodie: and the other to heare, to ſtudie, and alwaies to learne ſome thing of Philoſophie. But among all the excellent gifts and good parts in either of them, and that moſt wanne them honor and eſtimation in the world, they were only commended, and ſingularly noted of wiſe men, for the perfect loue and friendſhip that was euer inuiolably kept betweene them vntill their deathes: hauing beene ioyned together in ſo many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwiſe in matters of ſtate and gouernment. For if a man will conſider, and looke into the doings of Ariſtides, Themiſtocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of diſſentions, enuies, and ſuſpitions they were one againſt another in gouerning the common weale: and againe will conſider the loue, honor, & kindnes, that continued alwaies betwixt Pelopidas & Epaminondas: no doubt they will ſay theſe two are more worthy to be called brethren in warre, (as they ſay) & companions in gouernment, then any of them we haue named before, whoſe care & ſtudie was alwaies rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, & the only cauſe thereof was their vertue. For their actes ſhewed they did not ſeeke glorie, nor riches for themſelues (the couetouſneſſe whereof doth alwaies breede quarrels and enuie) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with another, with a great kindnes & eſtimation of themſelues, to ſee their countrie flouriſh, and grow to great honour through their ſeruice, and in their time: and ſo they reckoned all the good exploites both of the one and the other, that tended to that end, as their owne. The moſt part of writers thinke, this great and earneſt loue the one did beare to another, did grow firſt betweene them in a iorney they made together vnto MANTINIA, to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both ſet in battell ray, one hard by an other among the footemen, againſt the Arcadians that ſtood before them: it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACEDÆMONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determining to die rather then to flie, ſtoode cloſe together, and fought with the enemies that came vpon them: vntill ſuch time as Pelopidas being hurt in ſeuen places before, fell downe at the laſt vpon a heape of dead bodies, aſwell of their owne ſouldiers as of their enemies, euen one vppon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had bene ſlaine, ſtept notwithſtanding before him to defend his bodie and armour, and he alone fought againſt many, being willing to die rather then to forſake Pelopidas lying amongeſt the dead bodies: vntill himſelfe being thruſt into the breaſt with a pike, and ſore cut on his arme with a ſworde, was euen readie to giue ouer, when Ageſipolis (king of the LACEDÆMONIANS) came with the other point of the battell in happie houre, who ſaued both their liues paſt all hope. Now after this battell, the LACEDÆMONIANS both in words and deedes did courteouſly intreat the THEBANS as their friendes and confederates.

Notwithſtanding, in truth they beganne to feare the power and great courage of that citie, and ſpecially the faction and aſſociates Iſmenias and Androclidas had ſet vp, whereof Pelopidas alſo was a companion: becauſe they thought it was popular, & inclined much to deſire liberty. Wherupon Archias, Leontidas, & Philip, all three great wealthy men of the citie of THEBES, and miſliking to be equall with other citizens, did perſwade Phæbidas, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that going and comming through the countrie of BOEOTIA with an armie, he would one day aſſay to take the caſtle of THEBES called CADMEA, & driuing thoſe out of the citie that would reſiſt him, he would put the gouernement of the ſtate into the hands of a few of the nobleſt perſons, who would be at the deuotion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & obey them in all things. Phæbidas brought it to paſſe, and did worke his feate before the THEBANS muſtruſted any thing vpon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the caſtle, he apprehended Iſmenias, & ſent him to LACEDÆMON, where ſhortly after they put him to death. Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other, ſaued themſelues by flying, and were baniſhed THEBES by ſound of Trumpet. Epaminondas taried ſtill in THEBES, and no man touched him, for they made ſmall account of him, becauſe he was altogether giuen to his booke: and though his goodwill had ſerued him to haue done ſome feate, his pouertie made him vnable to doe any thing. The LACEDÆMONIANS vnderſtanding of the taking of the caſtle, did ſtraight put Phæbidas out of his charge, and ſet a fine of a hundred thouſand Drachmes vpon his head: but yet they kept ſtill the caſtle of CADMEA in their handes with a great garriſon. All the other cities and people of GRECE did wonder much at it, that they ſhould allow the fact, and puniſh notwithſtanding the doer. So the THEBANS hauing loſt their auncient libertie, and being made ſubiect by both theſe, Archias and Leontidas, ſo as all hope was taken from them euer to winde out of this tyrannie, or at any time to ouerthrowe it, ſeeing it was maintained and defended by the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that they could not poſſibly take from them all the ſeigniorie and dominion they had throughout GRECE, aſwell by ſea as by land: Leontidas and his followers notwithſtanding, when they vnderſtoode that they who were baniſhed from THEBES, were very well receiued and entertained of the people at ATHENS, and much made of alſo of the nobility, they ſought ſecretly by treaſon to haue them killed. To doe this feate, they ſent certaine men vnknowen vnto ATHENS, who by treaſon ſlew Androclidas, howbeit they miſſed the killing of the other. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould not receiue ſuch as were baniſhed from THEBES, nor that they ſhould fauour them, but driue them out of their citie, as thoſe which by their allies were iuſtly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS notwithſtanding, being men alwaies ciuilly giuen, and inclined in nature to humanitie, as being borne and bred vp withall, and very deſirous beſides to requite the THEBANS curteſie, who had beene the chiefeſt meanes and doers in reſtoring againe the popular ſtate and gouernemēt at ATHENS: they would by no means offer the THEBANS any ſuch iniury, ſeing they had ſtabliſhed a law and decree, that if any ATHENIAN paſſing to and fro through the countrie of BOEOTIA, did beare armor againſt the thirtie tyrants, that were gouernors and oppreſſors of the libertie of ATHENS, there ſhould no BOEOTIAN ſeeme to ſee, or knowe any thing thereof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger ſort, did procure ſtill euerie one that was baniſhed, to ſeeke the libertie of his countrie, and openly made an oration to them all, declaring that it were not onely a cowardly part, but alſo a wicked offence to the goddes, if they would ſuffer their countrie to remain ſo in continuall bondage, & ſtrangers to inhabite it with a garriſon, to make them ſubiect to the yoke: & they in the meane time to be contented to ſaue themſelues, to liue delicately & idlely at ATHENS, to ſtudie to do what ſhall pleaſe the ATHENIANS to command them, & to be affraid of the orators, and thoſe which through eloquence can perſwade the common people to doe what they luſt. Therefore he perſwaded them that they ſhould hazard all, being a matter of ſo great weight, and take example of Thraſybulus noble courage and hardines: who departing from THEBES, did driue out the tyrants that did oppreſſe ATHENS: & euen ſo, we departing from ATHENS, ſhould ſeeke to deliuer THEBES alſo frō bondage. When he had by theſe perſwaſions drawen thē to his opinion they ſecretly ſent vnto their friendes that remained ſtill in THEBES, to let them vnderſtande their minde and determination: who all liked very well of of their purpoſe. Inſomuch Charon that was the chiefeſt man among them, promiſed to lend them his houſe to aſſemble in. Philidas alſo found meanes to be ſecretary to Philip and Archias, who were gouernours and captaines of the city at that time for the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas on the other ſide making no ſhew of any thing, had of long time practiſed to ſturre vp the courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they were at any games or exerciſes of body, hee would euer procure them to wraſtle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. And after he ſaw them reioyce when they had caſt them, and that they were the ſtronger: he would chide them, and tell them they might be aſhamed, for lacke of courage to ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to hold their noſes to the grindſtone, that were nothing like to them in ſtrength. Now, the confederats appointed a day certaine, to breake the iſe of their pretended enterpriſe, and agreed that Pherenicus, with other that were baniſhed, ſhould tary at the village of THRIASIVM, and that they ſhould ſend the valianteſt and luſtieſt young men before, to giue the venter to enter the city: adding this therewithall, that if the enemies fortuned to ſurpriſe them, all the other of the conſpiracy ioyntly together, ſhould be ready to giue order, that their fathers, mothers, & children, ſhould lacke nothing neceſſary for them. Pelopidas was the firſt man offered him ſelfe to vndertake the enterpriſe: and after him Melon, Damoclidas, and Theopompus, all three, men of the greateſt houſes of THEBES, who loued maruellouſly together, and for no reſpect would euer offend one another, although from the beginning there was euer emulation among them for honour and glory, by ſtriuing who ſhould exceede other in vertue and valiantnes. Now they were twelue of them, who taking leaue of the reſt, ſent a foote poſt before to Charon, to aduertiſe him of their comming: and they thẽ ſelues went on their iourney caſting litle ſhort clokes vpon them, and taking houndes with them, and hunters ſtaues in their handes, becauſe their enterpriſe ſhould not be miſtruſted by thoſe that met thẽ on the way, & that they ſhould think them hunters vp and downe the fieldes for their pleaſure. So, when their meſſenger they ſent came to the city, and had told Charon that they were comming: hee neuer ſhrunke from his word, though the danger toward was great, but like a ſtoute and honeſt man did abide by his promiſe he made, and told him they ſhould be moſt heartely welcome to his houſe. But an other man called Hippoſthenidas, very honeſt otherwiſe, and one that loued his country and the preſeruation thereof, and a good friend of thoſe alſo that were baniſhed: fainting ſtraight vpon the ſodaine report of theſe newes, and his mind was troubled, and his heart failed him ſo, as his noſe fell a bleeding, to thinke vpon the greatnes of the inſtant danger hee was like to fall into, hauing neuer caſt before with him ſelfe, how by this enterpriſe they ſhould put all the empire of the LACEDÆMONIANS in hazard of vtter deſtruction, and lay a plotte beſides to ouerthrow all their owne common weale and ſtate, by laying all their hope vppon a few baniſhed mẽ, hardly to wade through with their enterpriſe. Wherupon ſo ſoon as he was come home, he ſecretly diſpatched a meſſenger one of his familiar friends, vnto Melon and Pelopidas, to will them they ſhould defer their enterpriſe for better oportunity, & ſo to returne backe againe to ATHENS. Chlidon was the mã he ſent of this meſſage, who preſently went home to his houſe: and taking his horſe out of the ſtable, bad his wife fetch him the bridle quickly. The bridle not being readily to be found, ſhe told him ſhe had lent it out to one of their neighbors. Then they fell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to fowle words, and laſtly his wife fell a curſing of him, and praied the gods he might haue ill lucke in his iourney, and thoſe that ſent him. Chlidon hauing ſpent the moſt part of the day chiding and brawling with his wife about the bridle, and furthermore miſliking the tokens of his wiues curſing and banning of him: hee determined not to go a foot out of the dores of that arrant, and ſo went about ſome other buſines. Thus had this noble enterpriſe in manner bene altogether daſhed, before it was fully begun. Now thoſe that were in Pelopidas company, changed apparell with the country men, becauſe they would not be knowen, and did deuide thẽ ſelues, for that they would not come into the city all together, but at diuers gates, being day light. At that time it was a maruellous wind and great ſnow, & the weather was ſo boiſtrous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the cõſpirators, that they were not knowen when they came into the city. So their friends and confederats within the city receiued them as they came, & brought them to Charons houſe: where were aſſembled together, with thoſe that were baniſhed, eight and forty perſons only. Now for the tyrants, thus ſtood the matter with them. Philidas their ſecretary was of the conſpiracy, as wee haue told you before, and he knew all the practiſe. Wherefore he had long before ſolemnly bidden Archias and his company, to ſupper to his houſe that very night, to be mery together, and had promiſed to entertaine them with women to welcome them withal: of purpoſe, that when they had in their full cups, & were in the middeſt of all their pleaſure, the conſpirators might then vſe them as they would. So they being ſet at table, before they were ſped of their cups, one came to them, and told them truly of the treaſon (not the particularities, neither as a thing certaine, but of a rumor onely that ran abroad in the towne) how the baniſhed men were hidden in Charons houſe. Philidas would haue paſſed the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would needes ſend one of his gard ſtraight for Charon, to commaund him to come to him preſently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themſelues to worke their feat, being armed euery man, and their ſwords in their hands, when vpon a ſodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the houſe running ſtraight to the gate, came backe againe afeard to tell them that it was one of Archias gard that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernors. Then were they in doubt that their practiſe was diſcouered, and that they were all caſt away, before they could make any proofe of their valiantnes: notwithſtãding, they were all of opinion, that Charon ſhould obey the meſſage, and that he ſhould preſent him ſelfe before the gouernors, to take away all ſuſpition from them. Charon of himſelf was a ſtout man, very conſtant, and reſolute in danger for his own perſon: yet it grieued him much at that time, for feare the confederates ſhould ſuſpect him he had bewraied them, if ſo many honeſt citizens whom he had lent his houſe vnto, ſhould vnfortunatly miſcary. Therfore before he went out of his houſe, he wẽt into his wiues chãber to fetch his ſon, that was a goodly boy, but ſtrong as any boy of his age could be: ſo he brought him to Pelopidas, and praied him, if he vnderſtood he had betrayed them any way, or otherwiſe had ſought their hurt, they ſhould then vſe his ſon as an enemy, without any compaſſion towardes him. When the confederats ſaw the good zeale and true noble minde of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he ſhould thinke any of them ſo faint hearted, or timerous, for any danger could come to them, that they ſhould ſuſpect or accuſe him for anie thing: and therewith all they praied him, not to leaue the boy with them, but rather to conuay him into ſome place out of the tyrants danger, where he might be brought vp, that one daie he might be reuenged of the wrong and iniury they had done to them, and to their country. Charon anſwered thẽ, he would not take him away, and that he ſaw no life nor health more happy for him, then to die with his father without infamy, and with ſo many honeſt men his frends. So after he had beſought the gods to proſper them, and had encouraged and embraced euery one of the confederators one after another: he went to the gouernors, and ſtudied by the way ſo to frame his words and countenance, as though he ſhould ſeeme to thinke of any thing els, then of that he purpoſed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feaſt, Archias & Philidas him ſelfe came vnto him, & asked him: Charon, what are they (ſaid they) that are come into the city, and hidden in ſome houſe, with certain citizens, that do accompany them? Charon was ſomewhat abaſhed at the firſt, and asked them againe: what men be they? who are they that hides them in the city? But when he perceiued that Archias could tell nothing of certainety, then he thought ſtraight that ſome man hadde informed them that was not priuy to the practiſe, but had heard ſome thing of it. Thereupon hee willed them to take heede it was no falſe alarome, to make them afrayed: neuertheleſſe (ſaid he) I will enquire further of it: for at all aduenture it is good to be circumſpect in ſuch a caſe to be ſure. Philidas aunſwered him, he ſaid truly: and ſo he brought Archias backe againe into the hall, where he made him drinke deeper then before, ſtill entertaining the company with hope of the womens comming. Charon returning home againe, found all the confederats ready to attempt their enterpriſe, not as mẽ that reckoned of their liues, nor that had any hope to preuaile: but as thoſe that were determined to die valiantly, & to ſell their liues dearly. Now he truly told vnto Pelopidas only, what was ſaid vnto him: and the reſt, he told that Archias had ſent for him to ſpeake with him, of other matters. The ſtorme of the former danger was ſcant blowen ouer, but fortune ſent them an other. For immediatly vpon talke had with Charon at the firſt, came a meſſenger from ATHENS, that brought a letter to the ſame Archias, written by the Biſhop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias alſo as himſelf, & was his old hoſt and friend: wherin he wrote not of ſimple coniecture, nor ſurmiſed ſuſpition, but the plaine conſpiracy in euery degree, as afterwards it fell out. So the meſſenger was brought to Archias that was drunke, and deliuering him the letter, he ſaid vnto him. Sir, he that ſẽdeth you this letter, ſtraightly charged me to tell you, that you ſhould preſently read the contents thereof, becauſe it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing ſaid vnto him: waighty matters to morrow. So he took the letter and put it vp, & then fell againe to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But euer after, the GRECIANS made this a common prouerb among them, waighty matters to morrow. Now when the conſpirators ſpied their time to go about their buſines, they deuided them ſelues in two companies. Pelopidas and Damoclidas went with one company, to ſet vpon Leontidas & Hypates, becauſe they dwelt neare together: Charon and Melon with the reſt, went againſt Archias and Philip, being diſguiſed in womens apparel they had put vpon their priuy coats, & wearing garlands of pine apple and firre trees on their heads, they couered al their faces. So when they came to ſhew thẽ ſelues at the hall dore where the banket was made, they that were in the hall at the firſt ſight, thinking they had bene the women they looked for, began to ſhout, and made great noiſe for ioy. But when the conſpirators caſt their eies round about the hall to know thoſe which were at the table, they drew out their ſwords, and ſet vpon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they ſhewed themſelues what they were. Then Philidas bad his gueſts he had bidden to the banket with them, that they ſhould not ſtir, for they ſhould haue no hurt: ſo ſome of them ſate ſtill. But the greateſt number of them would needes from the bord, to defend their gouernors. Howbeit becauſe they were drunke that they knew not what they did, they were ſoone ſlaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterpriſe was not ſo eaſie. For they went againſt Leontidas, that was a ſober diſcrete man, and withal, hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his dores were ſhut vp, and they knocked long before any man came to the dore. At the length, one of his men that heard them rappe ſo hard, with much a do came to open the dore: but he had no ſooner thruſt backe the bolt of the dore, and beganne to open it, but they puſhed it from them with ſuch a force vpon him altogether, that they laied him on the grounde, and went ſtraight to his maiſters chamber. Leontidas hearing the noiſe of them that ranne vppe to him in ſuch haſt, preſently miſtruſted the matter: and leaping out of his bed, tooke his ſword in his hand, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chãber all night, for if they had beene out, they might eaſily haue hurt one another in the darke. But the lampes giuing cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber dore, and gaue Cephiſodorus the firſt man that preſſed to enter vpon him, ſuch a blow with is ſword, that he dropped downe dead at his feete. Hauing ſlaine the firſt man, he dealt with the ſecond that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betweene them two, both for that the chamber dore was very ſtraight, as alſo for that Cephiſodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the comming in at the chamber. Notwithſtanding, Pelopidas ouercame him in the end, and ſlue him: and went frõ thence with his company, ſtraight to Hypates houſe, where they got in, as they did vnto Leontidas houſe before. But Hypates knew preſently what it was, and thought to ſaue him ſelfe in his neighbours houſes. Howbeit the conſpirators followed him ſo hard, that they cut him off before he could recouer their houſes. Then they gathered together, and ioyned with Melons company, and ſent immediatly with all poſſible ſpeed to ATHENS, to the baniſhed THEBANS there, & cried through the city, liberty, liberty, arming thoſe citizens that came to thẽ, with the armor and ſpoils of their enemies, that were hanged vp in commmon vauts, & armorers ſhops about Charons houſe, which they brake open, or cauſed to be opened by force. On the other ſide, Epaminondas, and Gorgidas, came to ioine with them, with a company of yong men & honeſt old mẽ well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon, the whole city was ſtraight in an vprore and tumult, and euery houſe was full of lights, one running to an other to know what the matter was. Neuertheles the people did not yet aſſẽble together, but euery one being amazed, muſing at this ſtur, not vnderſtãding the troth, ſtaied till day came on, that they might call a counſell. But truly herein, me thinkes the Captaines of the garriſon of the LACE-

DÆMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not ſturre betimes, and ſet vppon them incontinently: conſidering there were fifteene hundred ſouldiers, beſides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noiſe they heard, made them afeard, and to ſee lights in euery mans houſe, and the people running vp and downe the ſtreetes in great multitudes to and fro: whereupon they ſturred not, but onely kept them within the caſtell of CADMEA The next morning by breake of day, came the other baniſhed THEBANS from ATHENS very well armed, and all the people of THEBES drew together in counſaile. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas, and his conſorts, and preſented them before the people, compaſſed about with prieſts and the profeſſed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, and they praied the aſſembly of the citizens, that they would helpe their gods, and their countrey. All the people that were preſent, when they ſaw them, roſe vp, and ſtoode on their feete, and with great ſhouts and clapping of hands receiued them, as their ſauiours, that had deliuered their countrey from bondage, and reſtored them againe to liberty: and thereupon, before them all, euen in the market place, by the whole voice and conſent of the people, they choſe Pelopidas, Melon, and Charon, gouernors and captaines of all BOEOTIA. Pelopidas then immediatly made them beſiege the caſtell of CADMEA about, with trenches, and force of wodde, doing all he could poſſible to winne it, and to expulſe the LACEDÆMONIANS, before any ſupply and aide came to them from SPARTA. So he did, and preuented it ſo ſodainely, that the garriſon being departed out of the caſtell by compoſition, as they returned towards LACEDÆMONIA, they found Cleombrotus king of SPARTA in the countrey of MEGARA, comming towards them with a great army to helpe them. Afterward, of the three captaines which had charge of their garriſon that lay at THEBES, the SPARTANS condemned two of them to death: Hermippidas and Arciſſus were preſently executed: and the third captaine, Dyſaoridas, they ſet ſo grieuous a fine on his head, that he went out of PELOPONNESVS. This enterpriſe being attempted, and executed with the like valiantneſſe, and the ſame daunger and trouble, that Thraſybulus practiſe was, when he deliuered ATHENS from the ſlauery of the thirty gouernours and tyrants, and hauing the like fortune, and happy end: the GRECIANS termed it coſin german to Thraſybulus act. And in deede it were a hard matter to find two other ſuch, beſides them two, that with ſo few men ouercame their enemies, being many moe in number then them ſelues, or that with ſo ſmall helpe did ouercome thoſe that were of ſo great force, or that performed their enterpriſe with their onely valiantes and wiſdome, & were cauſe beſides of ſo great bleſſing and benefit to their countrey, as Pelopidas and Thraſybulus attempt was But the great change and alteration of the ſtate afterwardes, did make their actes farre more noble and famous. For the warre that ouerthrew the maieſty of SPARTA, and that tooke away all the ſeignory and rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS both by ſea and by land, beganne the very ſame night, when Pelopidas him ſelfe making the twelfth perſon, and entring into a priuate houſe, (taking neither city, nor caſtell, nor ſtrong hold) to tell truely by figuratiue ſpeach, did breake and cut in ſunder the linkes and chaines that linked ſtraight together, and ſtrengthened the LACEDÆMONIANS whole empire and monarchy ouer all GREECE: who vntil that preſent time were thought ſo ſtrong, as no poſſibility could breake or ſunder them. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuning afterwards to inuade the countrey of BOEOTIA with a mighty army: the ATHENIANS trembling for feare of their great power, did vtterly leaue to protect them, and renounced the league and alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did ſtraightly proſecute lawe againſt thoſe, that were accuſed to take part with the BOEOTIANS: whereof ſome of them were put to death, other were baniſhed from ATHENS, and the reſt condemned in great ſums of money. To be ſhort, euery man ſaide the THEBANS were but vndone, conſidering they had no helpe, and were beloued beſides of none. At that preſent time it fell out Pelopidas and Gorgidas were generals ouer all BOEOTIA for that yeare, who deuiſing to throw a bone betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, to make them ſquare, they vſed this policy. There was a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valiant man, but elſe of ſmall capacity, and vainely giuen, hauing a certaine fond ambition and humor, perſwading him ſelfe he had done ſome notable good ſeruice in his time. This Sphodrias was left in the city of THESPIES, with a great band of ſouldiers, to receiue & fauor al the BOEOTIANS that had a mind to reuolt from the THEBANS. Pelopidas of himſelfe ſent a marchant, (a verie friend of his) vnto Sphodrias, with a great ſome of money from him, and certaine perſwaſions withall, which preuailed more then the money, wiſhing him to attempt ſome greater matter, & to ſeeke to win the hauen of PIRÆA: a thing ſoone wonne, if he came to aſſault it on the ſodaine, & the rather, for that the ATHENIANS miſtruſt nothing, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might aſſure himſelfe, nothing could be better welcome to the lords of LACEDÆMONIA, then to make thẽ lords of the citie of ATHENS alſo. And againe, that the THEBANS, being at deadly food with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betraied & forſaken them in their need, would not aide nor ſuccour thẽ in any reſpect. Sphodrias giuing too light eare to this vaine perſwaſion, tooke the ſouldiers he had with him, & marching away by night entred the realme of ATTICA, & went on to the citie of ELEVSIN: but when he came thither, his ſouldiers were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpoſe being diſcouered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, hauing raiſed ſuch a warre to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fell out to be of no ſmal importance to them, nor eaſie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS ſought league & amity again with the THEBANS, & did aide them very louingly: and moreouer, putting thẽſelues to ſea, they ſailed vp & downe, procuring & drawing to their league all ſuch as were willing to rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and the THEBANS beſides, had many prety ſkirmiſhes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their owne country of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was ſuch a great learning and continuall training of them in marſhall diſcipline, as the THEBANS ſtil increaſed in courage and valiantnes, & waxed ſtronger and better ſouldiers: for by thoſe ſkirmiſhes they grew not onely expert ſouldiers, but waxed more ſkilfull in vſing their weapons, then before. As we read, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN ſaid one day to king Ageſilaus, comming home ſore hurt frõ BOEOTIA: ſurely the THEBANS haue giuen you a worthy reward, for teaching thẽ to be ſoldiers againſt their wils. But to ſay truly, Ageſilaus was not their maiſter to teach thẽ to make wars, but they were the good & wiſe leaders of the THEBANS, who like good wod mẽ in choſing their game, could skilfully chuſe both time & place to giue their enemies battell, & make thẽ retire againe with ſafty, after they had bin fleſhed, giuing thẽ a litle taſte of the fruites & cõmodity of victory: but amõg them, Pelopipas was he that deſerued moſt honor. For, ſince the firſt time they gaue him charge of men of war, they neuer failed, but choſe him continually euery yeare, either captaine of the holy band, or gouernor of BOEOTIA ſo long as he liued: ſo that Pelopidas only did the moſt things in this war. The LACEDÆMONIANS were ouerthrowne in ſundry iorneis, that they were diſtreſſed by the cities of PLATEES, & of THESPIES, where Phœbidas him ſelfe (that had before taken the caſtell of CADMEA) was ſlaine amõgſt other. An other great power of theirs alſo was ouerthrowne nere to the city of TANAGRA, where Pãthoidas gouernor of the ſame, was alſo ſlaine. Now all theſe victories, though they much encouraged the hearts of the conquerors, and made them hardy: yet did they not therby altogether cõquer the minds of the vanquiſhed. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not ouercom in any pitched field, nor ſet battel, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rodes, and ſkirmiſhes properly laid of purpoſe, where ſometime flying, ſomtime driuing them again, they bickered very oft, and put them to the worſt. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a floriſh & proofe to the iourney of LEVCTRES, wan Pelopidas great honor. For he had no cõpaniõ to challenge any part of his glory and victory, neither did he leaue his enemies any lawfull excuſe, to ſhadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he ſpied al accaſion he might poſſible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACEDÆMONIANS, & had receiued two enſigues of footemen of theirs to keepe it. Pelopidas being aduertiſed one day, that the garriſon of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the country of the LOCRIDES hoping he ſhould find ORCHOMENE without garriſõ: he marched thither with his holy band, and certaine number of horſemen. But when he drew nere the city, he had intelligence there was another garriſon comming from SPARTA, to ſupply the place of the garriſon that was abroad: whereupon he returned backe againe by the city of TEGYRA, for hee could haue paſſed no other way, but to haue turned downe by the foote of the mountaine. For al the valley that lay between both, was drowned with the ouerflowing of the riuer of Melas, which euē from his very head carieth euer ſuch breadth with it, as it maketh the mariſhes nauigable, ſo as it is vnpaſſable for any ſhallow it hath. Not farre from theſe mariſhes, ſtandeth the temple of Apollo Tegyrian, where was an oracle in old time, but left off at this day, and had neuer long continuance, but onely vntill the time of the warres of the Medes, when Echecrates was maiſter and chiefe prieſt there. And ſome hold opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they call the next mountaine to it, Delos, at the foote whereof the mariſhes of the riuer of Melas do end, and behind the temple are two goodly ſprings, from whence commeth great abundance of good ſweete water: whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue. And ſome ſay alſo, that the goddeſſe Latona was not brought to bed betweene two trees, but betweene theſe two ſpringes. For mount Ptovm is hard by it alſo, from whence the wild bore came of a ſodaine that flighted her. And the tale that is told of the ſerpent P*ytho*, and of the giant Tityus, doe both confirme it, that Apollo was borne in the ſame place. I paſſe ouer many other coniectures confirming the ſame, for that we doe not beleeue in our countrie that Apollo is among the number of thoſe, who from mortall men haue bene tranſlated to immortall goddes, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put off mortalitie, and tooke immortalitie vpon them: but wee rather take him for one of thoſe that neuer had beginning nor generation, at the leaſt if thoſe things be to be credited, which ſo many graue and auncient writers haue left in writing to vs, touching ſo great and holy things. The Thebans returning back from Orchomene, and the Lacedæmonians on the other ſide returning alſo frō Locride, both at one time, they fortuned both armies to meete about the city of Tegyra. Now, ſo ſoone as the Thebans had diſcouered the Lacedæmonians paſsing the ſtraite, one of them ran ſodainly to Pelopidas, and tolde him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the Lacedæmonians. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, aunſwered P*elopidas* againe? with theſe words, he commanded his horſemen that were in the rereward, to come before, and ſet vpon them: and himſelfe in the meane time put his footemen immediatly into a prety ſquadron cloſe together, being in all, not aboue three hundred men, hoping when he ſhould come to giue charge with his battell, he ſhould make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater number. For the Lacedæmonians deuided themſelues in two companies, and euery company, as Ephorus writeth, had fiue hundred men: and as Calliſtenes ſaid, ſeauen hundred. Polybius, and diuers other authors ſay, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and Gorgoleon, the Captaines of the Lacedæmonians, luſtily marched againſt the Thebans: and it fell out ſo, that the firſt charge was giuen, where the chiefetaines or generalles were of either ſide, with great furie on either part, ſo as both the generals of the Lacedæmonians which ſet vpon P*elopidas* together, were ſlaine. They being ſlaine, and all that were about them, being either hurt or killed in the field: the reſt of the army were ſo amaſed, that they deuided in two, and made a lane on either ſide, for the Thebans to paſſe through them if they would. But whē they ſaw Pelopidas ment not to take the paſſage they offered him, & that he came on ſtill with his men to ſet vpon thoſe that were yet in battell ray, and ſlue all them that ſtood before him: then they turned taile, and tooke them to their legges. Howbeit the Thebans did not chaſe them farre, fearing the Orchomenians who were not farre from them, and the new garriſon beſides, that were come from Lacedæmon not long before. And this was the cauſe they were contente that they had ouercommed them by force, and had paſſed through their army in deſpite of them, and broken and ouerthrowen thē. So when he had ſet vp marks of triumphe, and ſpoiled their ſlaine enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obtained victory. For in all the warres the Lacedæmonians euer made, aſwell with the Grecians as with the barbarous people alſo, there was neuer chronicle mentioned at anie time, that their enemies being ſo fewe, did ouercome them that were ſo many, nor that they were ouercome alſo by any number equall in battell. Whereupon they grew ſo coragious and terrible, that no man durſt once abide them: for their onely fame did ſo terrifie their enemies that came to fight againſt them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe as much as they had done. But this battell of Tegyra was the firſt that made both them and the other GRECIANS knowe, that it was not the riuer of EVROTAS alone, nor the valley that lyeth betweene the riuers of CNACION, and of BABYCE, that breedeth the valiant and hardie fighting men: but that it is in all places elſe, where they learne young men to be aſhamed of diſhoneſt and vile thinges, and to venter their liues for honeſt cauſes, fearing more diſhonorable reproch, then honorable daunger. Theſe are the people moſt to be feared, and are moſt terrible alſo to their enemies. And for the holy band we mentioned before, it is ſaid, Gorgidas was the firſt erector of the ſame. They were three hundred choſen men entertained by the ſtate, and they alwaies kept within the caſtle of CADMEA, and the band was called the townes band: for at that time, and ſpecially in that part of GRECE, they called the caſtles and great holdes in cities, the townes. Other ſay it was a band of footemen that were in loue one with an other. And therefore Pammenes pleaſant wordes are noted, ſaying, that Neſtor could no skill to ſet an armie in battell raye, ſeeing he gaue the GRÆCIANS counſell, in the Iliades of Homer, that they ſhould ſet them in battell ray, euerie countrie and tribe by themſelues:

The firſt inſtitution of the holy band.

that one might alwaies helpe at hand, that other to behoue.

For, ſaid he, one friende ſhould rather be ſet by another that loues together: becauſe in daunger, men commonly doe litle regard their countrie men, or ſuch as are of their tribe. But men that do loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the paſsion of loue that entertaineth each others affection, for affection ſake, doth keepe them from forſaking one another. And thoſe that are beloued, being aſhamed to doo any vile or diſhoneſt thing before thoſe that loue them, for very loue will ſticke one by another to the death. And ſure the reaſon is good, if it bee true that louers do in deed more regarde them they loue, though they be abſent: then other that be preſent. As appeareth by the example of him, that being ſtriken downe to the ground, his enemie lifting vp his ſworde to kill him, he prayed him he would giue him his deaths wound before, leaſt his friend that loued him, ſeeing a wound on his back, ſhould be aſhamed of him. It is reported alſo, that Iolaus being beloued of Hercules, did helpe and accompanie him in all his labours and quarrels. Whereupon Ariſtotle writeth, that vnto his time, ſuch as loued hartily together, became ſworne brethren one to another, vpon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this bande was firſt called the holy bande, by the ſelfe ſame reaſon that Plato calleth a louer, a diuine friend by gods appointment. It is written alſo, that this bande was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowne before the battel of CHÆRONEA: After that battell, Philip taking view of the ſlaine bodies, he ſtayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that band lay all dead on the ground, one harde by another, and all of them ſlaine and thruſt through with pikes on their breſts, whereat he wondered much: and being tolde him that it was the louers band, he fell a weeping for pitie, ſaying. Wo bee to them that thinke theſe men did, or ſuffered any euill or diſhoneſt thing. And to be ſhort, the misfortune of Laius, that was ſlaine by his owne brother Oedipus, was not the firſt originall cauſe of this cuſtome, that the THEBANS beganne to be in loue one with an other as the Poets write: but they were their firſt lawmakers, who perceiuing them to be a ſtout and fierce nation of nature, they ſought euen from their youth to make them gentle and ciuill, and therefore in all their actions both of ſport and earneſt, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, being highly eſtemed of them in thoſe dayes. They brought in the vſe alſo to make loue, in the middeſt of all their youthfull ſports and exerciſes of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a ciuil life. And therefore they had reaſon that gaue the goddeſſe HARMONIA to the THEBANS, for defender and patroneſſe of their city, who was begotten (as they ſay) betweene Mars and Venus. For that giueth vs to vnderſtand, that where force and warlike corage is ioyned with grace, to winne and perſwade: all thinges by this vnion and accord are brought to a goodly, profitable, and moſt perfect gouernment. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy bande of the THEBANS. Gorgidas deuiding it in the former ranckes, and placing it all alongeſt the front of the battell of the footemen, it did not appeare what they were able to doe of them ſelues, for that he brought them not all into one body: ſo as thereby they might ſee what ſeruice the whole companie could doe being together, conſidering that it was deuided and mingled amongeſt many other, that were a great deale of leſſe value then themſelues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantneſſe before, when they fought about him of themſelues, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would neuer after deuide nor ſeparate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire bodie that had all his members, he would alwaies beginne with them to giue a charge in his moſt daungerous battels. For, as we ſee in running of couches at games, that horſes being tyed all together in a front, do runne faſter and ſtronger then they doe when they are loſe, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together doe breake through the aire better, but for that the contention and enuie betweene them to outrunne one another doth indeede ſet their hearts and ſtomackes on fire. Euen ſo he thought, that valiant men giuing one another a deſire and enuie to doe well, ſhould haue the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers ſight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwardes being at peace and league with all the other GRECIANS, proclaimed open warres againſt the THEBANS only: and king Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an armie of tenne thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſemen. Whereupon the THEBANS were not only in the like danger they ſtood in before to looſe their libertie, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten they would vtterly deſtroy thē for euer: ſo that all the country of BŒOTIA ſtood in greater feare, then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his houſe to go to the warres, his wife bringing him out of the doores to take her leaue of him, weeping, ſhe prayed him hartely to looke well to himſelfe. But he aunſwered her againe: my good wife, it is for priuate ſouldiers to be careſull of themſelues, but not for captaines, for they muſt haue an eye to ſaue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he found the captaines and the Lieutenants of the armie, in ſundrie opinions: and he was the firſt that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it beſt they ſhould giue battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither gouernor of BŒOTIA, nor generall of the armie, but onely captaine of the holy band: notwithſtanding they had great affiance in him, and gaue him great authority in counſell concerning their affaires: ſuch as became a man that had made ſo good teſtimonie of his naturall loue and affection to his countrie, as he had done. Now, being determined in counſell that they ſhould giue the enemie battell, they all muſtred together in the valley of LEVCTRES, where he had a viſion in his dreame, that troubled him very much. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedaſus, which by reaſon of the place, they call the LEVCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defiled and rauiſhed, by certaine gueſtes of the SPARTANS that laye in their houſe, trauailing that way. This acte being ſo horrible and wicked, the poore father of theſe defiled virgines, could neither haue iuſtice, nor reuenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had bande and curſed the LACEDÆMONIANS with moſt horrible and execrable railings and curſes as might be poſſible, he killed him ſelfe vpon the graues of his daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS had many ſundry oracles, propheſies and ſignes of the goddes to warne them, to take heede of the wrath of the LEVCTRIDES: howbeit euery man vnderſtoode not the ſignification of this prophecy, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the name. For there was a little towne in the countrey of LACONIA, ſtanding vpon the ſea, called LEVCTRVM: and in ARCADIA alſo by the city of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another towne called by the ſame name. This misfortune chaunced long before the battell of LEVCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his tent, thought he ſaw in a viſion the daughters of Scedaſus weeping about their graues, and curſing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that hee ſaw their father alſo, commaunding him to ſacrifice a red mayden to his daughters, if they would obtaine the victory. This commaundement at the firſt, ſeemed very cruell and wicked: whereupon when he roſe, hee went to the Prognoſticators and generalles of the army, and tolde them his dreame. So, ſome of them ſayed, this was no matter to be lightly paſſed ouer, but to be conſidered of, alledging many examples in the like caſes. As of Menecius the ſonne of Creon in olde time, and of Macaria the daughter of Hercules. And yet of later memory, the wiſe Pherecydes, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS ſlue, and whoſe ſkinne their kinges doe keepe at this day, by commaundement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecie of the goddes, did as it were ſacrifice himſelfe, for the ſafetie of GRECE. And furthermore, the young boyes which Themiſtocles did ſacrifice to Bacchus Omeſtes (to ſay, eating raw fleſh) before the battell of Salamina. And all theſe ſacrifices were acceptable to the goddes, as the victories following did plainely ſhew it. In contrarie manner alſo king Ageſilaus, comming from thoſe very places, from whence king Agamemnon came in the time of the wars of TROIA, and going alſo againſt the ſame enemies: dreamed one night in the citie of AVLIDE, he ſaw the goddeſſe Diana, aſking him his daughter for ſacrifice. But he tenderly louing her, would by no meanes performe it: and thereupon was compelled to breake off his iourney before he had executed his enterpriſe, and departed with ſmall honour. Other to the contrarie ſtoode to it ſtoutly, and ſaide it was not to be done. For, ſo cruell, abominable, and brutiſh a ſacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the goddes, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: conſidering that they be no impreſſions in the aire, nor giants that rule the world, but the one onely mightie and eternall God, father of gods and men. And to beleeue that either goddes or demy gods doe delight in murder, or ſheadding of mans bloud, it is a meere mockerie and folly. But admit it were ſo, they were no more to be regarded therein, then thoſe that haue no power at all: for it is a manifeſt token of a wicked ſpirite, when they haue ſuch damnable and horrible deſires in them, and ſpecially if they abide ſtill with them. Now the generals and heades of the army of the THEBANS being of ſundry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraide then before, by reaſon of their diſagreement: a young mare colte, or fillie, breaking by chance from other mares running and flinging through the campe, came to ſtay right againſt them. Then euery man began to looke vpon her, and to marke what a faire fillie it was, and red coloured euery where, and what a pride ſhe tooke with her ſelfe to heare her owne neyghing. Theocritus then the ſoothſaier being amongſt them, did behold her, and knew ſtraight what the fillie ment, and ſo cryed out forthwith: O happie Pelopidas, loe here is the ſacrifice thou lookeſt for, ſeeke no other virgine for thy ſacrifice, but take this that God himſelfe doth ſend thee. When Theocritus had ſaid ſo, they tooke the fillie, and laide her vpon the tombe of Scedaſus daughters, and put garlands of flowers about her, as they handled other ſacrifices: and then after their prayers made to the gods, they did ſacrifice her with great ioy, and tolde Pelopidas viſion in his dreame the night before through all the campe, and the ſacrifice they had made alſo according to the ſignification thereof. Moreouer, when they came to ioyne battell, Epaminondas being generall, drew all his armie on the left hand, becauſe he would bring the right wing of the enemies armie (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GRÆCIANS their friends and allyes, that were ſet in the other wing of their battell: that he comming with his whole power together to giue a charge vppon Cleombrotus their king (being in a corner by himſelfe) might be diſtreſſed or ouerthrowne. The enemies finding Pelopidas intent, beganne to chaunge their order, and hauing men enowe, ment to thruſte out their right wing at length to compaſſe in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the meane time ſodainely preuented them, and running with great fury with his ſquadron of three hundred men, hee ſet vppon Cleombrotus before he could diſorder his men to put forth the right wing, and ioyne them together againe. And ſo hee found the LACEDÆMONIANS not yet ſetled in their rankes, and brake them in this diſorder, thruſting one in anothers place to put them ſelues againe in order: notwithſtanding the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the onely captaines and moſt expert ſouldiers in marſhall diſcipline, as men ſo trained and practiſed, that no ſodaine altering, of forme or order in their rankes, could either trouble or diſorder them. For they were men ſo trained, that they could turne head or ſide vpon any ſodaine occaſion offered, and could fight and order them ſelues in battell euery way alike. So Epaminondas going to giue the onſet vpon them alone, with the whole force of his battell together, not tarrying for others: and Pelopidas alſo with an incredible courage and readineſſe, preſenting himſelfe in battell before them, did put them into ſuch a terrible feare, that they cleane forgot their skill in fighting, and their wonted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and there were moe LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine that daie, then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither gouernour of BOEOTIA, nor generall of all the armie, but onely captaine of the holy band: did notwithſtanding win as much honor & glorie of this victorie, as Epaminondas, that was gouernor of BOEOTIA, and generall of all the armie. Indeede afterwards they were both gouernors of BOEOTIA together, when they inuaded the coũtry of PELOPONNESVS where they made moſt part of the cities & people rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and take their part. As the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARCADIA, and the beſt part of LACONIA ſelfe, notwithſtanding it was in the heart of winter, and in the ſhorteſt daies of the yeare, and towardes the latter end alſo of the laſt moneth of their yeares authoritie and rule, hauing not many daies to continue in office, being forced to leaue their authoritie, vpon paine of death if they did refuſe, vnto other officers new choſen, the beginning of the next moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, and gouernors alſo of the country of BOEOTIA, what for feare to incurre the daunger of the law, as alſo to auoide the trouble to lie in campe in the ſharpeſt of winter: they did vrge & perſwade them to bring the armie backe againe into their country. But Pelopidas was the firſt that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, & wanne the other THEBANS alſo to conſent vnto it, to be contented to be led by them, to giue aſſault to the citie ſelfe of SPARTA. So, through their perſwaſion they paſſed ouer the riuer of EVROTAS, and tooke many litle townes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & waſted and deſtroied all the countrie to the ſea ſide, leading vnder their enſignes an armie of threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men, and all GRÆCIANS, the THEBANS not making vp the twelfth part of them. Now, the honour and great reputation of theſe two perſons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any reſolution of counſell or publike order, and neuer opened their mouthes againſt them, but willingly marched vnder their conduction. And in my opinion, truely me thinkes it is the firſt and chiefeſt point in the lawe of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himſelfe, ſhould leane to one that is ſtrong, and able to defend both. Euen much like to freſh water ſouldiers, and rawe ſea men, that lying at ſea in calme weather, and in ſafe harbor, are as luſtie and brag with the maiſters and boateſwaines as may be: and let a little ſtorme of weather come vpon them ſodainely, and that they be in any danger, then they looke on the maiſters, hoping for no life but at their hands. And euen in like maner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all aſſemblies of counſel they would euer iarre and ſtriue with the THEBANS, for honor and ſuperioritie in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherein they ſaw there was danger, then their pecockes brauerie was gone, and they were glad to obey their generals commaundement. In this iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to bee in league with them, and tooke all the countrie of MESSENIA from the LACEDÆMONIANS, which they peaceably enioyed: and called home againe all the auncient inhabitants of the ſame, and reſtored them to their countrie, and repleniſhed the citie of ITHOME: Then returning afterwards into their country by the city of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entring into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, ſuppoſing to haue ſtopped their paſſage. Thus was the valiantnes of theſe two worthy men greatly commended and honored of euery body, for ſo many notable exploites and victories as they had won, and their maruellous good ſucceſſe, greatly wondred at. But as their glory and renowne increaſed abroad, ſo did their countrey mens malice and enuy encreaſe againſt them at home: who had prepared ſuch a welcome home for them, as was too bad and vile for ſo honorable ſeruice as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas both at their returne, were accuſed of treaſon. For there was a ſpeciall law at THEBES, that commanded all ſuch as ſhould happen to be gouernors of BOEOTIA, to reſigne their office immediatly to the new officers elect, at the beginning of the firſt moneth of the yeare, which in BOEOTIA they call BOVCATION & they had kept it foure whole moneths aboue their tearme appointed, in which time they had done all that we haue ſpokẽ of before, as wel in the prouince of MESSENIA & of ARCADIA, as alſo in the country of LACONIA. Pelopidas was the firſt of the two that was called in by proces, therefore he ſtood in the greater danger: howbeit in the end, they were both diſcharged againe. As for Epaminondas, he tooke his accuſatiõ & the attempt of his enemies (whereby they ſought to haue caſt them both away) quietly enough: Iudging, that patience to thoſe that deale in ſtate and gouernment, is a great ſhewe of force & magnanimitie, But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more chollericke, and ſet on beſides by ſome of his friends, did take this occaſion to be reuenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of thoſe that came into Charons houſe with Pelopidas, and Melon, but notwithſtanding the THEBANS did nothing honour him, as they did the reſt. He taking this ill at their hands, being maruellous eloquent of ſpeach, but vitiouſly giuen otherwayes, and a man of a vile and miſchieuous nature: did fondly abuſe his eloquence, falſely accuſing thoſe that were his betters, in honeſty and credit. And not being contented with this firſt accuſation, he practiſed ſo commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being gouernor of BOEOTIA, which he ſued for: and moreouer he was euer againſt him in all matters of ſtate he tooke in hand. But he could neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he ſought to make bate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all ſpightefull perſons, when they cannot be thought ſo honeſt men as thoſe whom they enuie: to go about to proue that they are not ſo honeſt and meete men, as thoſe whom they preferre and commend. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble actes and victories, and ſpecially that victory aboue other, which the THEBANS won before the iorney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmiſh of horſmen, that was before the city of PLATEES, he hauing charge of the ſame: of the which he would leaue this memory. Androcides a CYZICENIAN & painter, was at a price with the THEBANS to paynte them ſome other battell in a table, and he did drawe this worke in the cittie ſelfe of THEBES but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the THEBANS fell out againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and warre followed on the necke of that, whereupon the painter forſooke THEBES, leauing his worke in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they would hang it vp in ſome temple or publicke place with an inſcription vpon it, ſaying thus: This was Charons victorie of purpoſe to deface and obſcure the glorie of Pelopidas & of Epaminondas. Too vaine & fond was his ambition, to ſet before ſo many noble battells and victories, one ſimple ouerthowe of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meaneſt gentlemen of all SPARTA was ſlaine, and forty other with him: & this was all he did. Pelopidas miſliked Meneclidas motiō, maintaining that it was directly againſt the lawes of THEBES, which did expreſly forbid that no priuate perſon ſhould be honored with the title of common victorie, but willed the glory thereof ſhould be attributed to al the the people generally. Indeed Pelopidas in al his orations did greatly praiſe & commend Charon, notwithſtanding he made open proofe, how Meneclidas was an enuious and ſpitefull detractor, & a naughty wicked man, often times asking the THEBANS, if they themſelues were worthy of no honor? ſo as in the end he cauſed Meneclidas to be condemned in a great ſumme of money. But he finding himſelfe vnable to pay it, being ſo great a ſumme practiſed aferwardes to alter the whole ſtate and gouernment. I thought good to dilate this at large becauſe me thinkes it doth ſomewhat declare Pelopidas nature, and mãners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander, the tyrant of PHERES, was at open warres with many people of THESSALIE, and did vſe all policie he could, to bring them all to his obedience. Whereupō the free citties ſent their Ambaſſadours vnto THEBES, to pray them to ſend them a captaine with an army to aide them. Then Pelopidas ſeeing Epaminondas occupied about the warres of PELOPONNESVS, did offer himſelfe to the THESSALIAN Ambaſſadors, being loth to drowne his experience and ſufficiencie in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idlenes, knowing that in thoſe parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other captaine. Now when he came with his army into THESSALIE, the cittie of LARISSA yeelded preſently vnto him: where the tirant Alexander came to meet with him, and to pray him to treate a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attēpted to bring it to paſſe, ſeeking in ſtead of a tyrant to make him a gentle, iuſt, & lawfull gouernor of THESSALIE. But when he ſawe no perſwaſions could take place with the tyrant, and that he grew more ſtubborne & vntractable, and woulde not heare reaſon: and moreouer that he heard many grieuous complaints of his great cruelties, and how they accuſed him to be a maruellous diſſolute and vnruly perſon in all his doinges, and extreamely couetous beſides: then he beganne to ſpeake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyrant thereupon ſtole away ſecretly from him, and fled with his gard and ſouldiers about him. So Pelopidas leauing the Theſsalians out of all feare and daunger of the tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amitie one with the other, he went into Macedon: where Ptolomy made war at that time with Alexander, being king of Macedon, they both hauing ſent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, and alſo to helpe him that had the right, againſt him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and reſtored the baniſhed men of either ſide, to their landes and goods againe. For aſſurance of the peace, he tooke the kings brother in hoſtage, whoſe name was Philip, and thirty other children of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of Macedon, whom he brought away with him to Thebes, to let the Grecians ſee, that the reputation of the Thebans power ſtretched far, and the renowne alſo of their manner of gouernment and iuſtice. It is the ſame Philip, that made warre afterwardes with the Grecians, to take their libertie frō them: howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at Thebes in Pammenes houſe. And this is the cauſe, why ſome thought Philip did follow Epaminondas manner: and it might be peraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which indeede was but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as to the continencie, iuſtice, magnanimitie, and clemencie, which were the ſpeciall points, that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip could neither by nature, education, nor ſtudie euer attaine vnto. The Theſsalians hauing ſent afterwards to Thebes, to complaine of Alexander the tyrant of Pheres, that did againe moleſt and trouble the free citties of Theſsalie: Pelopidas was ſent thither Ambaſſador with Iſmenias, carying no power with him frō Thebes, litle thinking he ſhould haue needed to haue made warres: wherupon he was compelled to take men of the countrie ſelfe, vpon the inſtant neceſſitie offered. At the very ſame time alſo, all Macedon was vp in armes. For Ptolomy had ſlaine the king, and vſurped the kingdom, and the ſeruants and frends of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for ayde: who deſiring to come euen vpon the fact, and hauing brought no men of war out of his own countrie with him, did preſently leauie certaine men where he was, and ſo marched forward with them againſt Ptolomy. Now Ptolomy when both their powers met, did corrupt the ſouldiers Pelopidas had brought with money, to take his part. But notwithſtanding this pollicie he had practiſed, yet he was afrayd of the name only, and greatnes of Pelopidas reputation: wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas, as to a better man then himſelfe, and making maruellous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promiſe, and bound it by oth, that he would keepe the realme for the bretheren of the dead king, and that he would take all thoſe for his friends or enemies, whom the Thebans did either loue or hate. And for aſſurance of his promiſe, he gaue him his ſonne Philoxenus in hoſtage, and fifty other of his friends, all the which Pelopidas ſent vnto Thebes. But in the meane time, being maruellouſly offended with the treaſon of the ſouldiers againſt him, vnderſtanding that the moſt part of their goodes, their wiues and children, were in the cittie of Pharsale, he thought if he could winne that, it were a maruellous good way for him to be reuenged of the treachery of the ſouldiers againſt him: wherupon he leauied certaine Theſsalians, & went to that cittie. Pilopidas was no ſooner come thither, but Alexāder the tyrant arriued alſo with his armie. Pelopidas ſuppoſing he had come to iuſtifie himſelfe, clearing the complaints of the Theſsalians made againſt him: wēt to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delited in murder and ſheading of blood. Neuertheles, he hoped he durſt not haue attempted any thing againſt him, for the authority and ſeigniories ſake of Thebes, by whom be was ſent thither, as alſo for his own reputation. But the tyrant ſeing him ſlenderly accompanied, and without traine of ſouldiers: tooke him priſoner, and wanne the cittie of Pharsale at that preſent time. But this act of his put his ſubiects in a great feare, who ſeeing him commit ſo ſhamefull a deed againſt all equity, did thinke ſtraight he meant to ſpare no man, but would vſe men, and all thinges elſe that came in his handes, like a deſperate man, & one that reckoned himſelfe caſt away. But whē the Thebans vnderſtood this news, they were maruellous ſorie, and ſtraight ſent an army thither, appointing other Captaines then Epaminondas, becauſe then they had ſome miſliking of him. Alexander the tyrant hauing brought Pelopidas in the meane time to Pheres, did ſuffer any man that would at the firſt to come and ſee him, and ſpeake with him: ſuppoſing his impriſonment had killed his hart, and had made him very humble. But when he was tolde the contrary, how Pelopidas did comfort the cittizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good cheere, telling them the hower was now come that the tyrant ſhould ſmart for all the miſchiefes he had done: and that he ſent him word to his face, he had no reaſon to hang and put his poore cittizens daily to death as he did, with ſundry kindes of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him, & did let him alone, knowing that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyrant wondering at this great ſtomacke of his, and at his maruellous conſtancie fearing nothing: aſked what he ment, to long for haſty death? Pelopidas being tolde what he ſayed, anſwered him againe: Marry, ſayed he, becauſe thou ſhouldeſt dye the ſooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. After this anſwer, the tyrant would neuer ſuffer any man to come and ſpeake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyrant Iaſon deceaſed, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyrant, hearing report of Pelopidas noble minde and courage by his keepers: ſhe had a maruellous deſire to ſee him, and to ſpeake with him. But when ſhee came to ſee him, like a woman ſhe could not at the firſt diſcerne the greatneſſe of his noble hart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in ſuch miſerie: yet coniecturing by exterior ſhewe, noting his ſimple apparell, his haires and beard growen very long, and how poorely he was ſerued, and worſe enterteined: ſhe thought with her ſelfe his caſe was to be pittyed, and that he was in no ſtate meete for the glory of his name, wherewith ſhe fell a weeping for compaſſion. Pelopidas that knew not what ſhee was, beganne to muſe at the firſt: but when it was tolde him ſhe was Iaſons daughter, then he courteouſly ſaluted her for her father Iaſons ſake, who while he liued was his very good friend. So Thebe ſayed vnto him: my Lord Pelopidas, I pitty thy poore Lady and wife. Truly ſo do I pitty thee, quoth Pelopidas againe to her: that thou being no priſoner, canſt abide ſuch a wicked Alexander. This anſwer tickled Thebe at the hart, who with great impatience did beare the cruelty, violēce, and villany of the tyrant her huſband: that beſides all other infamous actes of his deteſtable life, committed Sodomy with her yongeſt brother. So ſhe oft viſiting Pelopidas, and boldly making her mone to him, telling him cloſely all the iniuries her huſband offred her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle ſhe grewe to abhorre him, and to conceiue a hate in hart againſt him, deſiring reuenge on him. But now the captaines of the THEBANS that were ſent to deliuer Pelopidas, being entred into THESSALIE with their armie: (whether it was through defaulte of ignorance, or their miſhap) they returned home with ſhame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANS at their returne home condemned them euery man in the ſumme of ten thouſand Drachmes, and ſent Epaminondas thither againe with another armie: at whoſe comming, all THESSALIE roſe incontinently, for the reputation of ſo great a captaine. And his fortune was ſo good, that he had in a manner vtterly ouerthrowen all the whole ſtate of the tyrant: his friends and captaines were ſo much afrayde, and his ſubiectes on the other ſide ſo well diſpoſed to rebell, and maruellous glad for the hope they had, quickely to ſee the tyrant haue his deſerued hyer, for all his former wicked deeds he had committed. Notwithſtanding, Epaminondas preferring the deliuery and ſafety of Pelopidas, before the conſideratiō of his own honour and glory, and fearing leaſt Alexander ſeeing himſelfe in danger to be turned out of al he had, falling into deſpayre like a bedlem beaſt, would bend all his deſperation and furie againſt Pelopidas: he drewe theſe warres out in length, compaſſing him round about, but not fiercely ſetting vpon him with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying ſtil, thereby to ſoften the cruell mind of this tyrant, going on in this gentle ſort, and partly to cut his cōmb and extreame pride, but ſpecially to preſerue Pelopidas, from the daunger and crueltie of his beaſtly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruell man, and one that neither regarded reaſon, nor iuſtice in any ſorte, conſidering howe he made ſome man to be buried aliue, and others to be put in the skins of beares and wilde bores, and then to ſet hounds vpō them to teare them in peeces, or els himſelfe for his paſtime would kill them, with ſhooting or throwing of dartes at them. And in the citties of MELIBEA and of SCOTVSA, both of them being in league and friendſhippe with him, he ſpying a time one day whē the cittizens were aſſembled in counſell together, ſodainly compaſſed them in with his gard and ſouldiers, and put them euery one to the ſword, euen to the litle children. And he conſecrated the dart alſo wherewith

he had ſlaine his owne vncle Polyphron, and hauing put garlands vpon it, he did ſacrifice to it, as to a god, and called it TYCHON, as one would ſay, happy killer. And another time being in a Theater, where the tragedy of Troades of Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and ſent word to the players notwithſtanding, that they ſhould goe on with their playe, as if he had bene ſtill among them: ſaying that he came not away for any miſliking he had of them or of the play, but becauſe he was aſhamed his people ſhould ſee him weepe, to ſee the miſeries of Hecuba and Andromacha played, and that they neuer ſaw him pitty the death of any one man, of ſo many of his cittizens as he had cauſed to be ſlaine. The gilty conſcience therefore of this cruel and heathen tyrant, did make him tremble at the only name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe ſayeth:

which doth refuſe the pit preparde, and liſt not bide the ſhocke.

Epaminondas deliuered Pelopidas out of priſon.
Artaxerxes king of Perſia.

Pelopidas greatly honored of the king of Perſia.

So he ſent ſtraight vnto Epaminondas to excuſe himſelfe. But Epaminondas woulde in no wiſe ſuffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make league with ſuch an helhound: onely he yeelded to abſtinēce of armes for thirty daies, vpon deliuery of Pelopidas & Iſmenias into his hands, with whō he ſtraight returned vnto THEBES. Now the THEBANS being aduertiſed that the LACEDÆMONIANS & the ATHENIANS, did ſend Ambaſſadors to Artaxerxes the mighty king of PERSIA, to make league with him: they ſent to him Pelopidas for them alſo, being wiſely conſidered of them to ſende a man of ſuch fame and reputation. For Pelopidas paſſing firſt through countries ſubiect to the king of PERSIA, his fame was ſuch where he came, that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous battells he had wonne of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was not only caried into the next regions and countries of ASIA: but ſince the firſt newes of the iorney of LEVCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas hauing after that wonne victorie vpon victorie, his eſtimation grewe ſo great, as it was blowen abroad through the worlde, euen to the higheſt and furtheſt partes of the Eaſt countries. And when he came to the king of PERSIAES court, the princes, great Lordes, and captaines of PERSIA that ſaw him, had him in great admiration, ſaying: loe this is he that conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS, and tooke all their ſeigniorie and authority from them, both by ſea and by land, and draue the SPARTANS beyond the riuer of EVROTAS, and from mount TAVGETVM, who not long before made warres with the great King of PERSIA, being ledde vnder their king Ageſilaus, euen in the middeſt of ASIA, for the realmes of SVSE, and of ECBATANE. So king Artaxerxes ſelfe was very glad of his comming, and praiſed him aboue them all, and made his eſtimation greater then it was before, by his great and honorable entertaining of him, meaning thereby to returne the honour to himſelfe againe: becauſe menne ſhoulde thinke that the moſt famous men of the worlde came to honour him, and to ſee his court, as eſteeming both him, and his greatneſſe, the onely happineſſe of the world. But when he had ſeene his face, and heard him ſpeake, and perceiued that his wordes were much grauer then the ATHENIANS, and plainer then the LACEDÆMONIANS: he then was further in loue with him thē before, and without diſguiſing, he did honor and fauor him aboue all the other Ambaſſadors, who found that he made more eſtimation of him, then of thē all. Notwithſtanding, he ſeemed to beare greater good will vnto Antalcidas LACEDÆMONIAN, thē to any other of the GRECIANS: for that one day being at the table, he tooke a garland of flowers from his owne head, and waſhed it in perfuming water, and ſent it vnto him. Indeed he did not vſe Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he ſend him the goodlieſt and richeſt preſentes he could deuiſe, & granted him beſides all his requeſtes he made vnto him: which were, that all the people of GRECE ſhould be free: that the city & countrie of MESSINA, ſhould be inhabited againe: & that the citizens of THEBES by their ſucceſſors ſhould be takē, as ancient frends & allyes of the kings of PERSIA. So when he had receiued theſe anſwers, he returned home again, & would by no meanes accept any of the great preſents the king had offred him: which cauſed the other ambaſſadours of the GRECIANS to be ſo ill welcome home to their citties. For among other, Timagoras was accuſed to the ATHENIANS, & condemned to die, and was executed: which if they did in reſpect of the great preſents he had taken of the king, truely they had reaſon, & it was worthily done of thē. For he tooke not only gold & ſiluer enough, as much as they would giue him:but receiued a very rich bed alſo,& PERSIAN chamberlains to make and dreſſe it vp, as if no GRECIAN ſeruantes of his could haue ſerued that turne. Moreouer he receiued foureſcore milch kine to the paile,and neatcheardes to keepe them, hauing neede of cowes milke belike, to heale a diſeaſe that fell vpon him : and would needes be caried in a litter vpon mens armes from the kings court,vnto the MEDITERRANIAN ſea,the king rewarding them for their paines that caried him , with foure talents. Yet it ſeemeth the gifts he tooke did not offend the ATHENIANS ſo much, conſidering that Epicrates (a drudge or tanckerd bearer)did not onely confeſſe before the people, howe he had taken giftes of the king of PERSIA:but ſaied furthermore,that he would haue a law made,that as they did yerely chooſe nine officers to rule the whole city : ſo that they would chooſe nine of the pooreſt and meaneſt cittizens,and ſend them Ambaſſadors vnto the king of PERSIA,that they might returne home rich men with giftes. The people laughed to heare him , but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they had demaunded : not conſidering that Pelopidas eſtimation and worthineſſe did more preuaile, and take better effect , then all the orations the other could make, and ſpecially to a Prince that ſought alwaies to entertaine thoſe GRECIANS,which were of greateſt force & power in the warres. This Ambaſſade did greatly increaſe euery mans loue and good will vnto Pelopidas , becauſe of the repleniſhing againe of MESSINA with inhabitants, and infrancheſing and ſetting at liberty of all the other GRECIANS. But the tyrant Alexander of PHERES,returning again to his old accuſtomed cruelty,and hauing deſtroied many cities of THESSALIE,& placed his garriſõs through al the country of the PHTHIOTES,ACHAIANS,& MAGNESIANS:the cities being aduertiſed of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they ſent Ambaſſadors immediatly to THEBES,to pray thẽ to ſend thẽ an army,& namely Pelopidas for captaine,to deliuer thẽ from the miſerable bondage of the tyrant. The THEBANS willingly granted them,& put all things in readines very ſodainly. But Pelopidas being ready to ſet forward in his iorney, there fell a ſadain eclipſe of the ſun, ſo as at noone day it was very dark in THEBES. Pelopidas ſeing euery man afraid of this eclipſe aboue, he would not compell the people to depart with this feare , nor with ſo ill hope to hazard the loſſe of ſeuen thouſand THEBANS,being all billed to go this iorney : but notwithſtanding,he put himſelfe alone into the THESSALIANS handes, with three hundreth horſemen of ſtraungers,that were glad to ſerue with him, with whom he toke his iorney againſt the ſoothſayers mindes,and againſt the good will of all his cittizens,who thought this eclipſe did threatẽ the death of ſome great perſon like himſelfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no ſpurre to be reuenged vpon the tyrant Alexander, being by nature hotte,and deſirous of himſelfe to reuenge the ſpite and villany he had offred him:yet he had a further hope to finde the tyrants houſe deuided againſt himſelfe,by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his impriſõment there. Neuertheles,the fame and reputation of the iorney vndertaken, did wonderfully increaſe his noble corage, and the rather,becauſe he was deſirous (all he could) the GRECIANS ſhould ſee, that at the very ſame time when the LACEDÆMONIANS did ſend gouernors & captains to Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILE,to ſerue & aide him,& that the ATHENIANS as hyerlings took pay of the tyrant Alexander of PHERES,in whoſe honor they had ſet vp a ſtatue of braſſe in their city,as vnto their ſauior: the THEBANS only at the ſelfe ſame time tooke armes againſt thẽ,to deliuer thoſe whom the tyrants oppreſſed,& ſought to roote out al tirannical gouernment ouer the GRECIANS. So when he came to the city of PHARSALE,and had gathered his army together,he wẽt preſently into the field to meet with the tyrant Alexãder, perceiuing Pelopidas had very few THEBANS about him,and that he had twiſe as many moe THESSALIANS with him, then the other had : he went into the temple of THETIS, to meete with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was comming againſt him with a great power, Pelopidas anſwered him ſtraight, all the better, we ſhall kill the more. Now, in the middeſt of the valley, there are certaine round hils of a good prety height, which they commonly call the dogs heads : they both ſtriued which of their footemen ſhould firſt get thoſe hils. Pelopidas hauing a great number of horſemen, and good men at armes in the field, ſent them before to giue charge vpon the enemies, that preaſed to winne the vantage of the place: and hauing ouerthrowne them, they followed the chaſe all the valley ouer.

But in the meane time, Alexander hauing his footemen by, marched forwardes and got the hilles, becauſe the THESSALIANS that were further off came too late: notwithſtanding, when they came to the hilles, they ſought forcibly to clime them vp, being very high and ſteepe. But Alexander comming down the hill, gaue charge vpon them to their diſaduantage, and ſlewe the firſt that gaue the attempt to get vp againſt the hill: and the reſidue being ſore hurt, retyred againe without their purpoſe. Pelopidas ſeeing that, ſounded the retreate for the horſemen that followed the chaſe, to repayre to the ſtandard, and commanded them they ſhould ſet vpon the footemen of the enemies that were in battell raye: and he himſelfe ranne to helpe thoſe that fought to winne the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and paſſing through the rereward, he got to the formoſt ranckes: to whom, the ſight of his perſon did ſo redouble their force and courage, that the enemies themſelues thought it had beene a freſh ſupply of newe mens hartes and other bodies, then theirs with whom they had fought before, that came thus luſtely to ſet againe vpon them. And yet they did abide two or three onſettes. Howbeit in the end, perceiuing thoſe men did ſtill more fiercely force to gette vp the hill, and moreouer how their horſemen were come in from the chaſe: they gaue way, and left them the place, retyring backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas hauing wonne the hilles, ſtayed on the toppe of them, viewing the armie of his enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waued vp and down in great diſorder. And there he looked all about, to ſee if he could ſpye out Alexander: and at the length he found him out amongeſt others, in the right wing of his battell, ſetting his men againe in order and incouraging of them. After he had ſet eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his hart ſo roſe againſt him vpon ſight of him, that giuing place to wrath, he neither regarded his perſon, nor the intent of his iorney, but running farre before his men, he cried with a loud voice to the tyrant, and chalenged the combat of him. The tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid himſelfe amongſt his ſouldiers. But for his ſouldiers, the firſt that thought to ſet vpon Pelopidas, were ſlaine by him, and many lefte dead in the field. The reſidue ſtanding ſtoutly to it, and cloſe together, did paſſe his curaces through with their long pykes, and thruſt him into the breſt. The THESSALIANS ſeeing him thus ſore handled and diſtreſſed, for pitties ſake came running from the top of thoſe hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to helpe him. But euen as they came, he fell down dead before thẽ. Then did they together with their horſmen ſo fiercely ſet vpon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to flye: and following them in chaſe a great way from that place, they couered the vallye with dead bodies, for they ſlue aboue three thouſand men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death, tooke it very heauily, and lamented bitterly: calling him their father, their ſauiour, and maiſter, as one that had taught them the worthieſt things that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other friendes and confederates alſo of the cittie of THEBES, beſides their exceeding in ſetting out their common proclamations and edicts in praiſe of his memorie, & doing him all the honour that could be due to the moſt rare and excellent perſon that euer was: they did yet more ſhew their loue and affection towards him by their paſſing great ſorrow and mourning they made for him. For it is ſayed, that they that were at the battell, did not put off their armour, nor vnbridle their horſes, nor woulde dreſſe their wounds, hearing tell of his death: before they went firſt and ſaw his body not yet colde with fighting, laying great heapes of the enemies ſpoyles about it, as if he could haue told what they had done, nor before they had clipped off their own haires, and the haire of their horſes, in token of ſorrowe. And many of them alſo, when they were come into their tentes and pauilions, would neither haue fire, eate, nor drinke: and all in the campe were full of ſorrowe and mourning, as if they had not wonne a notable victorie, but had beene ouerthrowen and made ſubiect by the tyraunt. Afterwardes when the newes of his death was ſpread through all the countrie, the Magiſtrates of euery cittie through which Pelopidas bodie was conueyed, went to receiue it very honorablie, accompanied with all the young menne, the Prieſtes and children, carying tokenes, and crownes of triumphe, and other ornamentes of gold, and when his funerall day was come, and that his bodie ſhould be caried to be buried, the oldeſt and the nobleſt perſonnes of the THESSALIANS went vnto the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might haue the burying of him: and one among them being the mouth of the reſt, ſpake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lords of THEBES, our good beloued friendes and confederates, we onely craue this good turne at your handes, wherein you ſhall much honour vs, and in our great calamitie ſomewhat alſo comfort vs. For we ſhall neuer more accompanie Pelopidas aliue, nor requite his honorable deſerts to vs, that he ſhall euer know them. But if it pleaſe you to let vs handle his bodie with our handes, and that we may burie him, and ſet foorth his obſequies: we will imagine then at the leaſt that you doe thinke that, which we our ſelues doe certainely beleeue: that we THESSALIANS, not you THEBANS, haue receiued the greateſt loſſe of both. For you haue loſt in deede a worthie Captaine, and we haue not onely receiued that like loſſe with you, but the hope alſo of recouering of our libertie. For how dare we againe ſend to you for an other Captaine, when we can not redeliuer you Pelopidas? The THEBANS hearing their petition, granted their deſire: and in mine opinion, no funerals could be done with greater pompe and honour, then the THESSALIANS, performed his: being men that reckon not dignitie, magnificence & pompe, to conſiſt in ornaments of Iuorie, nor of purple. As Philiſtus doth ſet it out, who praiſeth to the moone the burying of Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, which was the end of his tyrannie, as a ſumptuous concluſion of a ſtately tragedie. And Alexander the great, at the death of Epheſtion, did not onely clippe his horſe haires and mules, but plucked downe alſo the battelments of the walles of the citie: becauſe it ſhould appeare, that the verie walles them ſelues did mourne for his death, ſhewing that deformitie in ſteede of their former beautie. But all ſuch things are done onely by force and compulſion, vpon the Lordes commaundements, which doe but raiſe vp enuie againſt their memorie for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are againſt their willes conſtrained to doe the thing they miſliked: and are no iuſt proofes of honour nor good will, but rather vaine ſhewes of barbarous pompe, and pride in him, that diſpoſeth his authoritie and plentie of goods, in trifling toyes not to be deſired. Where contrariwiſe it plainely appeareth, that a priuate man dying in a forraine countrie, by reaſon ſhould be accounted moſt happie of all other creatures, that hauing neither his wife, kinne, nor his children by him, he ſhould be conueyed to his funeralles, accompanied with ſuch multitudes of crowned people and number of cities, enuying one another, who ſhould moſt honour the funerals, as being vnrequeſted, and leaſt of all compelled. For ſaieth Eſope, the death of a happie man is not grieuous, but moſt bleſſed, ſeeing it bringeth all good mens doings to happineſſe, and leaueth fortune to her fickle chaunge, and ſporting pleaſure. But in my iudgement a LACEDÆMONIAN ſpake better, when he ſaid to Diagoras an old man, that had himſelfe in old time gotten victorie in the games Olympicall, and had ſeene beſides, his owne children, and his childrens children (both ſonnes and daughters) crowned with victories alſo in the ſelfe ſame games: O Diagoras, die preſently, elſe thou ſhalt neuer come to heauen. But theſe victories of the Olympicall and Pythian games, whoſoeuer ſhould put them all together, are not to be compared with one of the battels onely, that Pelopidas hath fought and wonne: hauing ſpent the moſt part of his time in great calling and dignitie, and laſtly ended the ſame, being gouernour of BOEOTIA the third time (which was the higheſt office of ſtate in all his countrie) when he had deſtroied the tyrantes that kept the THEBANS in bondage, and was alſo ſlaine himſelfe, valiantly fighting for the recouerie of the THESSALIANS libertie. But as Pelopidas death was grieuous to the THEBANS friends and confederates: ſo fell it out very profitable for them. For the THEBANS hearing of Pelopidas death, did not delay reuenge, but ſent an armie forthwith of ſeuen thouſand footemen, and ſeuen hundred horſemen, vnder the conduct of Malcitas and of Diogiton. They finding Alexanders armie ouerthrowen, and that he had loſt the moſt part of his ſtrength, did compell him to giue vp the THESSALIANS townes hee kept by force againſt them, and to ſet the MAGNESIANS, the PHTHIOTES, and the ACHAIANS at libertie, withdrawing his garriſons hee had placed in their ſtrong holdes: and therewithall to ſweare, that from thence forth he would march vnder the THEBANS, againſt any enemie they ſhould leade him, or commaund him to goe againſt. So, the THEBANS were pacified vpon theſe conditions. Now will I tell you how the goddes plagued him ſoone after for Pelopidas death, who (as we haue tolde you before) had pretily inſtructed Thebe his wife, that ſhe ſhould not feare the outward appearance nor power of his tyrannie, although ſhe were enuironed with ſouldiers of baniſhed men, whom the tyrant entertained to guard his perſon. Her ſelfe on the other ſide, fearing his falſhood, as alſo hating his crueltie, conſpired her husbands death with her three brethren, Tiſiphomus, Pytholaus, and Lycophron, and executed her conſpiracie after this ſort. The tyrants palace where he lay, was ſtraightly guarded euery where with ſouldiers, who nightly watched his perſon: but their bed chamber which they commonly vſed to lie in, was in the toppe of all his palace, where they kept a dogge tyed at the chamber doore to giue warning, which was a terrible dogge, and knew none but the tyrant and his wife, and his keeper that gaue hïm meate. Now when Thebe purpoſed to worke her feate, ſhe locked vp her three brethren a whole day neere vnto their bed chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, ſhe went her ſelfe alone according to her manner, into Alexanders chamber: and finding him a ſleepe, ſhe ſtale out ſtraight againe, and bad the keeper of the dogge to carie the dogge away, for her husband was diſpoſed to take reſt, and would haue no noyſe. There was no way to get vp to this chamber but by a ladder, which ſhe let downe: and fearing leaſt her brethren ſhould make a noiſe, ſhe had couered the ladder ſtaues with wolle before ſhe let it fall downe. When ſhe had gotten them vp with their ſwords, and had ſet them before the doore, ſhe went firſt her ſelfe into the chamber, and tooke away the tyrants ſword that hung at his beds head, and ſhewed it them, as a token giuen them that he was a ſleepe. When it came to the pinch to doe the deede, theſe young men were afraide, and their hearts beganne to faile them. But ſhe tooke on with them and called them cowardly boyes, that would not ſtande to it when it came to the point, and withall, ſware in her rage, that ſhe would go wake the tyrant, and open all the treaſon to him. So partly for ſhame, and partly for feare, ſhe compelled them to come in, and to ſteppe to the bed, her ſelfe holding a lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feete, and bound them hard: another caught him by the haire of his heard, and pulled him backwardes: and the third thruſt him through with his ſword. So by chaunce he died ſooner then he ſhould haue done, and otherwiſe then his wicked life deſerued, for the manner of his death. So Alexander was the firſt tyrant that was euer ſlaine by the treaſon of his wife, whoſe bodie was moſt villanouſly and deſpightfully vſed after his death. For when the townes men of Pheres had drawen him through the citie in myre and durt, they caſt him out at length to the dogges to deuour.

THE LIFE OF Marcellus.

M·MARCELLVS.

Marcus Claudius that was fiue times Conſul at Rome, was the ſonne (as they ſay) of another Marcus: and as Poſidonius writeth, he was the firſt of his houſe ſurnamed Marcellus, as who would ſay, a marſhall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at weapons, skilful in wars, ſtrong & luſtie of bodie, hardy, and naturally giuen to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor ſhewed his great corage, but in warres againſt the enemie: otherwiſe he was euer gentle, and faire conditioned. He loued learning, and delighted in the Greeke tongue, and much eſteemed them that could ſpeake it. For, he himſelfe was ſo troubled in matters of ſtate, that he could not ſtudie and follow it, as he deſired to haue done. For if God (as Homer ſaith) did euer make men

till crooked age came creeping on, ſuch feates for to expell:

Marcellus conditions.

They were the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of Rome at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the Carthaginians in Sicile: in their middle age, againſt the Gavles, to keepe thẽ from the winning of all Italie: & againe in their old age, againſt Hanniball & the Carthaginians. For their age was no priuiledge for them to be diſpenced with, in the ſeruice of their warres, as it was els for common citizens: but they were both for their nobilitie, as alſo for their valiantnes and experience in warres, driuen to take charge of the armies deliuered them by the Senate & people. Now for Marcellus, there was no battell could make him giue grounde, being practiſed in all fightes: but yet he was more valiant in priuate combate man for man, then in any other fight. Therefore he neuer refuſed enemie that did chalenge him, but ſlew all thoſe in the field that called him to the combat. In Sicile he ſaued his brother Octacilius life, being ouerthrowen in a skirmiſh: for with his ſhield he couered his brothers bodie, & ſlew them that came to kill him. Theſe valiant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the generals vnder whom he ſerued, with many crownes, and warlike honors, vſually beſtowed vpon valiant ſouldiers. Marcellus increaſing ſtill his valiantnes and good ſeruice, was by the people choſen Ædilis, as of the number of thoſe that were the worthieſt men, and moſt honorable: and the Prieſts did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Prieſthood at ROME, hauing authoritie by law, to conſider and obſerue the flying of birdes, to diuine and prognoſticate things thereupon. But in the yeare of his office of Ædile, he was forced againſt his will to accuſe Capitolinus, his brother in office with him. For he being a raſh and diſſolute man of life, fell in diſhoneſt loue with his colleagues ſonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who being a goodly young gentleman, and newly come to mans ſtate, was as well thought of, and taken of euery man for his manhoode and good qualities, as any way for his beautie and perſonage. The firſt time Capitolinus moued this diſhoneſty to him, he did of himſelfe repulſe his ſhameleſſe offer, without any others priuity: but when he ſaw he came againe to tempt him the ſeconde time, he ſtraight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his father being maruellouſly offended withall, (as he had good cauſe) went and accuſed Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the firſt, laide in many exceptions and fained excuſes, to keepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainely they would not receiue his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to aunſwere the matter before the Senate, and denied flatly that he attempted euer any ſuch thing, becauſe there were no witneſſes to proue it againſt him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to ſend for young Marcellus, who comming before them, both bluſhed, and wept together. The Senate ſeeing ſhamefaſtneſſe in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that could not be pacified: without ſeeking other proofe, they tooke it a cleare caſe, & ſo condemned Capitolinus preſently in a great ſumme of money, which Marcellus conuerted into ſiluer veſſell, to ſerue at ſacrifices, and ſo did conſecrate them to the ſeruice of the goddes. Now when the ROMAINES had ended their firſt warre againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the ſpace of two and twentie yeares: Immediatly after that, they beganne a new warre againſt the GAVLES. For the INSVERIANS, being a people deriued from the GAVLES, & dwelling at the foot of the mountaines of the ALPES on ITALY ſide, being able to make a good power of themſelues, did notwithſtanding pray aide of the other GAVLES inhabiting on the other ſide of the mountaines: & they cauſed the GESSATES, a mercenarie people and hirelings to them that would giue pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truely me thinkes it was a maruellous matter, and wonderfull good happe for the ROMAINES, that this war of the GAVLES came not vpon them, while they were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS: & that the GAVLES alſo had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purpoſely ſworne to ſet vpon the conquerors) expecting ſtill an end betwene thẽ, & then to ſet vpon the conquerors, when they had nothing to ſay to any other. Yet the ſituation of their country did trouble the ROMAINES much, becauſe they were ſo neere neighbours vnto them and had warres as it were at their owne dores. And ſo did the auncient reputation of the GAVLES ſomewhat appaule the ROMAINES, who as it ſhould ſeeme they did feare more then any other nation whatſoeuer: becauſe ROME had bene taken before by the GAVLES. Since which time a law was made, that Prieſtes and eccleſiaſticall perſons ſhould be diſpenced with from going to the warres, vnleſſe the GAVLES did riſe againſt them. The preparation they made for this warre at that time, did plainly ſhew the feare they had thẽ of the GAVLES. For the world thinkes, that neuer before nor ſince, there were ſo many naturall ROMAINES aſſembled together in field, as were then at that preſent. Moreouer, the new come crueltie they vſed in their ſacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before they neuer vſed any ſtraunge maner in their ſacrifice, or barbarous faſhion, but were fauourable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religion, and agreeable to the GRECIANS touching the ſeruice of the goddes. But then, they were compelled to obey certaine oracles, and auncient prophecies they found written in Sibyles bookes: and they buried two GRECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man and a woman, and likewiſe two GAVLES, a man and a woman. Vnto them they do yet continue certaine ſecret anniuerſaries in Nouẽber, that are not to be ſeene of euery body. The ROMAINES in their firſt battels of this warre, were often ouercome, and did ouercome: but theſe battels were to little purpoſe, for ending of the warres. In the yeare that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Conſuls, and ſent with great armies to make warres vpon the INSVERIANS, people ſubiect to the ſtate of MILANE: newes were brought to ROME, that there was a riuer ſeene in the countrie of ROMANIA, red as bloud, & 3. moones alſo at the very ſame time in the citie of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Prieſts and ſoothſaiers that had obſerued and conſidered the tokens, and ſignifications of birdes on that day, when theſe two were choſen Conſuls: they told plainly there was error in their election, & that they were directly choſen againſt all ſignes & tokens of the birdes. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediatly to the campe to them, and willed them to come home to depoſe themſelues of their Conſulſhip, before they did attempt any thing as Conſuls againſt the enemies. The Conſull Flaminius receiued the letters in time: but becauſe he was readie to giue battell, he would not open thẽ, before he had firſt ouerthrowen his enemies, & ſpoiled their countrie, as in dede he did. But when he was come back to ROME againe, and had brought maruellous great ſpoiles with him, the people for all that would not goe out to meete him, becauſe he did not preſently obey the letters they wrote vnto him, nor returned vpon it as they commaunded him, but contemptuouſly, without any regard of their diſpleaſure, followed his owne phantaſie: whereupon they had almoſt flatly denied him the honour of triumph. For his triumph was no ſooner ended, but they compelled him to giue ouer his Conſulſhip, and made him a priuate man with his cōpanion. The ROMAINES therin were ſo religiouſly bent, as they would all thinges ſhould be referred vnto the gods good grace & pleaſure, and would ſuffer none to contemne the obſeruations & prognoſticating of the ſoothſaiers, nor their auncient vſes and cuſtomes, for any proſperity and felicity that could happen. For they thought it more neceſſarie and profitable for benefit of the common weale, that the Senate and magiſtrates ſhould reuerence the ceremonies and ſeruice of the gods: then that they ſhould ouercome their enemies in battell. As for example Tiberius Sempronius, a man as much honoured and eſteemed of the ROMAINES for his iuſtice and valiantneſſe, as any other of his time: being one yeare Conſull, did nominate and elect two other for Conſuls the yeare following, Scipio Naſica, and Caius Martius. Theſe two being entred into their Conſulſhip, and ſent from ROME alſo to their ſeuerall prouinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by chance tooke certaine litle bookes in his hand, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonies of publique ſacrifice, and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he neuer heard before. And this it was. That if a magiſtrate were ſet in any tent or hired houſe without the citie, to behold and obſerue the prognoſtications of birdes, and that vpon any ſodaine occaſion he were driuen to come againe into the citie, before the birds had giuen any certaine ſignes: the ſecond time when he returned againe to ende his obſeruations, there was no remedie, but he muſt leaue his tent or firſt hired houſe, and take another, and beginne new obſeruations againe. Tiberius vtterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his obſeruations twiſe in one ſelfe houſe, and had choſen there, Naſica and Martius, Conſuls to ſucceede him. But when he knew he had offended, he tolde the Senate of it: who would not let ſlip ſo litle a fault, but wrote to the new Conſils, and they ſtraight left their prouinces, and returned againe to ROME, willingly reſigning vp their offices. That was a prety while after. Againe alſo, about the very preſent time we write of now, there were two Prieſtes of noble houſes (and noble perſons alſo) the one called Cornelius, and the other Cethegus, both which were diſgraded of their Prieſthood, becauſe they had not giuen the intrailes of the ſacrificed beaſt in order as they ſhould haue done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was diſgraded of his Biſhopricke, becauſe his miter which the FLAMINES do weare, fell off his head in his ſacrificing. Minutius being Dictator alſo, and hauing choſen Caius Flaminius generall of the horſemen: becauſe they heard the noyſe of a ratte at the electiō of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authority, & other choſen in their place. Now, though they were thus preciſe euen in trifles, it was not by reaſon of any ſuperſtition mingled with their religion: but becauſe they would not breake any iotte of the auncient inſtitutions and ceremonies of their countrie. But to our ſtorie againe. Flaminius being depriued of his Conſulſhippe, Marcellus was created Conſull in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus being inueſted in his office, choſe Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they ſay, that the GAVLES being inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME alſo willing to harken to peace, Marcellus did ſtirre vp the people, and made them rather deſire warre. Notwithſtanding, they concluded peace at that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the warres againe. For there came ouer the mountains of the ALPES, a thirty thouſand of them, & they ioyned with the INSVBRIANS, which were many moe in number then themſelues. Now, they being in a maruellous iolity, went incontinently to lay ſiege to the citie of ACERRES, that ſtandeth vpon the riuer of PO: and during the ſiege, king Britomarus taking ten thouſand GESSATES with him, went & deſtroied al the country about the PO. Marcellus hearing that, left with his companion Cneus Cornelius, all the armed footmen, & the third part of the horſemen, in his campe by ACERRES: & he himſelfe with the reſidue of the horſemen, & ſix hundred footmen light armed, marched towards the enemie, trauelling night & day, vntill he met with the ten thouſand GESSATES, neere vnto a village of GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines, called CLASTIDIVM, which was ſubiect not long before to the ROMAINES. So he had no leiſure to take reſt nor to refreſh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew ſtraight he was come, and tooke him for no better then by & by ouercome, becauſe he had ſo few footmen. And for his horſemen, the GAVLES made no reckoning of them: for beſides themſelues are very good men at armes, & excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of horſemen farre aboue Marcellus. Therfore they ſtraight marched towards him in a maruellous furie, & with thundering ſhoutes, as if they would haue deuoured them at their comming. Britomarus their king, aduanced himſelfe before all his companie. Marcellus fearing to be compaſſed in behind, being ſo ſmal a number: he put out the wings of his horſemen as much as he could, to haue the country at large, ſo that his two wings were very ſlender, vntill he came neere his enemies. And being readie to gallop towards the enemie, it fortuned his horſe being affraid with the noiſe of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus back againe in ſpight of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES ſuperſtition, in taking this for an euill token, and that they would take a conceite vpon the ſame: plucking the bridle with his left hand, turned his horſe head againe vpon the enemie, and then he worſhipped the ſunne, as though he had not turned his horſe by chaunce, but purpoſely for that cauſe. For it is the ROMAINES maner to turne about ſo, when they do honour their gods. So when they began to ioyne battell, he made a vow to Iupiter Feretrian, to offer him vppe the goodlieſt ſpoiles of his enemies, if he did ouercome. The King of the GAVLES ſeeing him at that inſtant, imagined by the markes and tokens he ſaw, that he ſhould be the generall of his enemies: So he ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and gallopped towardes him from all his companie giuing him defiance, and chalenged him, ſhaking his ſtaffe in his hande. He was the goodlieſt perſon and ſtrongeſt man of all the GAVLES, and his armour was all gilt and ſiluered, and ſo ſet forth with ſundry workes and colours, that it ſhined as the ſunne. Marcellus on the other ſide hauing viewed all the armie of his enemies through out, and perceiuing none ſo richly armed as the king: thought ſtraight it was againſt him, that he had made his prayer and vow to Iupiter. Then hee put his horſe in full cariere againſt him and came with ſuch a force & furie to him, that he pierced his armour with his ſtaffe, and ouerthrew him but yet he killed him not dead: whereupon he ſodainely redoubled two or three ſtrokes beſides vpon him, and ſo ſlew him right out. Then he lighted from his horſe, & taking the dead kings armour in his hand, he lift vp his eyes to heauen, and ſaid. O Iupiter Feretrian, thou that doeſt from heauen behold and direct, all marſhall feates and Captaines deedes: thy ſelfe I call to witneſſe, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being generall of the armie, haue ſlaine with my owne hands, the king and generall of the enemies: and I promiſe here to thee, to offer thee vp the richeſt ſpoiles of mine enemies, ſo thy godhead will vouchſafe to graunt vs the like good fortune in all this warre beſides. His praier ended, the men of armes of the ROMAINES ranne in among the horſemen and footmen of the GAVLES, one being vnparted from another: and fortune did ſo fauour them, that they wanne a paſſing victorie, in ſuch a ſtrange and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer ſeene before nor ſince, that ſo few horſemen did ouerthrow ſo great a number of men of armes and footemen ranged together. Now when Marcellus had ſlaine the greater number of them, and had gotten their ſpoiles and all their baggage: he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelius, whom he founde making warres vnfortunately with the GAVLES, before the greateſt and moſt populous citie they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAVLES on this ſide the mountaines take for their chiefe citie, and from whence all other had their firſt originall. Whereupon they did all all their poſsible endeuour to defend it, and did as ſtraightly beſiege the Conſull Cornelius, as he did them. Now, when Marcellus was come to the camp againe, the GESSATES vnderſtanding that their king Bartomarus was ſlaine in battell, returned backe againe into their cou̅trey, & the citie of MILLAINE was take̅. After that, all the other cities there about yeelded of them ſelues, without force of ſiege, and the GAVLES wholly ſubmitted themſelues and all that they had, to the mercy of the ROMAINES, who graunted them peace vpon eaſie conditions. For theſe famous victories, the Senate of ROME gaue all the honour of triumph vnto Marcellus onely, and that was as wonderfull & worthy a ſight, as any that euer paſt before him: what for the infinite ſpoyles, and the numbers of great men taken priſoners, and alſo for the exceeding ſumptuouſneſſe & ſtately ſhew thereof. But the goodlieſt ſight of all for the rarenes, was to behold Marcellus ſelfe, carying on his ſhoulders the whole ſpoyle of the barbarous king, to offer vp to Iupiter Feretrian. For he had cut downe a goodly young oke of the mountaine, ſtraight, and ſhut vp verie long, which he had trimmed vp in forme of triumph, hanging all the armed peeces he had wonne of the king, verie orderly round about it. Then, when all the ſhew of his triumphe was paſt, he himſelfe tooke the oke vpon his ſhoulders, and got vp vpon his triumphing charet, and ſo marched through the city, carying theſe ſignes thereupon: which was the nobleſt ſight, and honorableſt ſhew, of the whole triumphe. His army followed after the charet, ſinging verſes and ſonges of victorie, in prayſe of the gods and their Captaine: and when he had paſſed through the whole city, and was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrian, there he ſet vp this young oke, and token of triumphe. This Marcellus is the third and laſt ROMAINE Captaine, to who̅ happened this honour in our age. For the firſt man that euer offred vp to Iupiter the ſpoiles of the general of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wanne the like ſpoyles of Acran, king of the CÆNINIANS. The ſecond was Cornelius Coſſus, who ſlue Tolumnius, generall of the THVSCANS. And the third was Marcellus, who ſlue with his own hands Britomarus, king of the GAVLES: and after him, no man euer ſince could obtaine the like good fortune. The god to whom theſe manner of ſpoyles are conſecrated thus, is called Iupiter Feretrian, ſo termed as ſome write, becauſe they do cary this token of triumphe to him, following the deriuation of this Greeke word, Ferin, which ſignifieth to cary: for in thoſe former times, many Greeke wordes were mingled with the Latin. Other affirme it is one of the ſurnames of Iupiter, ſignifying as much as lightening: for Ferire in the Latin toung, ſignifieth to ſtrike. And ſome ſay alſo, in warres it is properly to hurt or kill with his owne handes: for the ROMAINES do vſe at this day when they giue a charge vpon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chaſe flying, to crie, incouraging one an other, Feri, Feri: which is as much, as kill, kill. And the ſpoyles taken fro̅ the enemies alſo, are generally called Spolia: but thoſe which Lieutenants generall, or generals, do take from the generals of their enemies, when they haue ſlaine them, they are called particularly Spolia opima. Yet ſome hold opinion, that king Numa Pompilius mentioning the rich ſpoiles, or Spolia opima in his co̅mentaries, ſpeaketh of the firſt, the ſecond, and the third: and commaundeth that the firſt ſpoyles which are wonne, ſhould be conſecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the ſecond vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they ſhould giue to him that had wonne the firſt ſpoyles, three hundred Aſſes, the ſecond, two hundred: & the third a hu̅dred. But notwithſtanding, the beſt opinion & vſuall taking of Spolia opima, referreth them to be the firſt ſpoiles wonne in a foughten field, & thoſe which the Lieutenant of an armie, or a generall, doth take fro̅ the generall of the enemies, after he hath ſlaine him with his own hands. And thus much for declaration of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMAINES were ſo ioyfull of this victorie, and of their good ſucceſſe in this warre, that they cauſed a maſsie cup of gold to be made of the ſpoyle they had gotten, weighing a hundred pound weight, which they ſent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias: in the city of DELPHES, in token of thankes: and they made liberall diuiſion beſides of the ſpoyles vnto their friendes and confederates, and ſent a great part of it vnto Hieron king of SYRACVSA, who was their confederate. Not long after, Hanniball being entred ITALIE, Marcellus was ſent with an army by ſea, into SICILE. And after the great ouerthrow was giue̅ at the battel of CANNES, wherin there died ſo many thouſand ROMAINES, and that verie few of them ſaued themſelues by flying, into the citty of CANNVTIVM: they looked that Hanniball hauing ouercome the flower of all the ROMAINES youth, and their greateſt force, would not fayle to come ſtraight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus firſt ſent fifteene hundred of his men by ſea, to helpe to defend ROME: and hauing afterwardes receaued commaundement from the Senate, he came to CANNVSIVM, where he tooke ſuch as were fled thither for ſuccour after the battell, and ſo brought them out to the field, to defend the country. Now the ROMAINES hauing loſt the moſt part of all their beſt Captaines, in diuerſe ſundry battels before: of all thoſe that remained, Fabius Maximus was the onely able and reputed man for commendation of his honeſty & wiſedom, yet they miſliked of him notwithſtanding, for a timerous man, & of no courage, as a mā too full of doubts and conſideration, and loth to put any thing in hazard: ſaying, he was a good Captaine to defend, but not to offend the enemy. Whereupon they thought good to ioyne Marcellus liuely youth and courage, with Fabius feminine feare and wiſedom: and therefore ſome yeares they choſe them both Conſuls together, or elſe they ſent one of them as Conſull, and the other as Proconſull, ech in his turne, to the country where they had warres. And for proofe hereof, Poſidonius writeth, that the ROMAINES at that time called Fabius Maximus their target, and Marcellus their ſword. Therefore Hanniball himſelfe ſaid, he feared Fabius Maximus as his gouernour, & Marcellus as his enemy: bicauſe the one kept him from hurting of others, and the other did hurt to himſelfe. Immediatly after this great victory at CANNES, Hannibals ſouldiers became ſo bold, ſo careleſſe, and diſordered, that they kept the field without feare of any thing, and diſperſed themſelues farre from their camp: wherefore Marcellus ſetting vpon thoſe ſtragglers, he ſlue them euerie man, and ſo by litle and litle did ſtill leſſen the power and ſtrength of his enemie. Afterwardes he aided the cities of BIZANTIVM and of NOLA, & ſtabliſhed the true deuotion and loue of the BIZANTINES towardes the ROMAINES: from thence he went to NOLA, & found great ſedition there betwixt the Senate & people, becauſe the Senate could not keepe the people in obedience, but they would needes take Hannibals part. The cauſe of the peoples ſtubburnneſſe grew, by occaſion of a gentleman of the cittie called Bandius, a noble gentleman to the people, and a valiant man of his hands. This Bandius hauing fought valiantly at the battell of CANNES, after he had ſlaine many a CARTHAGINIAN, was himſelfe in the end ſtriken downe, and found lying among dead bodies, ſore wounded and mangled: whereupon Hanniball greatly commending his valiantneſſe, did not onely let him go without ranſome, but furthermore preſented him, & made him his hoſt and friend. Hereupon Bandius at his comming home, to requite Hannibals honour & curteſie, became one of thoſe that moſt fauored Hanniball, and moſt perſwaded the people of NOLA to take his part. Notwithſtāding this, Marcellus thinking it too great a ſinne againſt the gods, to put a man to death that had made ſo great proofe of his valiantneſſe, and had ſerued with the ROMAINES in their greateſt warres and extremeſt daunger, and who beſides the goodneſſe of his nature, had a maruellous gift alſo, to winne mens good wills by his great curteſie: when this Bandius came one day to do his duetie to him, Marcellus of purpoſe asked him what he was, though he had knowen him long before, onely to take occaſion to talke with him. The other aunſwered him, his name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus ſeeming to be maruellous glad, and to wonder at him, ſayd: and art thou that Bandius they ſpeake of ſo much at ROME, whom they ſay did ſo notable ſeruice in perſon at the battell of CANNES, and neuer forſooke Paulus Æmilius the Conſull, but receaued ſo many woundes vpon thy bodie in defence of him? Bandius aunſwered, that he was the man, and therewith ſhewed him many woundes he had vpon his body. Marcellus then replyed: alas, thou that carieſt ſuch notable markes of thy vnfained loue towards vs, what diddeſt thou meane, that thou cameſt not ſtraight againe vnto vs? art thou perſwaded we are ſo miſerable & vnthankefull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valiantneſſe of our friendes, whom our enemies ſelues do honour? After Marcellus had vſed this curteous ſpeech vnto him, and had imbraced him, he gaue him a goodly horſe for ſeruice in the warres, and fiue hundred Drachmes of ſiluer beſides. So after that time, Bandius did euer take Marcellus part, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, and ſhewed himſelfe verie ſeuere and earneſt to accuſe them, that tooke Hannibals part in the cittie: which were many in number, and had conſpired among themſelues, that the firſt time the ROMAINES ſhould go into the field to skirmiſh with the enemies, they would ſhut the gates after them,& take the ſpoile of all their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treaſon,did ſet his men in battell ray within the city,hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the ſumpters & cariage in good order:beſides that,he made proclamation by trumpet, that no citizen vpon paine of death ſhould approch the walles. This occaſion drew Hanniball to come hard to the citie ſeeing no watch vpon the walles, aad made him the bolder to come in diſorder, imagining there had bene ſome mutinie or ſedition within, betweene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus ſet open the gates being hard by, and ſalying out vpon the ſodaine with the beſt men of armes he had,he gaue a charge vpō Hanniball in the voward. Immediatly after came out his footemen at an other gate, running ſtraight vpon Hanniball, with a wonderfull crie and ſhout: ſo as Hanniball to withſtand them, was driuen to deuide his men in two companies. But as he was deuiding of them, ſodainely a third gate opened vpon them, from whence all the reſidue of the ROMAINES iſſued out, who ſet vpon the CARTHAGINIANS on euery ſide, they being maruellouſly amazed to be ſo ſodainely ſet on, which they looked not for: ſo hauing their hands full with thoſe that came firſt vpon them, being ſcant able to defend themſelues againſt them, and ſeeing this new and laſt charge alſo, they were forced to retire. This was the firſt time, that euer Hannibals ſouldiers began to giue place to the ROMAINES, who draue them backe vnto their camp, and ſlue a great number of them, and did hurt diuerſe of them beſides. For ſome write, there were ſlaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, aboue fiue thouſand: and of the ROMAINES there died not paſt fiue hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not ſet out the ouerthrow ſo great, and yet confeſſeth that Marcellus wanne great honour by it, and that it made the ROMAINES maruellous valiant againe, after ſo many and ſundry battels as they had loſt one after an other: for then they were perſwaded that they fought not with an enemy altogether vnuincible,but that he might ſometime alſo,as well as themſelues, receiue both loſſe and hurt. Therefore, one of the Conſuls dying about that time, the people cauſed Marcellus to be ſent for, and placed him in his roome: and in ſpite of the Senate they deferred all deputation vntill his returne from the camp. Marcellus came no ſooner to ROME, but he was choſen Conſull in the dead mans roome, by all the voyces of the people. Notwithſtanding, when they went to chooſe him, it thundred maruellouſly: which the Prieſts and Augures tooke for an ill token, but yet they durſt not openly ſpeake againſt his election, becauſe they feared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of himſelfe did willingly giue vp his Conſullſhip, and yet was it no exception to him for his ſeruice in the warres: for they created him Proconſull, and ſent him againe to the camp at NOLA, where he did ſeuerely puniſh ſuch as tooke Hannibals part. Who being aduertiſed thereof, came thither with all poſſible ſpeed to helpe them: and euen at his firſt comming,he offered Marcellus battell, which refuſed it at that time. Neuertheleſſe he tooke his time, when Hanniball had ſent the beſt part of his armie to forage, as meaning to fight no more battels: and then he ſet vpon him, hauing giuen his footemen long pikes, ſuch as they vſe in fight vpon the ſea, and taught them alſo, how to hurt the enemy a farre off,keeping them ſtill in their hands. But the CARTHAGINIANS hauing no skill of their pikes, and fighting with ſhort iauelings in their hands,did ſtrike downe right blowes:which was the cauſe, that they being ſet vpon by the ROMAINES,were driuen to turne their backes, and flee before them. So there were fiue thouſand of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field,foure elephants ſlaine,and two taken aliue:and furthermore,three dayes after the battell, there came a three hundred horſemen, ſome of them SPANIARDS, and other NVMIDIANS, that ſubmitted themſelues to the ROMAINES. Neuer came there ſuch a miſfortune before to Hanniball: who had of lōg time kept together in great loue & amity,an army aſſembled of ſundry barbarous nations and people. Howbeit theſe three hundred continued euer after faithfull to the end,both to Marcellus,and to all other Lieutenants & generals of the ROMAINES. Shortly after, Marcellus being againe choſen Conſull the third time, went into SICILE. For Hannibals proſperous ſucceſſe & victories had ſo incouraged the CARTHAGINIANS, as they ſought againe to conquer this Ilande: and ſpecially becauſe that after the death of Hieronimus the tyrant, there roſe ſome tumult at SYRACVSA. Vpon which occaſion, the ROMAINES had ſent an army thither before, & a Prætor called Appius: at whoſe hands Marcellus hauing receiued the army, a great number of the Romaines became humble ſuters to him, to pray him to aide them in their calamity, which was this. Of thoſe that ſcaped from the battell of Cannes, ſome ſaued themſelues by flying, other were taken priſoners, of which there were ſuch a number, as it appeared that Rome had not people enough left onely to keepe the walles. Neuertheleſſe, thoſe few that remained, their harts were ſo great, that they would neuer redeeme the priſoners, which Hanniball was contented to deliuer them vpon ſmall ranſome, but made a decree they ſhould not be redeemed: and ſo ſuffered ſome of them to be killed, others to be ſold for ſlaues out of Italie. And moreouer, thoſe that ſaued themſelues by flying, they ſent ſtraight into Sicile: commaunding they ſhould not once ſet foote againe in Italie, whileſt they had warres with Hanniball. Theſe were the mē that came altogether, and fell downe at Marcellus feete, ſo ſoone as he arriued in Sicile, & humbly beſought him, to appoint them to ſerue vnder ſome enſigne, that they might fight to do their coūtry honour and ſeruice: promiſing him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithfull ſeruice then ſhould witneſſe for them, that the ouerthrow they had at Cannes, fell vpon them rather by miſfortune, then through lacke of courage. Whereupon Marcellus hauing compaſſion on them, wrote to the Senate in their fauour, & prayed them that they would graunt him licence to ſupply the bands of his army, as they diminiſhed, with thoſe poore Romaines his countreymen. Many reaſons paſſed to, & fro, againſt this ſute: neuertheleſſe, it was concluded in the end by the Senate, that the common wealth made no reckening of the ſeruice of faint harted men like women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their ſeruice, yet it ſhould not be lawfull for him to giue thē any crownes or rewards of honour, for any notable ſeruice ſoeuer they did, as all generals are wont to giue to honeſt men that ſerue valiantly. This order of the Senate miſliked Marcellus verie much, who at his returne home out of Sicile, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him maniſeſt wrong, to deny him that fauour, that hauing done his cōmon wealth ſuch faithfull ſeruice diuerſe times, as he had done, he might not reſtore ſo many poore Romaines to their honour againe. Now, when Marcellus was in Sicile, he receiued great hurts and iniuries by Hippocrates, generall of the Syracuſans: who, to pleaſure the Carthaginians, and by their meanes to make him ſelfe chiefe Lord of Syracuſa, did put many Romaine citizēs to death. Wherupon Marcellus went and layed ſiege to the city of the Leontines, and when he had taken it by aſſault, he hurt neuer a townes man, nor naturall citizen of the ſame: but ſuch traytors as he found there, and had fled from his camp, and yeelded to the enemies, them he cauſed to be whipped, and then hanged. But notwithſtanding, Hippocrates had before cauſed it to be bruted at Syracuſa, that Marcellus had put all the Leontines to the ſword, not ſparing litle children: and afterwards Hippocrates comming thither on the ſodaine, in the feare and garboyle of this falſe brute, he eaſily tooke the city. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken Syracuſa, left forthwith the Leontines, & went with his whole army, & camped hard by Syracuſa: & ſent his Ambaſſadours to tell the Syracuſans truely, what he had done in the city of the Leontines, and quite contrarie to that they were informed of. Howbeit that preuailed not, for they beleeued not Marcellus, becauſe Hippocrates being the ſtronger, had wonne the citie. Whereupon he began then to approch the walls, and to aſſault in euery quarter, as well by ſea as by land. Appius tooke charge of them that gaue aſſault by land. Marcellus himſelfe, with three ſcore gallies of fiue owers at euery bancke, well armed, and full of all ſortes of artillerie and fire workes, did aſſault by ſea, and rowed hard to the wall, hauing made a great engine and deuiſe of batterie, vpon eight gallies chained together, to batter the wall: truſting in the great multitude of his engines of batterie, and to all ſuch other neceſſarie prouiſion as he had for warres, as alſo in his owne reputation. But Archimedes made light accompt of all his deuiſes, as indeede they were nothing comparable to the engines himſelfe had inuented: and yet were not his owne ſuch, as himſelfe did recken of, to ſhew ſingularitie of worke and deuiſe. For thoſe he had made, were but his recreations of Geometrie, and things done to paſſe the time with, at the requeſt of king Hieron: who had prayed him to call to minde a litle, his Geometricall ſpeculation, and to applie it to things corporall and ſencible, and to make the reaſon of it demonſtratiue, and plaine, to the vnderſtanding of the common people by experiments, ments, and to the benefit and commoditie of vſe. For this inuentiue art to frame inſtruments and engines, (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, ſo highly commended and eſteemed of all ſortes of people) were firſt ſet forth by Architas, and by Eudoxus: partly to bewtifie a litle the ſcience of Geometry by this fineneſſe, and partly to proue and confirme by materiall examples and ſencible inſtruments, certaine Geometricall concluſions, wherof a man can not finde out the conceiuable demonſtrations, by enforced reaſons and proofes. As that concluſion which inſtructeth one to ſearch out two lynes meane proportionall, which can not be proued by reaſon demonſtratiue, and yet notwithſtanding is a principall and an accepted ground, for many things which are conteined in the art of portraiture. Both of them haue faſhioned it to the workemanſhip of certaine inſtruments, called Meſolabes or Meſographes, which ſerue to finde theſe meane lines proportionall, by drawing certaine curue lines, and ouerthwart and oblike ſextions. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and mainteined againſt them, that they did vtterly corrupt and diſgrace, the worthineſſe & excellency of Geometrie, making it to deſcend from things not comprehenſible, and without body, vnto things ſencible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable ſubſtance, where the vile and baſe handie worke of man is to be employed: ſince that time I ſay, handie craft, or the art of engines, came to be ſeparated from Geometry, and being long time deſpiſed by the Philoſophers, it came to be one of the warlike artes. But Archimedes hauing told king Hieron, his kinſeman and verie friend, that it was poſsible to remoue as great a weight as he would, with as litle ſtrength as he liſted to put to it: and boaſting himſelfe thus (as they report of him) and truſting to the force of his reaſons, wherewith he proued this concluſion, that if there were an other globe of earth, he was able to remoue this of ours, and paſſe it ouer to the other: king Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this deuiſe in execution, and to make him ſee by experience, ſome great or heauy weight remoued, by litle force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greateſt carects, or hulkes of the king (that to draw it to the ſhore out of the water, required a maruellous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done ſo) and put a great number of men more into her, than her ordinarie burden: and he himſelfe ſitting alone at his eaſe farre off, without any ſtraining at all, drawing the end of an engine with many wheeles and pullyes, fayre and ſoftly with his hand, made it come as gently and ſmoothly to him, as it had floted in the ſea. The king wondring to ſee the ſight, and knowing by proofe the greatneſſe of his art: he prayed him to make him ſome engines, both to aſſault and defend, in all manner of ſieges and aſſaults. So Archimedes made him many engines, but king Hieron neuer occupied any of them, becauſe he raigned the moſt part of his time in peace, without any warres. But this prouiſion and munition of engines, ſerued the SYRACVSANS turne maruellouſly at that time: & not onely the prouiſion of the engines ready made, but alſo the enginer & worke maiſter himſelfe, that had inuented them. Now, the SYRACVSANS ſeeing them ſelues aſſaulted by the ROMAINES, both by ſea and by land, were maruellouſly perplexed, and could not tell what to ſay they were ſo afrayed: imagining it was impoſsible for them to withſtand ſo great an army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to ſet them at liberty, there flue in the ayre infinite kindes of ſhot, and maruellous great ſtones, with an vncredible noyſe and force on the ſodaine, vpon the footemen that came to aſſault the cittie by land, bearing downe, and tearing in peeces all thoſe, which came againſt them, or in what place ſoeuer they lighted, no earthly bodie being able to reſiſt the violence of ſo heauie a weight: ſo that all their ranckes were maruellouſly diſordered. And as for the gallies that gaue aſſault by ſea, ſome were ſuncke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of ſhips, whereto they faſten their ſayles, which were ſodainly blowen ouer the walles with force of their engines into their gallies, and ſo ſuncke them by their ouer great weight. Other being hoyſed vp by the prooes with hands of Iron, and hookes made like cranes billes, plunged their poupes into the ſea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines faſtened within, one contrary to an other, made them turne in the ayre like a whirlegigge, & ſo caſt them vpon the rockes by the towne walles, and ſplitted them all to fitters, to the great ſpoyle and murther of the perſons that were within them. And ſometimes the ſhips and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a fearefull thing to ſee them hang and turne in the ayre as they did: vntill that caſting their men within them ouer the hatches, ſome here, ſome there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be emptie, and to breake againſt the walls, or elſe to fall into the ſea againe, when their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought againſt the walls, vpon a bridge made of gallies ioyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reaſon of the faſhion it had like to an inſtrument of muſicke of the ſame name, which is a harpe. The ſame being yet a good pretie way off from the walls, there fell a great ſtone vpon it ſent frō the walles, weighing ten talents. Then, a ſecond after that, and a third one after that, the which falling all into this engine with ſuch a thunder and terrible tempeſt, brake the foundation of the engine, and tare all the bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that ſuſteined it. So that Marcellus being amazed with all, not knowing well what it meant: was glad to retire quickly, and ſent to make his trompet ſound the retreat to thoſe that gaue aſſault by land. Hereupon they ſate in counſell to determine what was to be done, and they reſolued, that the next morning before day they ſhould approch the walles if it were poſsible: becauſe that Archimedes engines, which were verie ſtrong and hard wound vp, ſhould by this meanes ſend all the force and furie of their ſtones and ſhot ouer their heades, and that neare hand alſo he could do no good with them, for that they had not the ſcope of their leauell and cariage they ſhould haue. But Archimedes had preuented this deuiſe by long preparation before, hauing made prouiſion of engines for farre and neare, the leauell and cariage whereof was proportioned for all diſtances: their ſhot ſhort, the arrowes not verie long, many holes & arches in the walles one hard by an other, where there were ſtore of crosbowes to kill neare hand, ſet in ſuch places, as the enemies could not ſee them without. Wherefore, when the ROMAINES thought to approch, thinking they had bene ſafe and cloſe, that no man ſaw them: it amazed them all when they were receiued againe with infinite ſhot, and ſtriken to the ground with ſtones that fell vpon their heades like lead: (for there was no part of all the walles, from whence they had not the like ſhot.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retire from the walles. And yet when they were further of from them, the arrowes, ſtones, and other kinde of ſhot that flue in euery place among them, killed a great nomber of them, ſcattered farre from thence: ſo that many of them were ſlaine and ſore wounded, and diuerſe of their ſhips ſplitted, and they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, becauſe Archimedes had placed his engines verie cloſely behind the walles, and not vpon the walles in ſight of the enemy. So that it appeared the gods fought againſt the ROMAINES, they were ſo ſlaine and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithſtāding, Marcellus eſcaped with life, ſafe from hurt, and mocking his workemaiſters and enginers he had in his camp, he ſayd vnto them. What, ſhall we not leaue to make warres with this Briarian enginer and Geometrician here? who ſitting ſtill vpon the wharfe, in ſporting manner hath with ſhame ouerthrowen our nauie, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred handes of the Gyants, diſcharging at one inſtant ſo many ſhot among vs? For indeede, all the reſidue of the SYRACVSANS were, as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he himſelfe was the onely creature that moued and did all, all weapons elſe being quiet, and his engines onely occupied, to aſſault and defend. At the length, Marcellus ſeeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but ſee the end of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting looſe ſome of his engines vpon them: he would no more approch the walles, nor giue aſſault, determining to ſee if he could winne it by long ſiege. Notwithſtanding, Archimedes had ſuch a great minde, and was ſo profoundly learned, hauing hidden in him the onely treaſure and ſecrets of Geometricall inuentions: as he would neuer ſet forth any booke how to make all theſe warlicke engines, which wanne him at that time the fame & glory, not of mans knowledge, but rather of diuine wiſedom But he eſteeming all kind of handy craft & inuention to make engines, & generally all maner of ſciences bringing common commoditie by the vſe of them, to be but vile, beggerly, and mercenarie droſſe: employed his wit & ſtudie onely to write things, the beawtie and ſubtiltie whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with neceſsitie. For all that he hath written, are geometricall propoſitions, which are without compariſon of any other writings whatſoeuer: becauſe the ſubiect whereof they treate, doth appeare by demonſtration, the matter giuing them the grace & the greatneſſe, and the demonſtration ſtration prouing it ſo exquiſitely,with wonderfull reaſon and facilitie,as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written,in more plaine and ſimple tearmes,and by more eaſie principles, then thoſe which he hath inuented. Now ſome do impute this,to the ſharpeneſſe of his wit and vnderſtanding,which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreame paines he tooke, which made theſe things come ſo eaſily from him,that they ſeemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man liuing of himſelfe can deuiſe the demonſtration of his propoſitions, what paine ſoeuer he take to ſeeke it:& yet ſtraight ſo ſoone as he commeth to declare & open it,euery man then imagineth with himſelf he could haue found it out well enough,he can then ſo plainly make demonſtration of the thing he meaneth to ſhew. And therfore that me thinks is like enough to be true,which they write of him: that he was ſo rauiſhed and drunke with the ſweet intiſements of this Syren,which as it were lay continually with him,as he forgat his meat & drink, & was careleſſe otherwiſe of himſelfe, that oftentimes his ſeruants got him againſt his will to the bathes,to waſh and annoint him:& yet being there,he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures,euen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with oiles and ſweet ſauors, with his finger he did draw lines vpon his naked body:ſo far was he taken from himſelfe,& brought into an extaſie or traunce,with the delight he had in the ſtudy of Geometry,& truly rauiſhed with the loue of the Muſes. But amongſt many notable things he deuiſed,it appeareth ,that he moſt eſteemed the demonſtration of the proportion betweene the Cylinder(to wit,the round colomne)& the ſphære or globe contained in the ſame: for he praied his kinſmen and friends,that after his death they would put a Cylinder vpon his tombe,containing a maſſie ſphære,with an inſcription of the proportion,wherof the continent exceedeth the thing conteined. So Archimedes being as you haue heard, did aſmuch as lay in him, both ſaue himſelfe and SYRACVSA, from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the ſiege at SYRACVSA, wanne the citie of MEGARES in SICILE,one of the ancienteſt cities in all the Iland:& he tooke beſides,the campe of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES,where he ſlue aboue 8000 men,ſurpriſing them vpon the ſodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge,& to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great part of the champion countrie of SICILE,& made the cities to rebell that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part: & in all the battels he fought,he euer ouercame them that durſt bid him battell. It chanced afterwards,that he tooke a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine priſoner,called Danippus: euen as he came out of SYRACVSA by ſea. The SYRACVSANS deſirous to redeeme him, ſent to him to pray he might be ranſomed. They made many parlees about his ranſome,and drew out this practiſe to diuerſe meetings: vntill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certaine tower, that had no great watch kept vpon it, & into the which he might ſecretly conuey a certaine number of men,the wall of the city in that place being no very hard thing to ſkale. Therfore when he had giuen a good geſſe by eſtimation at the height of that tower,by often approching to it, hauing parled many a time hard by it: he prouided ſkaling ladders,& toke the oportunitie of a feaſt which the SYRACVSANS ſolemnized in the honor of Diana, on which day they gaue themſelues to all feaſting,ſporting and plaies. So he tooke not only the tower, but filled all the wals round about with armed men before day,& brake open the maine gate and entrie of the citie called Hexapile. And as the SYRACVSANS began to ſtir, perceiuing the ROMAINES on the wals: Marcellus made his men ſound their trumpets on euery ſide. Wherupon the SYRACVSANS were ſo afraid & amazed,that they began to flie,thinking all the city beſides had bin taken,where in deed the greateſt and ſtrongeſt quarter of the city called ACRADINA,was not yet touched:becauſe it is walled in round about,and ſeparated from the reſt of the city,which is deuided into two other parts,the one called the new citie, and the other fortune. The two parts whereof being wonne,Marcellus by the breake of the day forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapile. And when his captaines told him he was happy,to winne ſo goodly a citie,ſo eaſily: they ſay, that he looking about him,and conſidering the greatneſſe & ſtatelineſſe of the ſame,he wept for very pitie,foreſeeing whereto it ſhould come,thinking with himſelfe what a ſodaine change it ſhould haue,when his armie came to ſpoile and ſack the ſame. For there was not a captaine that durſt denie the ſouldiers when they demanded the ſpoile,& yet were there many that would needs haue it burnt and raſed to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any caſe, and beſides, it was ſore againſt his minde to graunt them the ſpoile of the goods and ſlaues: ſtraightly commanding them notwithſtanding, not to lay hands of any free man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any SYRACVSAN ſlaue. Wherein, though he ſhewed great fauor & mercy, yet it greeued him to ſee ſo famous a city, brought to that miſerable ſtate: and in the midſt of all the ioy he had for his victorie, he could not refraine from weeping for pitty to ſee ſo riche and wealthy a city, in the turning of a hand, ſpoiled, & brought to nought. For it is ſaid, that the riches & goods taken away at the ſack of SYRACVSA, were nothing inferior to the ſpoiles of CARTHAGE, which was alſo ſacked not long after that: for the other part of the city of SYRACVSA called ACRADINA, was ſoone after alſo taken by treaſon, and ſpoiled againſt the captaines wils, ſauing the kings treaſure, which was reſerued to be caried to the common treaſure of ROME. SYRACVSA being taken, nothing greeued Marcellus more, then the loſſe of Archimedes. Who being in his ſtudie when the city was taken, buſily ſeeking out by himſelfe the demonſtration of ſome Geometricall propoſition which he had drawne in figure, and ſo earneſtly occupied therein, as he neither ſaw nor heard any noiſe of enemies that ran vp and downe the city, and much leſſe knew it was taken: he wondered when he ſaw a ſouldier by him, that bad him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithſtanding, he ſpake to the ſouldier, and bad him tary vntill he had done his concluſion, & brought it to demonſtration: but the ſouldier being angry with his anſwer, drew out his ſword, and killed him. Other ſay, that the ROMAINE ſouldier when he came, offered the ſwords point to him, to kil him: & that Archimedes when he ſaw him, praied him to hold his hand a litle, that he might not leaue the matter he looked for vnperfect, without demonſtration. But the ſoldier making no reckoning of his ſpeculation, killed him preſently. It is reported a third way alſo, ſaying, that certaine ſoldiers met him in the ſtreets going to Marcellus, carying certaine Mathematicall inſtruments in a litle prety coffer, as dials for the ſunne, ſphæres and angles, wherewith they meaſure the greatneſſe of the body of the ſunne by view: and they ſuppoſing he had caried ſome golde or ſiluer, or other pretious iewels in that litle coffer, ſlue him for it. But it is moſt true, that Marcellus was maruellous ſory for his death, and euer after hated the villaine that ſlue him, as a curſed and execrable perſon: and how he made alſo maruellous much afterwards of Archimedes kinſemen for his ſake. The ROMAINES were eſteemed of at that time by all nations, for maruellous expert ſouldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be dealt with: but they neuer ſhewed any example of their clemencie and curteſie, and leaſt of all of any ciuill maner to any ſtrangers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whoſe actes did ſhew the GRÆCIANS then, that the ROMAINES were more gratious and mercifull, then they. For he did ſo courteouſlie intreate thoſe that had to do with him, and ſhewed ſuch fauour to priuate perſons, and alſo to whole cities: that if there were any crueltie ſhewed in the cities of ENNA, or at MEGARES, or againſt the SYRACVSANS, it was rather through their owne fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for proofe hereof, I will recite you one example onely amongſt many. There is a citie in SICILE called ENGYIVM, it is no great thing, but a very ancient citie of name, by reaſon of the trafficke thither, for that there are certaine goddeſſes to be ſeene, whom they worſhip, called the mothers. Some ſay the CRETANS were the firſt builders and founders of the temple there, where you ſhall ſee ſpeares and helmets of copper, and vpon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and vpon others, Vlyſſes name alſo, which are conſecrated to theſe goddeſſes. This citie ſtood altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias being the chiefeſt man of the ſame, was all he might againſt it, and perſwaded them openly in all their counſels to take part with the ROMAINES, proouing it by many reaſons, that his enemies counſelling the contrarie, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Whereuppon Nicias enemies fearing his greatneſſe and authoritie, they did conſpire among themſelues to apprehend him, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias heating of ſuch a matter, and finding that they lay in waite to take him: vſed this pollicie to preuent their treaſon. He gaue out openly very ill ſpeeches againſt the goddeſſes, and did many things in derogation of their honor: and ſaid the ſight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but a deuiſe, and that there was no credit to be giuen to them. Theſe words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the miſcheiſe they pretended againſt him, to himſelfe, as the onely cauſer of his owne hurt. So they hauing appointed a day to apprehend him, by chaunce a common counſell was kept that day they had determined of: where Nicias ſpeaking to the people about matter of counſell, in the middeſt of his oration fell to the ground, to the great wonder of the whole aſſembly, as euery man may coniecture. Howbeit neuer a man ſturred, & a prety while after he began to lift vp his head a litle, and to looke gaſtly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he ſtill gathered higher and lowder by little and litle, vntil he ſaw all the people wonderouſly afraid & amazed, that not one of them durſt ſpeake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ran towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddeſſes mothers did torment him: and not a man durſt once come neere him, nor offer to ſtop him, they were ſo ſuperſtitious and fooliſhly afraide of the goddeſſes, imagining it was ſome diuine puniſhment. But by this meanes he eaſily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all: and he was neuer ſeene after that time, to do, or ſpeake, like a mad man in any thing. His wife that was made priuie to his deuiſe, and furthered his intent, went firſt and fell downe on her knees before the goddeſſes mothers in their temple, as ſhe had hartily praied vnto them: and faining afterwards ſhe would go ſeeke her huſband, that ran vp and downe the fields like a mad man, ſhe went out of the city with her litle children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they eſcape without danger, & went vnto Marcellus to SYRACVSA. The ENGIENIANS afterwards plaied ſuch inſolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and cauſed them all to be taken and bound, as though he would haue put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with the teares in his eyes, & embracing his knees, and kiſſing his hands, beſought him to take pitty of his poore citizens, beginning firſt with thoſe that were his greateſt enemies. This good nature of Nicias ſo pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, & did no hurt to the city, and gaue Nicias certaine land beſides many other rich gifts he beſtowed vpon him. Thus it is reported in the hiſtorie of Poſidonius the Philoſopher. Now Marcellus being ſent for home by the ROMAINES, becauſe they had wars in their owne countrie, and euen at ROME gates: he departed out of SICILE returning towards ROME, and caried the goodlieſt tables, pictures, and ſtatues, and other ſuch ornaments as were in SYRACVSA, meaning firſt to beautifie his triumph with them, and to leaue them afterwards for an ornament to ROME, which before that time neuer knew what ſuch curious works ment. For, this fineneſſe, and curious tables and imagery, neuer came into ROME before, but was throughly ſet out with armour and weapons of barbarous people, & with bloudy ſpoiles, and was alſo crowned with monuments of victories and triumphes of diuerſe enemies, which were no pleaſant, but rather fearefull ſights to looke vpon, farre vnfit for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminondas did call the plaine of BOEOTIA, Mars ſcoffold, where he kept his games: & Xenophon alſo called the city of EPHESVS, the armorers ſhop: euē ſome thinkes (as Pindarus ſaid) they might rightly haue tearmed ROME, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wan the peoples good wils much more to Marcellus, becauſe he did ſo paſſingly ſet forth ROME with ſuch excellent fine toyes of GRECE But Fabius Maximus on the other ſide, was better beloued of the old men: becauſe he brought no ſuch toies with him frō the city of TARENTVM, when he wan it. Indeed he brought away gold and ready coine, and much other goods that were profitable: but for images & tables, he left them ſtanding in their places, ſpeaking a thing of great note. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their gods offēded with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, ſaying that by this acte he had purchaſed ROME great malice & hate. Firſt, becauſe he did not onely lead men priſoners in his triumphe, but the gods alſo: & ſecondly, becauſe he had filled the people full of pritle pratle, & idle curioſity, ſpending all the whole day in gaſing, & wondering at the excellency of the workmē, & of their works, where before they would fall to their labor, or elſe they wēt to the wars, not being acquainted with curioſity, nor idle life as Euripides ſaid, ſpeaking of Hercules:

Marcellus the firſt that brought in fineneſſe & curious tables and pictures into Rome, of the ſpoiles of Syracuſa.

In wicked practiſes, he ſimple was to ſee,
but he exceld in vertuous deeds, and feates that worthy be.

Notwithſtanding, Marcellus did glory amongſt the GRÆCIANS themſelues, ſaying: that he had taught the ROMAINES to eſteeme the wonderfull workes of GRECE, which they knew not before But at his returne out of SICILE, his enemies procured, that his honour of triumphe was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left ſomewhat to do in SICILE, and that the warre was not altogether ended, and fearing beſides leaſt a third triumphe would make him too much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honour of the great triumphe, in the mountaine of ALBA onely: and of the litle triumphe, in the city of ROME. This maner of litle triumphe is called in Greeke Euan, and the ROMAINES call it Ouatio. And this difference there is between them: that in the Ouation triumph, the party to whom it is granted, doth not enter into the city vpon triumphing chariot drawne with foure horſes, nor doth cary any lawrell vpon his head in token of triumphe, nor hath any trumpets or hornes blowne before him, but doth marche on foote with a paire of ſlippers on his feete, hauing flutes and howboyes playing before him, and wearing a garland of firre tree vpon his head: ſo as this maner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleaſant then fearefull ſight. And that reaſon doth flatly drawe me to beleeue, that theſe two kinds of entries they granted to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victorie: were deuided in the olde time, rather for the maner, then for the greatneſſe of the doings. For ſuch as had ouercome their enemies by great ſlaughter and bloudy battels, they did make their entry with pompe of triumphe, that was altogether marſhall and terrible, followed with their ſouldiers armed, and crowned with lawrell garlands, as their cuſtome was in muſtering their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary ſide, that without any exploit of armes returned home with victory, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law granted them the honour of Ouation triumphe, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an inſtrument of pleaſure belonging to peace, and the firre tree is a tree conſecrated to Venus, which goddeſſe, aboue all gods and goddeſſes doth moſt deteſt warres. This ſecond kinde of entrie was called Ouatio, not as many GRÆCIANS haue taken it, comming of this word Euan, which is a voice and ſong of ioy, although they did vſe alſo to accompanie the Captaines making their entry in this ſort, crying and ſinging Euan: but there were certaine GRÆCIANS that would haue fetched the deriuation of this word, from an old common cuſtome they had: and were of opinion beſides, that part of this honor did appertaine to god Bacchus, whoſe ſurname we call Euius, and ſomtimes Thriambus. Howbeit this is not the true deriuation of the name, but after this ſort. At the great triumphe and entry made, the captaine or generall that triumpheth as a conqueror, did offer and ſacrifice (by the old orders & ancient cuſtomes of ROME) one, or diuerſe oxen: where at the ſecond triumphe called the Ouation, he onely ſacrificed a mutton, which the ROMAINES call in their tongue Ouem, and thereof was it called Ouation. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the law maker of the ROMAINE lawes & cuſtomes, and the law maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how both of them were contrary to the other, in appointing their ſacrifices for victorie. For at SPARTA, the captaine or generall that had done his feate by policie or friendſhip, the ſacrifice he did offer vp to the gods, was an oxe: and he that by force, and bloudy battell had obtained victory, only offered vp a cocke for ſacrifice. For though they were very good ſoldiers, yet they thought better of his ſeruice, that by his wiſedom and wiſe perſwaſions obteined victorie: then of his, that wan it by valiantneſſe, and force of armes. Thus may you ſee which of theſe two lawemakers had beſt reaſon in his ordinances. But now to Marcellus againe. He being choſen Conſull the fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did ſtirre vp the SYRACVSANS againſt him, and perſwaded them to complaine to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly, and vncourteouſly vſed them, contrarie to the ancient league and alliances made long time before with the ROMAINES. Marcellus being ſacrificing one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were ſet in counſell: the SYRACVSANS deputies came before them, and kneeling downe, beſought them to giue them audience, and that they would do them iuſtice. The other Conſull that was preſent rebuked them, being angry they had ſo maliciouſly ſpyed the occaſion of Marcellus abſence But when Marcellus heard of it, he ſtraight left of all, and came to the Senate, and firſt ſate him downe in his Conſuls chaire, where he gaue audience as Conſull and diſpatched diuerſe cauſes: when he had done ſo, he roſe out of his chaire, and came downe among them, ſtanding as a priuate perſon to aunſwer at the barre,as other offenders and men accuſed,ſuffering the SYRACVSANS to alleadge and ſay againſt him what they would. Then were the SYRACVSANS blanck,when they ſaw the maieſty of Marcellus,and his ſtaied countenance in all things: ſo that hauing found him before a very valiant man in warres, and vnconquerable, they found him then a man no leſſe dreadfull in his Conſuls robe:that they hung downe their eyes,and durſt not looke him in the face. Notwithſtanding, they being ſuborned by his enemies,began at the length boldly to accuſe him,and yet with ſorow and lamentation, the effect whereof was this. That they being the ROMAINES friends & confederates,had abidden ſuch iniuries at Marcellus hands,as all other generals neuer offered their very enemies. Whereto Marcellus ſtraight anſwered againe to the contrary. That for many iniuries the ROMAINES had receiued of them, they ſuffred nothing but that, which was vnpoſſible they ſhould not ſuffer,that reſiſted vntill they were taken by force: and yet they might thanke themſelues for any thing they ſuffered,becauſe they would not obey nor conſent, to reaſonable capitulations and articles of peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alledge for their excuſe,that the tyrants had compelled them to make warres: when they to the contrary,becauſe they would enter into warres,were contented to bee ſubiect to a tyrant. So, when both parties had ſpokē their minds,the SYRACVSANS (as the maner is) went out of the Senate houſe,and Marcellus alſo,leauing his fellow Conſul in his place in the Senate,& taried without the doore, attending the ſentence of the Senate, neuer altering his countenance nor wonted looke,neither for feare of ſentēce, nor for malice or anger againſt the SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his iudgement. Afterwards when the Senators voices were gathered together,& that Marcellus was cleared by the moſt voices: then the SYRACVSANS fell downe at his feet weeping, and beſought him not to wreake his anger vpon them that were preſent, and moreouer that he would haue compaſſion of the reſidue of the citizens,who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confeſſed themſelues bound to him for euer. Marcellus moued with pitty by their intreaty,he pardoned them, & euer after did all the SYRACVSANS what pleaſure he could poſsible. For through his entreaty and requeſt,the Senate did confirme and ratifie his grant vnto them, which was: that they might vſe the liberty and benefit of their owne lawes,and quietly enioy their goods alſo which were left them. To requite this ſpecial grace procured them by Marcellus,the SYRACVSANS gaue him many honors,& among others they made a law,that euer after,as oft as any of Marcellus name or houſe came into SICILE, the SYRACVSANS ſhould keepe a ſolemne feaſt, with garlands on their heads,& ſhould alſo ſacrifice vnto the gods. After this, Marcellus went againſt Hanniball: and where all the other Conſuls almoſt,& generals,after the ouerthrow at CANNES,had vſed this only policy with him,not to come to battell: he tooke a contrary courſe to them all, thinking that tract of time,(whereby they thought to eate out Hannibals force (was rather a direct conſuming and deſtroying of all ITALIE: & that Fabius Maximus ſtanding too much vpon ſafetie,tooke not the way to cure the diſeaſe & weakneſſe of the commōweale of ROME,looking to end this war,conſuming by litle and litle the ſtrength and power of ROME, committing a fearefull phiſitions fault and errour, being afraide to heale their pacient ſodainly, imagining that to bring them low, doth leſſen the diſeaſe. So,firſt of all he went to beſiege certaine great cities of the SAMNITES,which were reuolted from obedience of the ROMAINES: & thoſe he wan againe with a great prouiſion of corne and money he found in them, beſides 3000 ſouldiers Hanniball left in garriſon there,whom he tooke priſoners. Hanniball after that, hauing ſlain the viceconſull Cneus Fuluius in APVLIA,with eleuen Tribunis militum(to wit,colonels, euery one hauing charge of 1000 footemen) and ouerthrowne the greateſt part of his armie: Marcellus wrote letters to ROME,hoping to comfort the Senate and people, telling he would go thither,and did warrant them he would driue Hanniball out of APVLIA. When the ROMAINS had red his letters,they were nothing the more cōforted, but rather (as Liuie writeth) more afraide and diſcouraged: becauſe they doubted the danger to come would be greater, then the loſſe paſt, taking Marcellus to be a farre greater and better generall, then euer was Fuluius. Neuertheleſſe, Marcellus performing the contents of his letters written to ROME, draue Hanniball out of APVLIA,and made him retire into LVCANIA. And Marcellus finding him in that country, by a city called NVMISTRON, lodged vpon hils, and in places of ſtrength and aduantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the firſt that preſented his enemy battell. Hanniball on the other ſide, came downe into the valley, and they ioyned battell: which was ſo cruelly fought, and ſo long time, as it could not be diſcerned who had the better. For the battell being begun at nine of the clocke in the morning, it was darke night ere they gaue ouer. The next morning by peepe of day, Marcellus ſet his men againe in battell raye, in the middeſt of all the dead bodies that lay ſlaine in the field, and chalenged Hanniball, to proue who ſhould haue the field. But Hanniball refuſed, and marched his way thence: ſo as Marcellus thereby had good leaſure left him to ſtrip his ſlaine enemies, and alſo to burie his owne ſouldiers. When he had finiſhed that, he preſently followed his enemy by the foote, who laied many ambuſhes for him, but he could neuer trap him in any: and in euery encounter or skirmiſh they had together, Marcellus had euer the better, which wanne him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to chooſe new Conſuls, the Senate thought good to ſend rather for the other Conſul that was in SICILE, then to remoue Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hanniball. So when the other Conſull was come to ROME, the Senate commaunded him to name Quintus Fuluius Dictator, becauſe the Dictator was neither choſen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Conſuls or Prætors, in open aſſembly of the people, nameth ſuch a one Dictator, as he liketh of. Wherefore it ſeemeth, that this word Dictator, came vpon that worde naming: for, Dicere in the ROMAINE tongue, ſignifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dictator, becauſe he commandeth of himſelfe what he will, without the counſell of the Senate, & the voices of the people: and this ſeemeth to be true, becauſe the commandements of the Senate of ROME are called Edicta, which we GRECIANS call Diatagmata. Now the other Conſull and companion of Marcellus being come out of SICILE, he would needs name another Dictator, then him whom the Senate offred him: and becauſe he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do, he ſtale away one night, & returned againe into SICILE. Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fuluius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their letters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, and authorized the peoples election. So he himſelfe was choſen againe Proconſull, for the next yeare following: in the which he hauing conferred with Fabius Maximus about the warres, they were agreed, that Fabius ſhould prooue if he could win the city of TARENTVM againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time ſhould keepe Hanniball occupied, that he might not come to aide it. This reſolution being taken betweene them, Marcellus went to meet Hanniball by the city of CANNVSIVM: who as he ſtill changed and ſhifted lodging, becauſe he would not come to the battell againſt his will, found Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Inſomuch as Hanniball remouing thus his campe, Marcellus plied him ſo one day with continuall alarums and skirmiſhes, that he brought him to a battell that held all day long till night, and compelled them both to leaue off till the next morning: where Marcellus ſhewed againe in field by breake of the day, in battell raye. Whereat Hanniball being in a maruellous rage, he called his ſouldiers together, and made an oration to them, earneſtly mouing them once againe to fight with Marcellus, if euer they had heretofore fought for his ſake. You ſee, ſaid he, that hauing fought ſo many battels, & gotten ſuch victories as we haue done, we cannot yet take breath as we would, nor be in quiet, how much ſo euer we win, if we driue not away yonder fellow Marcellus. When Hanniball had ended his oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, he led them on to the battell: where Marcellus, to no purpoſe, & out of time, would needs ſhew Hanniball a ſtratagem of war, that turned himſelf to the worſt. For Marcellus perceiuing the right wing of his armie diſtreſſed, made one of his legions that was ſet in ray in the rereward of his hoaſt, to marche to the front of his battell, to help thoſe that needed aide. But this remouing of the legion, troubled them that fought, and gaue the enemies the victorie: who ſlue that day two thouſand ſeuen hundred of the ROMAINES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his campe, he ſtraight called his ſouldiers before him, to whome he ſpake in this maner: that he ſaw a great deale of armor, and bodies of men, but he could ſee no ROMAINES. The ROMAINES hearing him ſay ſo, beſought him to pardon the faulte they had committed. Marcellus aunſwered, he would neuer pardon them, ſo long as they were ouercome: but when they ouercame againe, he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to bring thē againe to fight with the enemy, that ſuch as were at ROME ſhould rather heare newes of their victory, then of their running away. When he had ſaid, he appointed they ſhould giue thoſe bands that firſt turned their backes to Hanniball, barely for wheate. So, as there were many of them in great daunger of their liues, for the ſore wounds they had giuen them in the battell: yet was there not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieue them then the grieuous wounds they had. The next morning betimes was ſet out of the generals tent, the coate armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary ſigne of battell: and the bands that had receiued diſhonor the day before, were placed at their owne requeſt in the front of the battell. The other Captaines beſides, that were not ouerthrowen, did leade their bands alſo to the field, and did ſet them in battell ray. Hanniball hearing of that, cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that can not be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the onely odde man, that neuer giueth reſt to his enemy, when he hath ouercome him: nor taketh any for him ſelfe when he is ouercome. We ſhall neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I ſee, ſith ſhame, whether he win or loſe, doth ſtill prouoke him to be bolder and valianter. After orations made of both ſides, both armies marched forwards to ioyne battell. The ROMAINES being as ſtrong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hanniball put his Elephants in the voward and front of his battell, and commanded his men to driue them vppon the ROMAINES: and ſo they did. Which in deed did ſomewhat trouble and diſorder the firſt rankes of the ROMAINES: vntill ſuch time as Flauius, Tribune of the ſouldiers, tooke an enſigne in his hands, and marched before the beaſts, and gaue the firſt of them ſuch a thruſt with the point of his enſigne, that he made her turne backe. The firſt beaſt being turned backe thus, ran vpon the ſecond that followed her, and the ſecond made the third goe backe alſo, and ſo from one to an other, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiuing that, commaunded his horſemen to ſet vpon the enemies with all the fury they could, in that place where he ſaw thē, ſomewhat troubled with theſe beaſts, that turned bake againe vpon them: and that they ſhould driue them further in amongeſt them. Which they did, and gaue ſo hotte a charge vppon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their backes and run away, and they purſued them ſtill, killing them downe right, euen to their campe ſide: where was the greateſt ſlaughter of all, by reaſon their Elephantes that were wounded, fell downe ſtarke dead within the gate of their campe. And they ſay of the CARTHAGINIANS there were ſlaine at this battell, aboue eight thouſand, and of the ROMAINES onely three thouſand: howbeit all the reſt of them for the moſt part were very ſore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hanniball, that hee might march away at his pleaſure, as he did that night, and got him away far off from Marcellus, as knowing he was not in ſtate to follow him ouer ſodainely, becauſe of his great number of hurt men in his campe: and ſo by ſmal iournies he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in garriſon all the ſommer, in the city of SINVESSE, to heale the wounds of his ſore mangled ſouldiers. Hanniball hauing now gotten him ſelfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, and hauing his army free to ſerue him as he thought good: he burned and deſtroied al ITALY where he went and ſtood no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill ſpoken off at ROME, and cauſed his enemies to take hold of ſuch a matter againſt him: for they ſtraight raiſed Publius Bibulus Tribune, to accuſe him, who was a hot harebrained man, but very eloquent, and could deliuer his mind very wel. So this Bibulus called the people oft to counſaile, & told them there, that they muſt needs call home Marcellus, and appoint ſome other to take charge of the army: for as for him, ſayd he, becauſe he hath fought a litle with Hanniball (and as a man might ſay, wreſtled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to ſolace him ſelfe. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenants in the campe, and went him ſelfe to ROME, to aunſwer to the vntrue accuſations layed againſt him, and there he perceiued at his comming, how they intended to proſecute the matter againſt him vppon theſe informations. So a day of hearing was appointed for his matter, and the parties came before the people aſſembled in counſaile, in the great liſts or ſhew place, called Circus Flaminius, to giue iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, ſitting in his chaire, layed open his accuſation with great circumſtance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had told his tale, aunſwered him in few wordes, and very diſcretely, only touching his purgation. But the noble and chiefeſt men of the city, roſe vp and ſpake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainely, that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worſe of his valiantnes, then their enemy did: and to iudge of him as a coward, conſidering Hanniball only fled from him, of all other Captaines, and would by no meanes fight with him, neuer refuſing to fight with any other whatſoeuer. Theſe perſwaſions tooke ſuch effect, as wher Marcellus accuſer looked for his condẽnation: Marcellus to the cõtrary, was not only cleared of his accuſation, but furthermore they choſe him Conſull againe the fift time. So being entred into his office he went firſt into THVSCAN: where viſiting the good cities one after an other, and quieting them, he pacified a great ſedition in the country, when they were all ready to riſe and rebel. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to conſecrat the temple of honor & vertue, which he had built with the ſpoiles he got in the warres of SICILE. But the Prieſtes were againſt it, ſaying, two goddes might not be in one church. Thereupon he built another temple, and ioyned it to the firſt, being very angry the Prieſts denied ſo his conſecration: and he did take it for an euill token, beſides diuers other ſigns in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him much. For there were many temples ſet on fire with lightning at one time: and the rattes and miſe did gnaw the gold, that was in the chappell of Iupiter Capitoline. And it is reported alſo, that an oxe did ſpeake: and a child came out of the head of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Prieſts and Soothſayers ſacrificing to the gods, to withdraw this euill from them, theſe ſiniſter tokens did threaten: they could neuer finde any fauourable ſignes in their ſacrifices. Whereuppon they ſought to keepe Marcellus ſtill at ROME, who had a maruellous earneſt deſire to be gone with ſpeede to the warres: for neuer man longed for anie thing ſo much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hanniball. Inſomuch he neuer dreamed other thing in the night, nor ſpake of any matter elſe in the day to his friends and companions, not praied to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hanniball in the field: and I thinke he would willingliest haue fought a priuate combat with him, in ſome walled city or incloſed liſtes for the combat. And had it not bene that he had already won him ſelfe a great fame, and ſhewed him ſelfe to the world, (by ſundry great proofs and experience of his doings) a graue, ſkilfull, and a valiant Captaine as any man of his time: I would haue ſaid it had bene a pang of youth, & a more ambitious deſire, then became a man of his age, who was three ſcore yeare old at that time, when they made him Conſull againe the fift time. Neuertheles, after hee had ended all his propitiatory ſacrifices and purifications, ſuch as the Soothſayers had appointed: he departed from ROME with his fellow Conſull Quintus Criſpinus to the wars. He found Hanniball lying betweene the cities of BANCIA, and VENOVSA, and ſought all the meanes he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. Howbeit Hanniball being aduertiſed by ſpials, that the Cõſuls ſent an army to beſiege the city of the LOCRIANS, ſurnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS: (as ye would ſay) the occidentals, becauſe the GRECIANS, in reſpect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he laid an ambuſh for them that went, vnder the hil of PETILIVM, which was directly in their way, where he ſlew about two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did ſet Marcellus on fire, and made him more deſirous of battell: wherupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his enemie. Betweene their two campes there was a prety litle hill, ſtrong of ſituation, a wilde thing ouergrowen with wod, and there were high hillocks. From whence they might diſcerne a great way, both the one and the others campe, and at the foote of the ſame ran prety ſprings: Inſomuch as the ROMAINS wondered, that Hanniball cõming thither firſt, did not take that place, but had left it to his enemies. Howbeit Hannibal was crafty enough, leauing it of purpoſe: for as it was commodious to lodge his campe in, ſo it ſerued his turne better for an ambuſh. So he filled the wod, the hollow places, and the vallies there about, with ſtore of ſhot and ſpearemen, aſſuring him ſelfe that the place would intiſe the ROMAINS thither: & in deed he geſſed rightly, for ſo fell it out. Straight there flue a rumor abroad in the ROMAINES campe, that there was a paſſing place to lodge in, & euery man tooke vpõ him like a ſkilfull ſouldier, to tell what vantage they ſhould haue vpon their enemies by taking that place, and ſpecially if they did lodge there, or otherwiſe built a fort vpon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to go ſee the place him ſelf, taking a few horſemẽ with him. Notwithſtãding, before he would take horſe, he called led for his Soothſaier to ſacrifice to the gods. The firſt beaſt that was ſacrificed, the Soothſaier ſhewed Marcellus the liuer of it without a head. The ſecond beaſt ſacrificed, had a faire great head of a liuer, and all the other parts were alſo ſound, and very new: that by them it appeared al the feare of the firſt ſigns and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothſaiers on the other ſide ſayd, it did make them worſe afraid then before: for theſe ſo fauorable and lucky tokens of the ſacrifice, following immediatly after the firſt foule & naughty ſignes, made them doubt them much by reaſon of ſo ſtrange and ſodaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus ſaieth.

So Marcellus tooke his horſe, with Quintus Criſpinus his fellow Conſull, and his ſon one of the Tribunes of the ſouldiers, hauing onely two hundred and twenty horſemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among them, but al were THVSCANS, ſauing forty FREGELLANIANS, who from the beginning of theſe warres had alwaies ſhewed themſelues very faithfull and louing to Marcellus. The hill we ſpake of before, being thicke couered with wodde and buſhes, the enemies had ſet a skout to watch on the top of it, to giue warning if they ſaw any comming towards it. The ROMAINES could not ſee him, and he on the other ſide might ſee euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done, as he did aduertiſe thoſe at that time that lay in ambuſh for Marcellus comming: and they ſuffered him to paſſe on, vntill he came directly againſt them. Then they ſhewed vpon the ſodaine, and compaſſing in Marcellus, they both ſhot and ſtrake at him, ſome following them that fledde, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which onely ſtucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithſtanding the THVSCANS were fled) vpon the firſt crie they heard, to defend the two Conſuls, vntill ſuch time as the Conſull Criſpinus hauing two woundes on his body with a dart, did turne his horſe to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus ſuch a ſore blow with a ſpeare hauing a broade iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left aliue, being but a few in number, ſeeing Marcellus ſlaine, left him lying on the ground, and tooke his ſonne away with them that was very ſore hurt, and by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes recouered their campe, and ſaued them ſelues. At this ouerthrow, there were not ſlaine aboue forty men, and fiue and twenty taken priſoners, of which, fiue of them were the Conſuls ſergeants, and their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horſemen. Within few daies after, the other Conſull Criſpinus died alſo of his hurts, which was ſuch a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES, that both their Conſuls were ſlaine at one battell. Now Hanniball made no great reckonning of all that were ſlaine, or taken at this field: but when he heard that Marcellus ſelfe was ſlaine at this ouerthrow, he went him ſelfe ſtraight to the place to ſee him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, ſtanding hard by it, and conſidering his ſtrength, his ſtature, and countenance, hauing taken full view of all the parts of him, he ſpake no proud word againſt him, nor ſhewed any glad countenance, as ſome other would haue done, that had ſlaine ſo valiaunt and dangerous an enemy: but wondering how he came to be ſlaine ſo ſtrangely there, he tooke of his ring from one of his fingers that ſealed his letters, and giuing his body buriall according to his eſtate, made it to be honorably burnt, and then put all his bones and aſhes into a ſiluer pot, on which he him ſelfe put a crown of gold, and ſent it vnto Marcellus ſonne. It fortuned ſo, that certaine light horſemen of the NVMIDIANS met with them that caried this ſiluer potte, and would haue taken it from them by force: but they ſtoode to it, and would not part withall, and ſo fighting and ſtriuing together for it, the bones & aſhes were ſcattered all about. Hanniball hearing this, ſaid to them that were about him: ſee, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So he puniſhed the NVMIDIANS, and cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perſwaded him ſelfe it was the will of the gods he ſhould die ſo ſtrangely, and that his body ſhould haue no burial. Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus write it thus: but Liuie, & Auguſtus Cæſar ſay, that the pot was caried vnto his ſon, & honorably buried: Marcellus did cõſecrat many monuments in diuers places, beſides thoſe at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for young men to exerciſe them ſelues in. In the ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temples of the gods called Cabires: many images and tables he brought from SYRACVSA. And in the Ile of LINDOS, in the temple of Minerua, where among other, there is a ſtatue of his, and this epigramme grauen vnder it, as Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth.

The author of this epigramme reckoneth, the two times of his being viceconſull, for two whole Conſulſhippes: but his poſterity continued alwaies in great honour, vnto Marcellus the ſonne of Octauia, (Auguſtus Cæſars ſiſter) and of Caius Marcellus. He died a young man, being Ædilis of ROME, and maried vnto Iulia, Auguſtus daughter, with whom hee liued no long time. But to honor the memory of him, Octauia his mother built the library, and Auguſtus Cæſar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and library.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

Pelopidas and Marcellus acts in warres.

These are the greateſt things and beſt worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings: and for their maners and naturall conditions otherwiſe, they were all one, becauſe they were both valiant, painefull, and noble minded: ſauing that this difference onely was betweene them. That Marcellus in many cities he tooke by aſſault, did cruelly murder them, and ſpilt much bloud: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did neuer put any to the ſworde they ouercame, neither did they take away the liberty from any city they tooke: and it is thought the THEBANS would not haue handled the ORCHOMENIANS ſo cruelly as they did, if one, or both of thē had bene preſent. Now for their acts, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of ſeruice that Marcellus did, with ſo ſmall a company of horſemen as he tooke with him, to ouerthrow ſo great a cōpany of horſemen & footemen both, of the GAVLES: a thing that neuer Generall but himſelfe did, and ſpecially that ſlew with his owne handes in the field, the Generall of his enemies. Which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto, for he ſeeking to kill Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was ſlain firſt him ſelfe, and ſuffered that, which he deſired to haue done to an other. And yet for that ſeruice may be obiected, the battels of LEVCTRES, and of TEGYRA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with thoſe,there was no notable ambuſh or ſecret practiſe done by Marcellus,that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile,when he ſlew the tyrants that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and ſodain an enterpriſe ſtolen vpō,as none was euer greater,or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hanniball,who was a dreadfull and a violent enemy: ſo were the THEBANS alſo at that very time with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who notwithſtanding were ouercome of Pelopidas,at the battels of TEGYRA,and of LEVCTRES. Whereas Marcellus did neuer ſo much as once ouercome Hanniball, as Polybius writeth, but remained vnconquered alwaies,vntil that Scipio ouercame him in battel. Notwithſtanding,we do giue beſt credit to the reports of Cæſar, Liuie,Cornelius Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GRECIANS: who write, that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hannibals cōpanies, howbeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to ſpeake of,and it ſeemeth rather,it was through ſome mockery or deceit of that AFRICAN then otherwiſe. Yet ſure it was a great matter, and worthy much commendation,that the ROMAINS were brought to that courage, as they durſt abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS,hauing loſt ſo many great ouerthrows,and hauing ſo many generals of their armies ſlaine in battell,and hauing the whole Empire of ROME in ſo great danger of vtter deſtruction. For it was Marcellus only of al other generals,that put the ROMAINS in hart againe,after ſo great and long a feare throughly rooted in them: & incoraged the ſouldiers alſo too long to fight with their enemy,and not only to hope,but to aſſure them ſelues of victory. For,wher by reaſon of their continuall loſſes and fearefull ouerthrowes they had,they thought them ſelues happy men to eſcape Hannibals hands by running away: he taught them to be aſhamed to flie like cowards,to confeſſe they were in diſtreſſe,to retire,& leaue the field, before they had ouercome their enemies And where Pelopidas was neuer ouercome in battell being generall,and Marcellus did ouercome more then any general in his time: it might ſeeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one,ſhould compare with the good hap of the other that was neuer ouercome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the city of SYRACVSA, and Pelopidas failed of taking the city of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke,that it was more valiantly done of Pelopidas to come ſo neare SPARTA as he did, and that hee was the firſt that paſſed the riuer of EVROTAS with an army,which neuer enemy did before him,then it was of Marcellus to win all SICILE. Vnleſſe ſome peraduenture will ſay againe,this was Epaminondas,not Pelopidas act,as alſo in the victory of LEVCTRES: where no man liuing can pretend any part of glory to the doings of Marcellus. For he tooke SYRACVSA, being only generall alone, and did ouerthrow the GAVLES without his fellow Conſull,and fought with Hanniball, without any mans helpe or incouragement:(for all other were againſt it, and perſwaded the contrarie) and he was the firſt that altered the maner of wars the ROMAINES vſed then, and that trayned his ſouldiers,that they durſt fight with the enemy. For their death,I neither commend the one nor the other,and the ſtrangenes of either of their deaths doth grieue me maruellouſly: as I do greatly wonder alſo, how Hanniball in ſo many battels as he fought(which are innumerable) could alwaies ſcape vnhurt. I can not but greatly commend alſo the valiantnes of one Chryſantas,whom Xenephon ſpeaketh of in his booke of the inſtitution of Cyrus,ſaying: that he hauing lift vp his ſword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, and hearing the trumpet ſound the retreate,he ſoftly retired,and would not ſtrike him. Howbeit it ſeemeth Pelopidas is more to be excuſed: for beſide he was very hot and deſirous of battell, yet his anger was honorable and iuſt, and moued him to ſeeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides ſaieth:

The beſt that may betide, is when a captaine liues,
and doth ſuruiue the victories, which he with force atchieues,
But if he needs muſt fall, then let him valiauntly
euen thruſt amid the thickeſt throng, and there with honor die.

For ſo becōmeth his death famous,& not diſhonorable. But now,beſides Pelopidas iuſt cauſe of anger,yet was there another reſpect that moſt pricked him forward,to do that he did: for he ſaw his victory ended,in the death of the tyraunt. Otherwiſe he ſhould hardly haue found ſo noble an occaſion to haue ſhewed his valiantnes,as in that. And Marcellus contrarily,without any inſtant neceſſity, and hauing no cauſe of heate or choller,(which putteth al men valiant in fight beſides them ſelues, that they know not what they do) did raſhly and vnaduiſedly, thruſt himſelf into the middeſt of the danger, where he died not as a general, but as a light horſeman and skout, (forſaking his three triumphes, his fiue Conſullſhips, and his ſpoiles and tokens of triumph, which he had gotten of kings with his owne handes) among venturous SPANIARDS and NVMIDIANS, that ſold their bloud and liues for pay vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: ſo that I imagine they were angry with them ſelues (as a man would ſay) for ſo great and happy a victory, to haue ſlaine amongeſt FREGELLANIANS skouts, and light horſemen, the nobleſt and worthieſt perſon of the ROMAINES. I would no man ſhould thinke I ſpeake this in reproch of the memory of theſe two famous men, but as a grieſe only of them and their valiantnes: which they emploied ſo, as they blemiſhed all their other vertues, by the vndiſcrete hazarding of their perſons and liues without cauſe, as if they would and ſhould haue died for them ſelues, and not rather for their countrey and friends. And alſo when they were dead, Pelopidas was buried by the allies and confederates of the city of THEBES, for whoſe cauſe he was ſlaine: and Marcellus in like manner, by the enemies ſelues that had ſlaine him. And ſure the one is a happy thing, and to be wiſhed for in ſuch a caſe: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondered at. That the enemy him ſelfe ſhould honour his valiantneſſe and worthines that hurt him, more then the office of friendſhip performed by a thankfull friend. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honor his dead enemy, then the admiration of his worthineſſe: and the friend ſheweth friendſhip many time, rather for reſpect of the benefits he hath receiued, then for the loue he beareth to his vertue.

Ariſtides.

ARiſtides the ſon of Lyſimachus, was certainly of the tribe of Antiochides, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goods and wealth, they diuerſly write of him. For ſome ſay, he liued poorly all the daies of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reaſon of their pouerty, liued vnmaried many yeares after their fathers death. And many of the oldeſt writers do confirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary: that he knew certaine lands Ariſtides had in the village of PHALERIA, which

which did yet beare the name of Ariſtides landes, in the which his bodie is buried. And furthermore, to ſhewe that hee was well to liue, and that his houſe was rich and wealthie, he bringeth foorth theſe proofes. Firſt, that he was one yeare Maior or prouoſt of ATHENS, whom they called, Archon Eponymos, becauſe the yeare tooke the name of him that had it yearely. And they ſay he came to it, by drawing of the beane, according to the auncient vſe of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their election of the ſaid office: In which election none were admitted to drawe the beane, but ſuch as were higheſt ſet in their ſubſidie bookes, according to the value & rate of their goods, whom they called at ATHENS, pentacoſiomedimnes, as you would ſay, thoſe that might deſpend fiue hundred buſhels of wheat by the yeare, and vpwards. Secondly, he alleageth he was baniſhed by the Oſtraciſmon, which baniſheth the nobilitie and great rich men onely, whom the common people enuie, becauſe of their greatneſſe, and neuer dealeth with poore men. The third and laſt reaſon he makes is, that he left of his gift, three footed ſtooles in the temple of Bacchus, which thoſe do commonly offer vp, as haue won the victorie in comedies, tragedies, or other ſuch like paſtimes, whereof they themſelues had borne the charge. And thoſe threefooted ſtooles remaine there yet, which they ſay were giuen by Ariſtides, and haue this inſcription vpon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Ariſtides, defraied the charges of the games, and Archeſtratus the Poet taught them to play his comedies. This laſt reaſon, though it ſeeme likelieſt of them all, yet is it the weakeſt of the reſt. For Epaminondas (whom euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwaies liued in great pouertie) and P*lato* the Philoſopher, tooke vpon him to defray the charges of games that were of no ſmall expence, the one hauing borne the charges of flute plaiers at THEBES, and the other the daunce of the children which daunced in a round at ATHENS: towardes the furniſhing of which charges Dion the SYRACVSAN gaue P*lato* money, & P*elopidas* alſo gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not ſpoken that vertuous men ſhould alwaies refuſe the gifts of their friends, and that they might not in ſome ſort accept their friends courteſie offered them: but becauſe they ſhould thinke it vncomely and diſhonorable for them, to take any thing to enrich themſelues, or to ſpare and horde vp. Howbeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike ſhew to be made, not tending to their priuate benefite: in ſuch a caſe they ſhould not refuſe their friendes louing offer, and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius ſaith the three footed ſtoole was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, P*anætius* declareth plainely, that Demetrius was deceaued by the ſemblance of the name. For ſince the time of the warres of the MEDES, vnto the beginning of the warre of PELOPONNESVS, in all the regiſters and recordes kept of the defraiers of the charges of common playes, there were founde but two men bearing name of Ariſtides that obtained victory: & neither of them both was ſonne vnto Lyſimachus, whom we write of at this preſent. For the one is expreſſely named the ſonne of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the ſame Ariſtides we now ſpeake of: as appeareth eaſily by the writing and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we haue vſed in GRECE euer ſince Euclides time. Moreouer it is eaſie to be knowen, by the name of the Poet Archeſtratus that is adioyned to it. For there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the warres of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, many doe put him in for an author and maker of rimes and ſonges that were ſung in common daunces. Yet for all P*anætius* obiections, the matter is to be better looked into, and conſidered of. But for the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment, it is true, that ſuch as were great men in eſtimation aboue the common people, either in fame, nobilitie, or eloquence, they onely were ſubiect vnto this baniſhment. For Damon himſelfe, being P*ericles* ſchoolemaſter, was baniſhed: onely becauſe the common people thought him too wiſe. Moreouer, Idomeneus writeth, that Ariſtides was their prouoſt for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voices of the ATHENIANS that choſe him. And if he were prouoſt ſince the iorney of PLATEES, as Demetrius writeth: it is likely enough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable ſeruice, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defend Ariſtides, but alſo Socrates pouertie, as if it were a foule vice and reproch to be poore. For he writeth, that he had not only a houſe of his owne, but alſo threeſcore and ten Minas at vſurie, which Criton gaue him intereſt for. But now to our ſtory again. Ariſtides was Cliſthenes very friend, he that reſtored the gouernment at ATHENS after the expulſion of the thirty tyrantes, and did reuerence Lycurgus the Lawmaker of the LACEDÆMONIANS for his lawes, aboue all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauored the ſtate of Ariſtocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the ſoueraignty. Howbeit he euer had Themiſtocles (Neocles ſonne) his continuall aduerſarie, as taking part with the contrarie, and defending the popular ſtate of gouernement. Some ſay, that being ſchollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were it in ſport, or in matters of earneſt: and euer after, men beganne to ſee the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrary affections. For Themiſtocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and ſubtill, and would venter on any thing vpon light occaſion. Ariſtides contrariwiſe was very quiet, temperate, conſtant and maruellous well ſtaied, who would for no reſpect be drawen away from equitie and iuſtice, neither would lie, flatter, nor abuſe any bodie, though it were but in ſport. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtõ of CHIO writeth, that their malice beganne firſt of light loue, and that it grew to greatneſſe by proceſſe of time betwene them: for (ſaith he) both the one and the other of them fell in loue with Steſileus, borne in the Ile of CEOS. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not eaſily from them, nor the enuie they conceiued one againſt another, but continued againſt each other in matters of ſtate: ſuch was their malice towardes one another. In which calling, Themiſtocles ſought the way to winne friendes, by whoſe meanes he came to great preferment in ſhort time, and had made himſelfe very ſtrong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the citie of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall. The goddes forbid (quoth he) I ſhould euer occupie the place of a gouernour, where my friends ſhould not finde more fauour then ſtraungers, that doe me no pleaſure. But Ariſtides taking another courſe by himſelfe, would not ſtand vpon his friendes in gouernment. Firſt, becauſe he would do no man wrong, with pleaſuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requeſtes. Secondly, becauſe he ſaw many rulers and men of authoritie bold to doe iniuſtice, and manifeſt wrong, bearing themſelues vpon their friendes: but he caried this opinion, that no honeſt man, or good citizen, ſhould truſt to any bolſtring of friends, but to his owne iuſt and vpright doings. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtides perceiuing that Themiſtocles did raſhly alter many things, and euer encountered all his waies, and hindered his doings: he was enforced ſometime to croſſe Themiſtocles againe, and to ſpeake againſt that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but moſt to hinder his credite and authoritie, which increaſed ſtill through the peoples fauour and goodwils towards him: thinking it better by contrarying him a litle to diſappoint ſomtime a thing that might haue fallen out well for the common wealth, rather then by giuing him the head, to ſuffer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themiſtocles hauing preferred a matter very profitable for the common wealth, Ariſtides was ſo much againſt it, as Themiſticles purpoſe tooke no place. Moreouer Ariſtides was ſo earneſt againſt him, that when the counſell brake vp after Themiſtocles motion was reiected, he ſpake it openly before them all: that the common wealth of ATHENS would neuer proſper, vntill they both were laide in Barathrum, which was a priſon or hole, wherein they put all theeues and condemned men. An other time, Ariſtides moued a matter to the people, which diuerſe were againſt, but yet it went with him. And when the iudge or preſident of the counſell did put it to the people, to know their allowance of it: Ariſtides perceiuing by the arguments made againſt it, that the matter he preferred was hurtfull to the common wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not haue it paſſe. Manie times alſo Ariſtides ſpake by other men, when he would haue a thing goe forward, for feare leaſt Themiſtocles ſpight towardes him, would hinder the benefite of the common wealth. They found him very conſtant and reſolute in matters of ſtate, whatſoeuer happened: which wanne him great commendation. For he was neuer the prouder for any honour they gaue him; nor thought himſelfe diſgraced for any ouerthrow he receiued: being alwaies of this minde, that it was the dutie of an honeſt citizen, to be euer readie to offer his bodie and life to do his countrie ſeruice, without reſpect and hope of reward of money, or for honor and glory. Therefore when certaine verſes were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of

All the people ſtraight caſt their eyes vpon Ariſtides, as vpon him, that in truth aboue all other moſt deſerued the praiſe of ſo great a vertue. For he was ſo ſtout and reſolute, not only to reſiſt fauour and friendſhip: but to reiect hate and anger alſo. For in caſe of iuſtice, neither could friendſhippe make him go away for his friends ſake: nor enuie could moue him to doe iniuſtice, to his very enemie. For proofe hereof it is written, that he had an enemie of his in ſute of law, and did proſecute it to iudgement: inſomuch as after the plaint was read, the iudges were ſo angrie with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would haue giuen ſentence againſt him. But Ariſtides riſing from his place, went and kneeled at the iudges feete with the offendor his enemie, and beſought them to giue him leaue to ſpeake, to iuſtifie and defende his cauſe, according to the courſe of the law. An other time he being iudge betwene two priuate men that pleaded before him, one of them ſaid vnto him: Ariſtides, this fellow mine aduerſarie here, hath done you great iniurie. My friend (quoth Ariſtides againe) I pray thee tell me onely the iniurie he hath done thee, for I am iudge here to do thee right, and not my ſelfe. Moreouer, he being choſen high treaſurer of all the reuenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the officers before him, and other his late predeceſſors, had greatly robbed and ſpoiled the common treaſure, but ſpecially Themiſtocles: who was a wiſe man, & of great iudgement, but yet ſomewhat light fingered. Therefore when Ariſtides was to giue vppe his account, Themiſtocles, and many other ſuborned by him, were againſt him, and accuſed him for abuſing his office, and followed him ſo hard, that through their practiſe they condemned him, as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the nobleſt citizens ſeeing what iniurie they offered Ariſtides, tooke his cauſe in hande, and found meanes to procure the people not onely to releaſe the fine impoſed vpon him, but to reſtore him againe to his office of high treaſurer for the yeare following: in the which he ſeemed to repent his former ſtraightneſſe and gouernement the yeare before, and ſo dealt more fauourably with thoſe he had to doe, and would not examine euery thing ſo ſtraightly as he did before. VVhereupon ſuch as were theeues and ſtealers of the treaſure of the common wealth, did maruellouſly praiſe and like him, and became ſuters for him to continue in the office. But whẽ the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS would chooſe him againe, Ariſtides ſelfe reproued them, and ſaid. VVhen I faithfully diſcharged the dutie of mine office committed to me by you, I then receiued ſhame and reproch at your handes: and now that I haue diſſembled, not ſeeming to ſee the theftes and robberies done vpon your treaſure, ye claw me, and ſay I am an honeſt man, and a good citizen. But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more aſhamed of the honour you do me now, then I was of the fine you did ſet vpon me, when you condemned me the laſt yeare: and I am ſorie to ſpeake it, that you ſhould thinke it more commendation to pleaſure the wicked, then to preſerue the common wealth. After he had ſpoken theſe words, and had bewrayed the common thefts the officers of the citie did commit: he ſtopped the theeues mouthes that ſo highly praiſed and commended him for ſo honeſt a man; but yet of the noble and honeſt citizens he was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of PERSIA, was come with all his nauie to go a land about MARATHON, in the country of ATTICA, vpon pretence (as he ſaid) to be reuenged only of the ATHENIANS that had burnt the citie of SARDIS, but indeede of mind to conquer all GRECE, and to deſtroy the whole countrie before him: the ATHENIANS choſe tenne Captaines to go to the warres, among whom Miltiades was the chiefeſt man of authoritie. But Ariſtides drew very neere him in reputation and credite, becauſe he did very good ſeruice in obtaining the victorie, ſpecially when he agreed with Miltiades in counſell, to giue battell vpon the barbarous people: and alſo when he willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the armie. For euery one of the ten Captaines did by turnes leade the whole armie for one whole day: and when Ariſtides turne came about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no ſhame, but honour for them to be ruled by the wiſeſt. Thus by his example, he appeaſed all ſtrife that might haue growen among them, and perſwaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counſell, that had beſt experience in warre. And ſo he did much aduance Miltiades honor. For after that Ariſtides had once yeelded his authoritie vnto him, euery one of the reſt did the like when it came to their turne: and ſo they all ſubmitted themſelues vnto his rule and leading. But on the day of the battell, the place where the ATHENIANS were moſt combred, was in the middeſt of the battell, where they had ſet the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, and made their greateſt fight in that place. By which occaſion, Themiſtocles and Ariſtides fighting one hard by an other, for that the one was of the tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one another: ſo as the barbarous people at the laſt being ouerthrowen, they made them flie, and draue them to their ſhippes. But when they were imbarked & gone, the Captaines of the ATHENIANS perceiuing they made not towardes the Iles which was their direct courſe to returne into ASIA, but that they were driuen backe by ſtorme of winde and pyrries of the ſea, towardes the coaſt of ATTICA, and the citie of ATHENS, fearing leaſt they might find ATHENS vnfurniſhed for defence, and might ſet vpon it: they thereuppon ſent away preſently nine tribes that marched thither with ſuch ſpeede, as they came to ATHENS the very ſame day, and left Ariſtides in the campe at MARATHON, with his tribe and countrie men, to looke to the priſoners and ſpoyle they had wonne of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceiued the opinion they had of his wiſdom. For notwithſtanding there was great ſtore of gold and ſiluer, much apparell, moueables, and other infinite goods and riches in all their tentes and pauillions, and in the ſhippes alſo they had taken of theirs: he was not ſo couetous as once to touch them, nor to ſuffer any other to meddle with them, vnleſſe by ſtealth ſome prouided for themſelues. As amongeſt other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres Prieſtes, called Dadouchos, as you would ſay the torch bearer: (for in the ſecret ſacrifices of Ceres, his office was to holde the torch) whom when one of the barbarous people ſaw, and how he ware a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke him for ſome king, and falling on his knees at his feete, kiſſed his hand, and ſhewed him great ſtore of golde he had hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a moſt cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth, tooke away the gold, and killed the poore ſoule that had ſhewed him the place, becauſe hee ſhould not tell it to others. Hereof it commeth, that the comicall Poets do call thoſe that came of him in mockerie, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a ditch: becauſe of the golde that Callias found in it. Immediatly after this battell, Ariſtides was choſen prouoſt of ATHENS for the yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a litle before his death, after the iorney of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they ſet in order their prouoſts of ATHENS for the yere, ſince Xanthippides time, there appeareth no one name of Ariſtides in that yeare, that Mardonius the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant was ouerthrowen by PLATEES, which was many yeares after. But contrariwiſe they find Ariſtides, enrolled among the prouoſtes immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did moſt commende Ariſtides iuſtice, as of all other his vertues and qualities: becauſe that vertue is moſt common & in vſe in our life, and deliuereth moſt benefite to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man, obteined the worthieſt name that one could haue, to be called by the whole citie, a iuſt man. This ſurname was neuer deſired of kings, princes, nor of tyrantes, but they alwaies delighted to be ſurnamed, ſome Poliorcetes, to ſay, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to ſay, lightning or terrible: other Nicanores, to ſay, ſubduers: and ſome other, Aeti and Hieraces, to ſay Eagles or Faulcons, or ſuch like birdes that prey: deſiring rather (as it ſhould appeare by thoſe ſurnames) the praiſe and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that riſeth by vertue and goodneſſe. And notwithſtanding, God whom men deſire moſt to be likened to, doth excell all humaine nature in three ſpeciall things: in immortalitie, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the moſt honorable and precious thing. For as the natural Philoſophers reaſon, all the foure elements and Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and ſo are force and power, earthquakes, lightning, terrible ſtormes, running riuers, and inundations of

waters: but as for iuſtice and equitie, no man is partaker of them, ſaue only God, by meanes of reaſon and vnderſtanding. Therefore, becauſe men commonly haue three ſundry honors to the gods: the firſt, that they thinke them bleſſed: the ſecond, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleſſed, for the eternitie and immortalitie of their godhead: that they feare them, becauſe of their omnipotencie and power: and that they loue and worſhip them, for their iuſtice and equitie. And yet notwithſtanding, of thoſe three, men doe couet immortalitie, which no fleſh can attaine vnto: and alſo power, which dependeth moſt vpon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the goddes of their goodneſſe haue made vs capable. But here they ſhew them ſelues fooles. For iuſtice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authoritie, ſeeme diuine and celeſtiall: where without iuſtice and dealing vniuſtly, his life is moſt beaſtly, and odious to the world. But now againe to Ariſtides. This ſurname of a iuſt man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwardes it turned him to great ill will, and ſpecially by Themiſtocles practiſe. Who gaue it out euery where, that Ariſtides had ouerthrowen all iuſtice, becauſe by conſent of the parties he was euer choſen Arbitrator to end all controuerſies: and how by this meanes he ſecretly had procured the abſolute power of a king, not needing any guard or ſouldiers about him. The people moreouer being growen very diſſolute and licentious, by reaſon of the victorie of MARATHON, who ſought that all thinges ſhould paſſe by them, and their authoritie: beganne now to miſlike, and to be greatly offended, that any priuate man ſhould go before the reſt in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all ſhires of ATTICA into the citie of ATHENS, and ſo baniſhed Ariſtides with the Oſtraciſmon: diſguiſing the enuie they bare to his glory with the name of feare of tyrannie. For this manner of baniſhment called Oſtraciſmon, or Exoſtraciſmon, was no ordinarie puniſhment for any fault or offence committed: but to giue it an honeſt cloke, they ſaide it was onely a pulling downe and tying ſhort, of too much greatneſſe and authoritie, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular ſtate. But to tell you truely, it was none otherwiſe, then a gentle mean to qualifie the peoples enuy againſt ſome priuate perſon: which enuy bred no malice to him whoſe greatneſſe did offend them, but onely tended to the baniſhing of him for tenne yeares. But afterwardes that by practiſe, this Oſtraciſmon baniſhment was laide vpon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the laſt man ſo baniſhed: they neuer after vſed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way, it ſhall not be amiſſe to tell you here, why and wherfore this Hyperbolus was baniſhed. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefeſt men of ATHENS at that time, and they both were euer at ſquare together, a common thing amongeſt great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples aſſembling, that they went about to execute the Oſtraciſmon, were maruellouſly affraid it was ment to baniſh one of them: wherfore they ſpake together, and made both their followers friends with ech other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, inſomuch, when the moſt voyces of the people were gathered to condemne him that ſhould be baniſhed, they found it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to ſee the Oſtraciſmon ſo embaſed and ſcorned, that they neuer after would vſe it againe, and ſo left it off for euer. But briefely to let you vnderſtande what the Oſtraciſmon was, and after what ſort they vſed it, ye are to know: that at a certaine day appointed, euery citizen caried a great ſhell in his hande, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would haue baniſhed, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with wodden barres in the market place. Then, when euery man had brought in his ſhell: the magiſtrates and officers of the citie, did count and tell the number of them. For if there were leſſe then ſixe thouſand citizens, that had thus brought theſe ſhels together: the Oſtraciſmon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid a part euery mans name written in theſe ſhels: and whoſe name they found written by moſt citizens, they proclaimed him by ſound of trumpet, a baniſhed man for tenne yeares, during which time notwithſtanding, the partie did enioy all his goods. Now euery man writing thus his name in a ſhell, whom they would haue baniſhed: it is reported there was a plaine man of the country (very ſimple) that could neither write nor read, who came to Ariſtides (being the firſt man he met with) & gaue him his ſhell, praying him to write Ariſtides name vpon it. He being abaſhed withall, did aſke the country man, if Ariſtides had euer done him any diſpleaſure. No, ſaid the country man, he neuer did me hurt, not I know him not: but it greeues me to heare euery man call him a iuſt man. Ariſtides hearing him ſay ſo, gaue him no anſwere, but wrote his owne name vpon the ſhell, and deliuered it againe to the country man. But as he went his way out of the citie, he lift vppe his handes to heauen, and made a prayer contrarie to that of Achilles in Homer, beſeeching the goddes that the ATHENIANS might neuer haue ſuch troubles in hande, as they ſhould be compelled to call for Ariſtides againe. Notwithſtanding, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of PERSIA came with his armie through the countries of THESSALY & BOEOTIA, and entred into the heart of the country of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS reuoking the law of their Oſtraciſmon, called home againe all thoſe they had baniſhed, and ſpecially, becauſe they were afraid Ariſtides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example ſhould moue many other to doe the like, wherein they were greatly deceiued in the nature of the man. For before that he was called home, he continually trauelled vp and downe, perſwading and incouraging the GRECIANS to maintaine and defend their libertie. After that lawe was repealed, and publiſhed, and that Themiſtocles was choſen the onely Lieutenant generall of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aide and aſſiſt him in all things, as well with his trauell, as alſo with his counſell: and thereby wanne his enemie great honour, becauſe it ſtood vpon the ſafetie and preſeruation of his countrie. For when Eurybiades, generall of the armie of the GRÆCIANS, had determined to forſake the Ile of SALAMINA, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middeſt of the ſeas, and had enuironed the Iles all about, & the mouth of the arme of the ſtraight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus incloſed in: Ariſtides departing out of the Ile of AEgina with a maruellous boldneſſe, ventred through the middeſt of all the barbarous ſhippes and fleete, and by good happe gotte in the night into Themiſtocles tent, and calling him out, ſpake with him there in this ſort. Themiſtocles, if we be both wiſe, it is high time we ſhould now leaue off this vaine enuy and ſpight we haue long time borne each other, and that wee ſhould enter into another ſort of enuie more honorable and profitable for vs both. I meane, which of vs two ſhould doe his beſt indeuour to ſaue GRECE: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counſelling you for the beſt, and executing your commaundement: conſidering you are the man alone that will roundlieſt come vnto the point that is beſt: which is in my opinion, that we ſhould hazard battell by ſea within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, and that aſſoone as might be poſſible. But if our friendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do aſſure you your enemies do helpe it forwarde. For it is ſaid, that the ſea both before and behinde vs, and round about vs, is couered all ouer with their ſhippes, ſo as they that would not before, ſhall be now compelled of force, and in ſpight of their hearts, to fight and beſtirre them like men: becauſe they are compaſſed in all about, and there is no paſſage left open for them to eſcape, nor to flie. Whereunto Themiſtocles aunſwered. I am ſorie, Ariſtides, that herein your honeſtie appeareth greater then mine: but ſince it is ſo, that you haue deſerued the honor in beginning, and procuring ſuch an honorable and commendable ſtrife betwene vs, I will henceforth indeuour my ſelfe to exceede you in continuing this your deſire. After which anſwere, he told Ariſtides, how he purpoſed to mocke the barbarous king, and praied him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his deuiſe, & to perſwade him that there was no other way to ſaue GRECE, but to fight by ſea: for Eurybiades gaue more credite to Ariſtides perſwaſions, then he did to Themiſtocles wordes. For when all the Captaines were called to counſell, to determine whether they ſhould giue battell or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN ſaid to Themiſtocles, that his counſell did not like Ariſtides at all as it ſeemed, becauſe he ſpake neuer a worde to it being preſent. Ariſtides anſwered him ſtraight, that he vtterly miſtooke him. For, quoth he, if I did not thinke his counſell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, not for any good will I beare him, but becauſe I find his counſell wiſe & ſound. While the Captaines of the GRECIANS were reaſoning in this ſort, Ariſtides ſeeing PSYTTALEA (a litle Iland before SALAMINA within the ſtraight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valianteſt and luſtieſt ſouldiers he had of all his countrie men, into the leaſt foyſtes or pinnaſies he had among all his gallies: and went with them, and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he found there, and put them to the ſword euerie man, taking the chiefeſt of them onely priſoners, amōg which, were three ſonnes of Sandauce, the kings ſiſter, whom he ſent vnto Themiſtocles. Theſe three Lordes were all ſlaine by the commaundement of Euphrantidas the ſoothſayer, and ſacrificed to Bacchus Omeſtes, as to ſay, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw fleſh, and all vpon an oracle they had receiued. That done, Ariſtides diſperſed his ſouldiers about the Ile, to receaue all ſuch as were by fortune of warre, or of the ſea, caſt into the Iland: to the end that no enemy of theirs ſhould ſcape their hands, nor any of his friends ſhould periſh. For the greateſt fleete of all their ſhips, and the ſharpeſt encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Iland: and therefore the tokens of triumph were ſet there. After the battell was wonne, Themiſtocles to feele Ariſtides opinion, ſayd vnto him: we haue done a good peece of ſeruice, but yet there is an other behind of greater importance, and that is this. We muſt bring all ASIA into EVROPE, which we may eaſily do, if we ſayle with all ſpeed to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Ariſtides cried out, ſtay there, neuer ſpeake of that: but I pray you let vs rather ſeeke all the wayes we can, how to driue this barbarous king out of GRECE, leaſt if we keepe him in ſtill with ſo great an army (& he ſhall ſee no way before him to eſcape out) we driue him then to fight like a deſperate man, and perill our ſelues, we can not tell to what. When Themiſtocles had heard his opinion, he ſecretly ſent the eunuke Arnaces his priſoner, vnto king Xerxes, to aduertiſe him from him, that he had altered the GRECIANS purpoſe, which was fully bent to haue broken vp the bridge he had made at the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to paſſe ouer his armie: and that he was the willinger to let him vnderſtand it, that he might the better prouide for the ſafety of his perſon. King Xerxes being netled with this aduertiſement, tooke ſtraight his iourney, and with all ſpeed went to recouer the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, & left Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in GRECE, with three hundred thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers of his armie. This Mardonius was maruellouſly dreaded of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderfull great armie he had by land, and he did threaten them alſo by his letters he wrote vnto them. You haue, (ſayd he) with your ſhips by ſea, ouercome men acquainted to fight by land, and that neuer handled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fieldes of BOEOTIA, are very fayre and large for horſemen and footemen to make proofe of their valiantneſſe, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the king his maiſters commaundement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build vp their citie againe, to giue them a great penſion, and furthermore to make them Lordes of all GRECE, ſo they would giue ouer, and leaue off theſe warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS being forthwith aduertiſed of his letters written to the ATHENIANS, and fearing leaſt they would haue bene perſwaded by them: ſent their Ambaſſadours with all ſpeed to ATHENS, to pray them to ſend their wiues & children vnto SPARTA, and alſo to offer them victuals, to relieue their poore old people, becauſe of the great ſcarcitie that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt & raſed, and all their country beſides deſtroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the offers of the Ambaſſadours of LACEDÆMON, made them a maruellous aunſwere through Ariſtides counſell, & this it was. That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all things were to be ſold for gold & ſiluer, becauſe they eſteemed nothing more pretious, nor better in this world, then to be rich & wealthy: but on the other ſide, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they onely regarded the preſent pouerty & neceſsity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue & noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preſeruation of GRECE, by offering them victuals to liue withall. The people approuing this aunſwere. Ariſtides then cauſed the Ambaſſadours of SPARTA to come to the aſſembly, and commaunded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the gold aboue, or vnder the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any ſumme of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of GRECE: and to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he ſhewed him the ſunne, and ſayd vnto him: ſo long as yonder ſunne keepeth his courſe about the world, ſo long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies vnto the PERSIANS, becauſe they haue ſpoiled and deſtroyed all their country, and haue defiled and burnt the temples of their gods. Beſides, he willed that the Prieſts, by commaundement of the people, ſhould excommunicate and curſe him that would procure them to ſend vnto the Persians to make peace with them, and to breake their league and alliance with the other Grecians. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the ſecond time to ouerrunne the country of Attica: the Athenians got them againe into the Ile of Salamina, and then they ſent Ariſtides Ambaſſadour vnto the Lacedæmonians. He ſharpely tooke them vp, and reproued their ſloth and negligence, becauſe they had againe forſaken Athens, & left it to the ſpoile of the barbarous people: & prayed them yet they would looke to ſaue the reſt of Greece. The Ephori (which were certaine officers that ruled all things within the citie of Sparta) when they had heard Ariſtides perſwaſions: ſtraight tooke order for aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheare, keeping that day one of their ſolemne feaſtes they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they ſent out fiue thouſand citizens borne in Sparta, into the field, all proper men and valiant ſouldiers, euery one of them carying with him ſeuen Ilotes (which are the coũtry men & ſlaues in the coũtrey of Lacedæmonia) not making the Ambaſſadours of Athens priuie to it at all. Wherefore Ariſtides came againe an other time into their counſell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and ſayd he dreamed, or elſe he mocked them: for their armie which they had ſent againſt the ſtraungers (for ſo they called the Persians) was already at the citie of Orestion in Arcadia. Ariſtides hearing their aunſwere, replyed, that they were to blame to mocke them in that ſort, to ſend away their men ſo ſecretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceiue their friends, but their enemies rather. Idomeneus in his ſtory reporteth the matter thus in euery point. Notwithſtanding, in the decree that was made to ſend Ambaſſadours to Sparta, Ariſtides is not named for Ambaſſadour, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Myronides. Afterwardes Ariſtides was choſen by voyces of the people, Lieutenant generall of the army of Athens, in this warre againſt the Persians, and went vnto the camp of the Grecians by the citie of Platæes, with eight thouſand footemen well armed & appointed. There he found king P*auſanias* the onely generall of all the whole power and army of the Grecians, who brought with him the force of Sparta: and there came daily into his camp one after an other, a maruellous great multitude of other Grecians. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incãped all alongeſt the riuer of Asopus: but becauſe their camp ſtretched out a maruellous way in length, they were not intrenched at all, but had onely fortified a peece of ground foure ſquare with a wall about, which was ten furlongs on euery ſide, to place all their cariage and chiefeſt things in. And for the Grecians againe, the ſoothſayer Tiſamenus, borne in the city of Elide, had told P*auſanias*, and all the Grecians together, that they ſhould haue the victory, ſo they did not aſſault at all, but onely defend. And Ariſtides, that had ſent to the oracle of Apollo at Delphes, in the name of the Athenians, had aunſwer: they ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo they did ſacrifice and make ſpeciall prayers, vnto Iupiter and Iuno of mount Cithæron, vnto P*an*, & vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, & alſo vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, P*iſander*, Damocrates, Hypſion, Actæon, & P*olyidus*: and ſo that they did hazard battell alſo within their own territories, and in the plaine of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of P*roſerpina*. This oracle troubled Ariſtides maruellouſly, becauſe the demy gods whom they had commaundement to do ſacrifice vnto, were the founders and aunceſters of the Platæians: and the caue of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the tops of mount Cithæron, looking towardes the weſt, where the ſunne ſetteth in ſommer. They ſay there was an oracle there in old time, whoſe ſpirit poſſeſſed many inhabitants there abouts, and beſtraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called thoſe ſo poſſeſſed, Nympholepty, as who would ſay, taken with the Nymphes. And againe to tell the Athenians they ſhould haue the victory, ſo they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleuſinian, and within their owne territorie: it was euen to ſend them backe againe into the coũtry of Attica. Ariſtides being thus perplexed, Arimneſtus Captaine of the Platæians, had ſuch a viſion in the night in his ſleepe. Him thought that Iupiter the ſauiour did appeare vnto him, and asked him what the Grecians intended to do? and that he aunſwered:

my Lord, we muſt to morrow remoue our camp into the territories of Elevsin, and there we will fight with the barbarous people, according to the commaundement the oracle Apollo hath giuen vs. Then that Iupiter replyed, that they were greatly deceaued: for all that Apollo had declared by his oracle was ment within the territorie of the Platæians, and that they ſhould finde it true, if they conſidered it well. Arimneſtus hauing plainly ſeene this viſion in his ſleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he ſtraight ſent for the oldeſt citizens, and conſidering with them where this place ſhould be, he found at the length, that at the foote of mount Cithæron, by the citie of Nysia, there was an old temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of her daughter Proſerpina. When he heard them ſay ſo, he went ſtraight and told Ariſtides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to ſet an army in battell ray, that had but few horſemen: for that the foote of mount Cithæron did let the horſemen, they could not go to the place where the temple ſtoode, and where the plaine and valley did end: beſides alſo, that the chappell of Androcrates was euen in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wood round about it. And becauſe they ſhould lacke nothing to hinder the expreſſe commaundement of the oracle for hope of victorie: the Platæians (through Arimneſtus counſell and aduiſe) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of Platæes ſhould be taken away towards Athens ſide, and that the land thereof ſhould be giuen clearely vnto the Athenians, becauſe they ſhould fight with the barbarous people in their owne land, for the defence and preſeruation of Grece, according to the commaundement of the oracle. This noble gift and preſent of the Platæians was ſo famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great hauing conquered the Empire of Asia, built vp the walles againe of the citie Platæes, and when he had done, made a herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympicall, that Alexander had done the Platæians that honour & dignitie, for a memoriall & honour of their magnanimity. Becauſe in the warre againſt the Persians, they had freely and liberally giuen away their land vnto the Athenians, for the ſafetie of the Grecians: and had ſhewed themſelues of a noble courage alſo, and verie willing to defend the ſtate of Grece. Now when the armie of the Grecians came to be ſet in order of battell, there fell a ſtrife betweene the Athenians & the Tegeates, becauſe the Athenians would needes (according to their old cuſtome) haue the left wing of the battell, if the Lacedæmonians had the right wing: and the Tegeates on the contrary part, would haue the preheminence before the Athenians, alledging the famous actes and notable ſeruice of their aunceſters in former warres, whereupon the Athenians did mutine. But Ariſtides ſtept betweene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the Tegeates about their nobilitie and valiantneſſe: and as for you, my Lordes of Sparta, ſayd he, and you alſo my maiſters of Grece: we tell you, that the place neither giueth nor taketh vertue away, and we do aſſure you that whereſoeuer you place vs, we will ſo defend & keepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemiſh the honour we haue wonne in former foughten battels, and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to bragge of our aunceſters doings, but to ſhew our ſelues valiant in defence of all Grece. For this battell will make good proofe to all the Grecians, how much eſtimation euery citie, euery Captaine, & particular perſon will deſerue for his part. When Ariſtides had ſpoken, the Captaines & all other of the cōſell concluded in fauour of the Athenians, that they ſhould haue one of the wings of the battell. But by this meanes, all Grece ſtood in maruellous garboyle at that time, & the ſtate of the Athenians ſpecially in great daunger. For a nūber of the nobleſt citizēs of Athens, and that brought great ſubſtance with thē to the warres, being now at low ſtate, & in pouertie, their goods being ſpent and gone, and ſeeing themſelues diſcountenanced, not bearing that rule & authoritie in the commō wealth they were wont to do, becauſe other were called to authoritie, and preferred to the offices of the citie: they gathered together, and met at a houſe in the city of Platæes, & there conſpired to ouerthrow the authoritie of the people at Athens: and if they could not obtaine their purpoſe, then that they would rather looſe all, and betray their countrey vnto the barbarous people. While theſe thinges were practiſed in the camp, many being of the conſpiracie, Ariſtides came to an inckling of it, and was maruellouſly afrayed, becauſe of the time: wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter, being of ſuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderſtand the whole conſpiracy, litle knowing what a number might be drawẽ into this treaſon, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather reſpected that which was iuſt, then what was profitable for the time. So he cauſed eight perſons onely of the great number to be apprehended, and of theſe eight, the two firſt whom they would haue indited as principals, and were moſt to be burdened for the conſpiracy, AEſchines of the towne of LAMPRA, and Egeſias of the towne of ACHARNA, they found meanes to flie out of the camp, and to ſaue themſelues. And for the other Ariſtides ſet them at libertie, and gaue them occaſion that were not diſcouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: ſaying, that the battell ſhould be their iudge, where they ſhould purge themſelues of all accuſations layd againſt them, and ſhew the world alſo, that they neuer had any other intention but honeſt, & good, towards their countrey. Mardonius, to proue the courage of the GRECIANS, had ſent all his horſemen, (wherein he was farre ſtronger thẽ the GRECIANS) to skirmiſh with thẽ. Who were lodged at the foote of moũt CITHÆRON, in ſtrong places and full of ſtones, ſauing the three thouſand MEGARIANS, that camped in the plaine: by reaſon whereof, they were ſore troubled and hurt, by the horſemen of the barbarous people that ſet vpon them on euerie ſide, for they might charge them where they would. In ſomuch, in the end, perceiuing they alone could no longer reſiſt the force of ſo great a multitude of the barbarous people: they ſent with all ſpeed poſsible to Pauſanias, to pray him to ſend them preſent aide. Pauſanias hearing this newes, and ſeeing in his owne ſight the camp of the MEGARIANS almoſt all couered with ſhot and dartes which the barbarous people threw at them, & that they were compelled to ſtand cloſe together in a litle corner: he wiſt not what to do. For, to go thither in perſõ with the LACEDÆMONIANS that were footemen heauy armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them. So he proued to put ſome ambitious deſire and enuie of honour, among the priuate Captaines and generals of the army of the other GRECIANS, which were then about him: to ſee if he could moue any mans courage and deſire, to offer himſelfe willingly to go aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Ariſtides: who promiſed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the field, (one of the valianteſt Captaines that ſerued vnder him) with his company of three hundred choſen men, and certaine ſhot mingled amongeſt them. Theſe ſouldiers were ready in a moment, and marched ſtraight in battell ray, a great pace towards the barbarous people. Maſiſtius, that was generall of the horſemen of the PERSIANS, a goodly tall man, perceiuing their comming towards him: turned his horſe, and gallopped to them. The ATHENIANS taried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very hot, becauſe both the one and the other ſide did the beſt they could at this firſt onſet to put the reſt of the battell in ieopardy: and they fought ſo long, that Maſiſtius horſe was ſhot through the body with an arrow, that put him to ſuch paine, as he neuer lin flinging, till he caſt his maiſter on the groũd, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not riſe againe, as well for the waight of his armour, as for that the ATHENIANS came ſo ſodainly vpõ him. And notwithſtanding there were many about him to hew him in peeces, yet they could finde no way how to kill him, he was ſo throughly armed & loden with gold, copper, and iron, not onely vpon his body and his head, but alſo on his legs and armes: vntill at the length there was one that thruſt the head of his dart through his beuer, and ſo killed him. The PERSIANS perceiuing that, fled immediatly, & forſooke the body of their generall. Shortly after it appeared to the GRECIANS that they had ſped well at this skirmiſh, not becauſe they had ſlaine many enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous people made for the loſſe of Maſiſtius. For his death did ſo greeue them, that they powled themſelues, they clipped off their horſe & moyles haires, & filled beſides all the field there abouts with pityfull cries & ſhreekes, as thoſe that had loſt the valianteſt and chiefeſt man of authoritie of all their camp, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this firſt skirmiſh, both the one and the other ſide kept their camp, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the Soothſayers did promiſe both ſides the victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GRECIANS, ſo they did but onely defend: and contrarywiſe, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowen, that did aſſault. Maſiſtius ſlaine by the Athenians.

donius finding victuals waxed ſcant, & that they were ſtored but for few dayes, and moreouer how the GRECIANS daily grew ſtronger by continuall repayre to their camp, the longer he delayed: in the end he reſolued to tary no lõger, but to paſſe the riuer of ASOPVS the next morning by breake of the day, and ſodainly to ſet vpon the GRECIANS. So he gaue the Captaines warning the night before what they ſhould do, becauſe euery man ſhould be ready: but about midnight there came a horſeman without any noyſe at all, ſo neare to the GRECIANS camp, that he ſpake to the watch, and told them he would ſpeake with Ariſtides, generall of the ATHENIANS. Ariſtides was called for ſtraight, & when he came to him, the horſeman ſayd vnto Ariſtides, I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great good will I beare you, haue put my ſelfe in the greateſt daunger that may be, to come at this preſent time to aduertiſe you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will giue you battell: becauſe your enemies ſodaine cõming vpõ you, ſhould not make you afrayed, being ſodainly charged, & ſhould not hinder alſo your valiant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight: but onely ſcarcitie of victuals that forceth him to do it; conſidering that the Prognoſticatours are all againſt it that he ſhould giue you battell, both by reaſon of the ill tokens of their ſacrifices, as alſo by the aunſwers of their oracles, which hath put all the armie in a maruellous feare, and ſtand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at aduenture, or elſe if he will needes lye ſtill, to be ſtarued to death for veria famine. After king Alexander had imparted this ſecret to Ariſtides, he prayed him to keepe it to himſelfe, and to remember it in time to come. Ariſtides aunſwered him then, that it was no reaſon he ſhould keepe a matter of ſo great importance as that, from Pauſanias, who was their Lieutenant generall of the whole armie: notwithſtanding, he promiſed him he would tell it no man elſe before the battell, and that if the gods gaue the GRECIANS the victorie, he did aſſure him, they ſhould all acknowledge his great fauour and good will ſhewed vnto them. After they had talked thus together, king Alexander left him, and returned backe againe: and Ariſtides alſo went immediatly to P*auſanias* tent, and told him the talke king Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the priuate Captaines were ſent for ſtraight to counſell, and there order was giuen, that euery man ſhould haue his bandes ready, for they ſhould fight in the morning. So P*auſanias* at that time (as Herodotus writeth) ſayd vnto Ariſtides, that he would remoue the ATHENIANS from the left to the right wing, becauſe they ſhould haue the PERSIANS themſelues right before them, and that they ſhould fight ſo much the luſtier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as alſo, becauſe they had ouercomme them before in the firſt encounter: and that himſelfe would take the left wing of the battell, where he ſhould encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS ſide. But when all the other priuate Captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderſtood it, they were maruellous angry with P*auſanias*, and ſayd he did them wrong, and had no reaſon to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, and onely to remoue them, as if they were ſlaues, to be appointed at his pleaſure, now of the one ſide, then of the other, and to ſet them to fight with the valianteſt ſouldiers they had of all their enemies. Then ſayd Ariſtides to them, that they knew not what they ſayd, and how before they miſliked, and did ſtriue with the TEGEATES, onely for hauing the left wing of the battell, and when it was graunted, they thought themſelues greatly honored that they were preferred before them, by order of the Captaines: and now where the LACEDÆMONIANS were willing of themſelues to giue them the place of the right wing, and did in maner offer them the preheminence of the whole army: they do not thankefully take the honour offered them, nor yet do recken of the vantage and benefite giuen them to fight againſt the PERSIANS ſelues, their auncient enemies, & not againſt their naturall cõutry men auncientły deſcended of them. When Ariſtides had vſed all theſe perſwaſions vnto them, they were very well contented to chaunge place with the LACEDÆMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one an other, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came againſt them, had no better harts nor weapons, then thoſe whom they before had ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For ſayd they, they haue the ſame bowes, the ſame rich imbrodered gownes, the ſame golden chaines and carcanettes of womaniſh perſons, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint harts: where we haue alo the ſame weapons and bodies we had, & our harts more liuely & couragious thē before, through the ſundry victories we haue ſince gotten of them. Further, we haue this aduantage more. That we do not fight as our other confederates the GRECIANS do, for our citie and country onely, but alſo to continue the fame and renowme of our former noble ſeruice, which we wanne at the iourneys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the ende, the world ſhould not thinke that the glory of theſe triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto fortune, but vnto the courage and worthineſſe of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to chaũge the order of their battell in haſt. The THEBANS on the other ſide that tooke part with Mardonius, receiuing intelligence of the altering of their battell, by traytors that ranne betweene both campes: they ſtraight told Mardonius of it. He thereupon did ſodainly alſo chaunge the order of his battell, and placed the PERSIANS from the right wing to the left wing of his enemies: either becauſe he was afrayed of the ATHENIANS, or elſe for greater glory that he had a deſire to fight with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded the GRECIANS that tooke his part, that they ſhould fight againſt the ATHENIANS. This alteration was ſo openly done, that euery man might ſee it: whereupon Pauſanias remoued the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, and ſet them in the right wing. Mardonius ſeeing that, remoued the PERSIANS againe from the left wing, and brought them to the right wing (where they were before) againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and thus they conſumed all that day in chaunging their men to and fro. So the Captaines of the GRECIANS ſat in counſell at night, and there they agreed, that they muſt needes remoue their camp, and lodge in ſome other place where they might haue water at commaundement: becauſe their enemies did continually trouble and ſpoyle that water they had about them, with their horſes. Now when night came, the Captaines would haue marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the people went very ill willing to it, and they had much a do to keepe them together. For they were no ſooner out of the trenches and fortification of their camp, but the moſt part of them ranne to the citie of PLATÆES, and were maruellouſly out of order, diſperſing themſelues here and there, and ſet vp their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that taried behind, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was againſt their willes. For one of their Captaines called Amompharetus, a maruellous hardie man, that feared no daunger, and longed ſore for battell: he was in ſuch a rage with theſe trifling delayes, that he cried it out in the camp, that this remouing was a goodly running away, & ſware he would not frō thence, but would there tary Mardonius cōming with his company. Pauſanias went to him, and told him he muſt do that the other GRECIANS had conſented to in counſell, by moſt voyces. But Amompharetus tooke a great ſtone in his handes, and threw it downe at Pauſanias feete, and told him there is the ſigne I giue to conclude battell, and I paſſe not for all your cowardly concluſions. Amompharetus ſturbburneſſe did ſo amaze Pauſanias, that he was at his wits end. So he ſent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwardes on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might go together: and there withall made the reſt of his men to marche towardes the citie of PLATÆES, ſuppoſing thereby to haue drawen Amompharetus to haue followed him, or elſe he ment to remaine alone behind. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderſtanding that the GRECIANS did forſake their firſt lodging, he made his army preſently march in battell ray to ſet vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous people made great ſhoutes and cries, not thinking to go fight, but to go ſacke and ſpoyle the GRECIANS flying away, as indeede they did litle better. For, Pauſanias ſeeing the countenaunce of his enemies, made his enſignes to ſtay, and commaunded euery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to giue the GRECIANS the ſignall of the battell, either for the anger he tooke againſt Amompharetus, or for the ſodaine onſet of the enemies, which made them that they came not in ſtraight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begon, but ſtraggling in ſmall companies, ſome here, and ſome there. In the meane time, Pauſanias was buſie in ſacrificing to the gods, and ſeeing, that the firſt ſacrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothſayers obſeruations they made: he commaunded the SPARTANS to throw their targets at their feete, and not to ſtirre out of their places, but onely to do as he bad them, without reſiſting their enemies. When he had giuen this ſtraight order, he went againe and did ſacrifice, when the horſemen of the enemies were at hand, and that their arrowes flew amongſt the thickeſt of the Lacedæmonians, and did hurt diuerſe of them, and ſpecially poore Callicrates among the reſt, that was one of the goodlieſt men in all the Grecians hoaſt and armie. He hauing his deaths wound with an arrow, before he gaue vp the ghoſt, ſaid his death did not grieue him, becauſe he came out of his countrie to die for the defence of Grece: but it grieued him to die ſo cowardly, hauing giuen the enemie neuer a blowe. His death was maruellous lamentable, and the conſtancie of the Spartans wonderfull: for they neuer ſtirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defend themſelues againſt their enemies that came vpon them, but ſuffered themſelues to be thruſt through with arrowes, and ſlaine in the field, looking for the houre the goddes would appoint them, and that their Captaine would commaund them to fight. Some write alſo, that as P*auſanias* was at his prayers, and doing ſacrifice vnto the gods a litle behinde the battell, certaine of the Lydians came vpon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his ſacrifice: and how Pauſanias, and thoſe that were about him, (hauing no other weapons in their hands) draue them away with force of ſtaues and whippes. In memorie whereof, they ſay there is a ſolemne proceſsion kept at Sparta on that day, which they call the Lydians proceſsion, where they whip and beate young boyes about the aulter. Then was P*auſanias* in great diſtreſſe, to ſee the Prieſts offer ſacrifice vpon ſacrifice, and that not one of them pleaſed the goddes: at the laſt he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holding vp his hands, beſought Iuno Cithæron, and all the other goddes, (patrons and protectors of the countrie of the Platæians) that if it were not the will of the gods the Grecians ſhould haue the victorie, yet that the conquerors at the leaſt ſhould buy their deaths dearely, and that they ſhould finde they fought againſt valiant men and worthy ſouldiers. P*auſanias* had no ſooner ended his prayer, but the ſacrifices fell out very fauourable, inſomuch the Prieſts and Soothſayers came to promiſe him victorie. Thereupon, he ſtraight gaue commaundement to marche toward the enemie, which flew from man to man incontinently how they ſhould marche. So as he that had ſeene the ſquadron of the Lacedæmonians, would haue ſaid it had bene like the body of a fierce beaſt raiſing vp his briſtles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people ſawe they ſhould haue a hoate battle, and that they ſhould meete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the Persian faſhion, and beſtowed their arrowes luſtily vpon the Lacedæmonians. But they keeping cloſe together, and couering themſelues with their ſhields, marched on ſtill vpon them, vntill they came to ioyne with the enemie ſo luſtily, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thruſts and blowes of their pikes and ſpeares vpon their breaſts, and ouerthwart their faces, that they ſlew many of them, and laide them on the ground. For all that, they dyed not cowardly, but tooke the Lacedæmonians pikes and ſpeares in their bare hands, and brake them in two by ſtrength of their armes: and then they quickly pluckt out their cimeters and axes, and luſtily laide about them, and wrong the Lacedæmonians ſhields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now, whileſt the Lacedæmonians were buſily fighting with the barbarous people, the Athenians ſtood ſtil imbattelled farre off, & kept their ground. But whē they ſaw the Lacedæmonians tary ſo long, & that they came not, and heard a maruellous noiſe of men as though they were fighting, and beſides that there came a ſpeedy meſſenger vnto them ſent from Pauſanias, to let them vnderſtand they were fighting: then they marched with all ſpeed they could to helpe them. But as they were comming on a great pace ouer the plaine, vnto that part where they heard the noiſe: the Grecians that were on Mardonius ſide came againſt them. Ariſtides ſeeing them comming towards them, went a good way before his company, and cried out as loude as he could for life, and coniured the Grecians in the name of the gods, the protectors of Grece, to leaue off theſe wars, and not to trouble the Athenians that were going to helpe them that ventured their liues, to defend the commonwealth & ſafety of all Grece. But when he ſaw they would needs fight for any requeſt & coniuratiō he could vſe, & that they came ſtil vpon him, bending themſelues to giue charge: then he ſtaied his going to relieue the LACEDÆMONIANS, and was compelled to make head againſt thoſe that ſet vpon him and his company, they being about fiftie thouſand men, of the which, the moſt part notwithſtanding went their waies, and left the army, ſpecially when they vnderſtood the PERSIANS were ouerthrowne and fled. The furie of the battell, and cruelleſt fight (as they ſay) was where the THEBANS were: becauſe the nobilitie and chiefeſt men of the countrie fought very earneſtly for the PERSIANS, but the people refuſed, being led by a ſmall number of the nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDÆMONIANS being the firſt that ouerthrew the PERSIANS, and made them flie: & they ſlue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a ſtone one Arimneſtus a SPARTAN gaue him vpon his head, rightly as the oracle of Amphiaraus had prophecied before vnto him. For Mardonius before the battell had ſent thither a LYDIAN, & a CARIAN, vnto the oracle of Trophonius, of the which the prophet made anſwer vnto the CARIAN, in the CARIAN tongue: & the man of LYDIA lay within the ſanctuary of Amphiaraus, where he thought in his dreame that one of the prieſts of the temple willed him to go out of the place he was in, & he denying it, the Prieſt tooke vp a great ſtone & threw it at his head, and ſo thought he was ſlaine with the blow. And thus it is written. And furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS did chaſe the PERSIANS flying, into their fortification they had in a wood: & the ATHENIANS alſo ſhortly after ouerthrew the THEBANS whereof they ſlue in the field, a three hundred of the nobleſt & chiefeſt of them. For euen as the THEBANS began to turne taile, newes came vnto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had intrenched themſelues within their forte and ſtrength in the wood, where the LACEDÆMONIANS did beſiege them. The ATHENIANS ſuffered the GRECIANS that fled to ſaue themſelues, and they went to helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS, to take the forte of the barbarous people: who went before but ſlenderly about it, becauſe they had no experience to make an aſſault, nor force vpon a wall. But ſo ſoone as the ATHENIANS came in to them, they ſtraight tooke it by aſſault, and made great ſlaughter of the PERSIANS and barbarous people. For of three hundred thouſand fighting men that Mardonius had in his campe, there were ſaued onely but fortie thouſand led vnder Artabazus: and of the GRECIANS ſide, there were not ſlaine aboue thirteene hundred and three ſcore in all, amongſt which alſo there were two and fiftie ATHENIANS, al of the tribe of Æantides, the which had done more valiantly that day, thē any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cauſe why the Æantides made a ſolemn ſacrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order giuen them by the oracle of Apollo, to giue them thankes for this victorie. Of the LACEDÆMONIANS there died foure ſcore and eleuen: and of the TEGEATES, ſixteene. But I maruell Herodotus ſaith, that none but theſe people only fought in that iourney againſt the barbarous nation, and no other GRECIANS beſides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues alſo do ſhew, that it was a generall victorie and exploite of all the GRECIANS together. And moreouer, if there had bene but theſe three people onely that had fought againſt them, and that all the reſt had ſtood and looked on, and done nothing: ſure there had bene no ſuch epigram as this, engrauen vpon the aulter or tombe that was ſet vp in the place of the battell.

VVhen the victorious Greekes, had driuen out of their land,
the Perſians by force of armes, which long did them withſtand, they built to mighty Ioue, this holy aulter here, and made it common for all Greece, as plainly may appeare.
in Guerdon of the good, which he did them reſtore,
in Guerdon of their liberty, which liked them euermore.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Bœdromion, that is, about the moneth of Iuly, or after the BOEOTIANS account, the ſix & twentie of the moneth, they call Panemus, on which day there is yet kept a common aſſembly of the eſtates of GRECE, in the cities of PLATÆES, where the PLATÆIANS make a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, to giue him thankes alwaies for this victorie. It is no maruell that there was ſuch difference then betwixt the moneths and dayes, conſidering that euen now when aſtronomie is more perfectly vnderſtanded, then it was then:

ſome do yet begin and end their moneths at one day, and ſome at another. After this great battell and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there roſe great ſtrife betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the rewarde and honour of the victory. For the ATHENIANS would not giue place vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor ſuffer them to ſet vp any tokens or ſignes of triumphe. Whereupon the GRECIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occaſion they had almoſt ſpoiled one another: had not Ariſtides through his wiſedom and wiſe perſwaſions, ſtaied, and quieted the other Captaines his companions, and ſpecially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wanne with ſuch diſcreet and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbiterment and iudgement of the other people of GRECE. So the GRECIANS met in the ſame place together, purpoſely to decide their controuerſie. In this counſell holden there, Theogiton a Captaine of the MEGARIANS, ſaid for his opinion, that to auoide the ciuill warre might growe betweene the GRECIANS vpon this quarrell: he thought it very requiſite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victorie, vnto ſome other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him roſe vp Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, ſeeming to euery man there that he would haue requeſted this honour for the citie of CORINTHE, being in deed the third citie in eſtimation of all GRECE, next vnto SPARTA & ATHENS: howbeit he made an oration in commendation of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruellouſly liked, & well thought of of euery man. For his opinion went flatly with the PLATÆIANS, that to ende this ſtrife, they ſhould giue the honor of this victory vnto the city of PLATÆES, & ſo would neither of both parties be angrie that they ſhould be honored. Vpon his words, Ariſtides firſt agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe, & then Pauſanias for the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the PLATÆIANS ſhould haue the reward. Now they both being agreede, before the ſpoile was deuided betweene them, they ſet aſide foure ſcore talents that were giuen to the PLATÆIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and ſet out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithſtanding, did ſet vp their tokens of victory by themſelues, and the ATHENIANS theirs alſo by themſelues. So, they ſending vnto the oracle of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they ſhould do ſacrifice: Apollo anſwered them that they ſhould build vp an aulter vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, howbeit that they ſhould put no ſacrifice vpon it, vntill they had firſt put out all the fire through the whole countrie, becauſe it had bene polluted and defiled by the barbarous people: and then, that they ſhould fetche pure and cleane fire at the common aulter, whereon they do ſacrifice vnto Apollo Pythias, in the city of DELPHES. This anſwer being deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GRECE went through all the countrie, to put out the fire euery where. And there was a man of the ſame citie of PLATÆES at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered him ſelfe, and promiſed he would bring them fire from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all poſſible ſpeed that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he had ſprinckled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of lawrell vpon his head, and went in that manner to take fire from the aulter of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him againe as faſt as he could runne for life, vnto the citie of PLATÆES, and came thither before the ſunne was ſet, hauing come and gone that day a thouſand furlongs. But after he had ſaluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fire he brought: he fell downe dead at their feete, and gaue vp the ghoſt. The PLATÆIANS lift him vp ſtarke dead, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to ſay, of good renowme: and cauſed afterwards this Epitaphe following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

and image dedicated vnto her: and all that are maried, do ſacrifice to her vpon that aulter. Afterwards there was a generall counſell holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Ariſtides made a motion, that all the cities of GRECE ſhould yearely ſend their deputies at a certaine day appointed, vnto the city of PLATÆES, there to make their prayers and ſacrifices vnto the gods: and that from fiue yeares, to fiue yeares, they ſhould celebrate common games, that ſhould be called the games of libertie: and that they ſhould alſo leauie through all the prouinces of GRECE, for maintenance of the warres againſt the PERSIANS and barbarous people, ten thouſand footemen, a thouſand horſemen, and a fleete of a hundred ſaile. Item that the PLATÆIANS thenceforth ſhould be taken alſo for deuoute and holy men, and that no man ſhould ſo hardy hurt or offend them, and that they ſhould onely tende the ſacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and proſperitie of GRECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and manner aforeſaid, and the PLATÆIANS bound themſelues yearely to keepe ſolemne ſacrifices and anniuerſaries for the ſoules of the GRECIANS that were ſlaine in their territories, fighting for defence of the libertie of the GRECIANS. And this they obſerue yet vnto this day in this ſorte. The ſixteenth day of the moneth of Mæmacterion (which the BOEOTIANS call Alaicomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuarie) they go a proceſſion, and before the proceſsion there goeth a trumpetor that ſoundeth the alarum. Then there follow certaine chariots loden with branches of firre tree, and with noſegayes and garlandes of triumphe: then a blacke bull, and certaine young gentlemen noble men ſonnes, that carie great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, ſuch as they vſe to powre vpon the graues of dead men for propiciatory oblations, and other young boyes free borne, that cary oiles, perfumes, and other ſweete odours in voyall glaſſes. For no ſeruant or bonde man may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this miſterie, for that they whoſe memory they honor, died all fighting for defence of the libertie of GRECE. After all this ſhew, followeth the prouoſt of the PLATÆIANS for that time being, laſt of all: who may not all the reſt of the yeare beſides ſo much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall potte in one of his handes, which he taketh in the towne houſe, and a naked ſworde in the other hand, and ſo goeth through the citie in this ſorte after all the pompe aforeſaid, vnto the church yarde where all their graues be that were ſlaine at that battell. So when he commeth thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the ſame he waſheth the foureſquare pillers and images that ſtand vpon thoſe tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles and ſweete ſauors: afterwards, he ſacrificeth a bull, and laieth him vpon a heape of wood hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men, and making certaine praiers and petitions vnto Iupiter, and Mercurie, goddes of the earth, he doth ſolemnly inuite the ſoules of thoſe valiant men that dyed, fighting for the liberty of GRECE, vnto the feaſt of this funerall ſacrifice. Then he taketh a cup full of wine in his hande, and ſpilling it all vpon their tombes, he ſpeaketh theſe words aloude: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died ſometime in defence of the liberty of GRECE. This ſolemne ceremonie and anniuerſarie, the PLATÆIANS do duely obſerue vnto this preſent day. Now when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Ariſtides perceiuing the people were bent to ſtabliſh a popular ſtate, where the people might beare the whole rule and authoritie, iudging them well worthy to be conſidered of, in reſpect of their noble ſeruice and valiant courage they had ſhewed in this warre: & conſidering alſo that they would hardly be brought to like of any other gouernment, being yet in armes, and very ſtoute, by reaſon of the famous victories they had obteyned: he cauſed a law to be made, that all authoritie of gouernment ſhould runne in equalitie among the citizens, and that thenceforth all burgeſſes (as well poore as riche) ſhould be choſen by voices of the people, and promoted to offices within the citie. And moreouer, when Themiſtocles tolde in open aſſembly, that he had a thing in his head would be greatly to the profit and commodity of the ſtate, but yet it was not to be ſpoken openly for diuerſe reſpects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Ariſtides onely, and to take his aduiſe in it, to know whether it was meete to be done or not. Then Themiſtocles tolde him ſecretly betwene them, that he thought to ſet the arcenal on fire, where all the GRECIANS ſhips lay: alleadging, that by this meanes the Athenians ſhould be the greateſt men of power in all Grece. Ariſtides hearing that, without any more, came preſently to the people againe, and tolde the whole counſell openly: that nothing could be more profitable in deed for the whole commonwealth, and withall more wicked and vniuſt, then that Themiſtocles thought good to do. When the people heard Ariſtides aunſwer, they willed Themiſtocles to let his deuiſe alone whatſoeuer it were: ſo great iuſticers were the Athenians, and ſo much did they truſt Ariſtides wiſedom and equitie beſides. So they made Ariſtides afterwards generall of the armie of the Athenians together with Cimon, and ſent them to make warre againſt the barbarous people. Ariſtides at his comming thither, ſeeing P*auſanias*, and the other Captaines that were generals ouer the whole armie, dealing hardly, and churliſhly with people their confederates: he on the contrary ſide, ſpake gently vnto them, and ſhewed himſelfe as courteous and familiar to them as he could poſſible, making his companion alſo familiar to all, and iuſt to euery body not oppreſſing ſome to eaſe other, in defraying the charges of the warres. Ariſtides taking this courſe, it was not noted how by litle and litle he cut off the rule and authority of the Lacedæmonians in Grece, not by force of armes, nor by ſhips, nor by numbers of horſes, but onely by his graue and wiſe gouernment. For if the iuſtice and vertue of Ariſtides, and the mildeneſſe and courteſie of Cimon made the gouernment of the Athenians to be liked of, and accepted of all the other people of Grece: the couetouſneſſe, pride, and fierceneſſe of P*auſanias*, made it much more to be deſired. For P*auſanias* neuer ſpake vnto the other captaines of the people, allyes, and confederates, but it was euer in choller, and he was too ſharpe with them: and for the poore priuate ſouldiers, he would cauſe them to be cruelly whipped for euery ſmall offence, or elſe to make them ſtand a whole day together on their feete, laying a heauy iron ancker vpon their ſhoulders. No man durſt go forrage, neither for ſtrawe nor reedes to make them couches of, nor durſt water their horſe before the Spartans: for he had ſet skoutes for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Ariſtides thought to haue ſpoken to him, and to haue tolde him ſome thing: he frowned vpon him, and ſaid he had no leaſure to ſpeake with him now, and ſo would not heare him. Whereupon the Captaines of the other Grecians, and ſpecially thoſe of Chio, of Samos, and of Lesbos, did afterwards follow Ariſtides, and perſwaded him to take vpon him the charge and authoritie to commaund the other people of Grece, and to take into his protection the allyes and confederates of the ſame, who long ſithence wiſhed to reuolt from the gouernment of the Lacedæmonians, and onely to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Athenians. Ariſtides aunſwered them thus: that they had not onely reaſon to do that they ſaid, but that they were alſo conſtrained to do it. Notwithſtanding, becauſe the Athenians might haue good ground and aſſurance of their vndoubted fidelitie and good ſeruice, they ſhould deliuer them manifeſt teſtimonie and aſſurance thereof, by ſome famous act attempted againſt the Lacedæmonians, whereby their people hereafter durſt neuer fall from the league of the Athenians. Vliades Samian, & Antagoras of Chio hearing him ſay ſo, both captaines of galleys confedered together: they went one day to ſet vpon the admirall galley of Pauſanias, hard by Bizantium, the one of the one ſide of her, and the other on the other ſide, as ſhe was rowing before all the fleete. P*auſanias* ſeeing them, ſtood vp ſtraight in a maruelous rage againſt them, and threatned them that before it were long he would make them know they had bene better to haue aſſaulted their owne naturall countrie, then to haue ſet vpon him as they had done. But they aunſwered him, and bad him get him away quickly and he were wiſe, and let him thanke fortune hardly, that graunted the Grecians victorie at the battell of Platææs vnder his leading: and that it was nothing elſe but the onely reuerence and reſpect of the ſame, that had made the Grecians hold their hands till now, from giuing him that iuſt puniſhment his pride and arrogancie had deſerued. So the end was, they left the Lacedæmonians, & ſtacke vnto the Athenians: wherein was eaſily diſcerned the great courage, and wonderfull magnanimity of the Lacedæmonians. For when they ſaw their captains were marred and corrupted, through the ouer great authority and liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commandement ouer the other Grecians, and did no more ſend their Captaines to be generals of the whole armie of Grece: thinking it better for their citizens, that they ſhould be obedient, and in euery pointe obſerue the diſcipline and law of their countrie, then if they had bin otherwiſe the onely rulers and lords ouer the whole countrie. Now at what time the LACEDÆMONIANS did commaund all GRECE, as Lords: the cities and people of GRECE did pay a certaine ſumme of money, towards deſtraying of the charges of the warres againſt the barbarous people. But after that their ſeigniorie and rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented a taxe ſhould be leauied, and that euery city ſhould be reaſonably ſeſſed, according to their wealth and abilitie: becauſe euery citie might know what they ſhould pay. And for this purpoſe, they prayed the ATHENIANS they would appoint Ariſtides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power & authoritie to taxe and ſeſſe euery citie indifferently, conſidering the greatneſſe of the territorie, and the reuenues of the ſame, as euery one was reaſonably able to beare it. But if Ariſtides were poore when he entred into that great charge and office of authoritie, wherein all GRECE in manner did referre themſelues vnto his diſcretion: he came out of that office more poore, and had made this aſſeſſement and taxation not onely iuſtly and truly, but alſo ſo indifferently according vnto euery mans abilitie, that there was no man could finde fault with his doings. And like as the auncient men in olde time did celebrate, and ſing out the bleſſedneſſe of thoſe that liued vnder the raigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: euen ſo did the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwards honour the aſſeſſement made by Ariſtides, calling it the fortunate & bleſſed time of GRECE, and ſpecially, when ſhortly after it did double, and treble on the ſodaine. For the taxe Ariſtides made, came to about foure hundred and three ſcore talents: and Pericles raiſed it almoſt vnto a third parte. For Thucydides writeth, that at the beginning of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the ATHENIANS leauied ſixe hundred talents yearely vpon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the orators and counſellers for matters of ſtate, did raiſe it vp higher by litle and litle, vntill it mounted vnto the ſumme of thirteene hundred talents. And this was not, becauſe the warres did riſe to ſo great a charge, by reaſon of the length of the ſame, and of the loſſes the ATHENIANS had receiued: but for that they did accuſtome the people to make diſtributions of money by hand vnto euery citizen, to make them ſet vp games, and make goodly images, and to builde ſumptuous temples. Thus was Ariſtides therefore iuſtly honoted, praiſed, and eſteemed aboue all other, for this iuſt impoſition of taxes, ſauing onely of Themiſtocles: who went vp and downe fleering at the matter, ſaying it was no meete praiſe for an honeſt man, but rather for a cofer wel barred with iron, where a man might ſafely lay vp his gold and ſiluer. This he ſpake to be euen with Ariſtides, which was nothing like the ſharpe girde Ariſtides gaue him openly, when Themiſtocles talking with him, tolde him it was an excellent thing for a Captaine to be able to know, and to preuent the counſels and doings of the enemies: and ſo is it, ſaied Ariſtides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honeſt thing, and meete for a worthy generall of an armie, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Ariſtides made all the other people of GRECE to ſweare, that they would truely keepe the articles of the alliance, and he him ſelfe as generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their othes in the name of the ATHENIANS: and ſo pronouncing execrations & curſes againſt them that ſhould breake the league and othe taken, he threw iron wedges red hotte into the ſea, and praied the gods to deſtroy them euen ſo, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithſtanding, afterwardes (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteration in the ſtate, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more ſtraightly then before: Ariſtides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the daunger and burden of periury and execration, and that they ſhould not let for feare thereof to do any thing whatſoeuer they thought meet or neceſſary. To conclude, Theophraſtus writeth, that Ariſtides was not only a perfect, an honeſt, and iuſt man, in priuate matters betwixt party & party: but in matters of ſtate, and concerning the common weale, he did many things oftentimes according to the neceſſitie of the time, and troubles of the citie, wherein violence and iniuſtice was to be vſed. As when the queſtion was asked in open counſell, to know whether they might take away the gold and ſiluer that was left in the Ile of DELOS ſafely laid vp in the temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the wars againſt the barbarous people, & to bring it from thence vnto ATHENS, vpon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly againſt the articles of the alliance, made and ſworne among all the GRECIANS. Ariſtides opinion being asked in the ſame, he anſwered: it was not iuſt, but yet profitable. Now, notwithſtanding Ariſtides had brought his city, to rule and command many thouſands of people: yet was he ſtill pore for all that, and vntill his dying day he gloried rather to be praiſed for his pouerty, then for all the famous victories and battels he had won: and that plainely appeareth thus. Callias Ceres torch bearer, was his neare kinſeman, who through enemies came to be accuſed, and ſtoode in hazard of life: ſo when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accuſers very faintly, and to litle purpoſe, vttered the offences whereof they accuſed him, and running into other byematters, left the chiefeſt matter, and ſpake thus to the Iudges. My Lords, you all know Ariſtides the ſonne of Lyſimachus, and you are not ignorant alſo that his vertue hath made him more eſteemed, then any man els is, or can be, in all GREECE. How thinke ye doth he liue at home? when you ſee him abroad vp and downe the city, in a thred bare gowne all to tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye that he is ready to ſtarue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all ſee quake for very coulde, being ſo ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his coſin germaine the richeſt citizen in all ATHENS, is ſo miſerable: that notwithſtanding Ariſtides hath done much for him, by reaſon of his great credit and authority among you, he ſuffereth him, and his poore wife and children ready to beg, to ſtarue for any help he giueth him. Callias perceiuing the Iudges more angrie with him for that, then for any matter elſe hee was accuſed of: hee prayed Ariſtides might be ſent for, and willed him to tell truely whether hee had not offered him good rounde ſums of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it, which he euer refuſed, and anſwered him alwaies, that he could better boaſt of his pouerty, then him ſelfe could of his riches: (which he ſayd many did vſe ill, and few could vſe them well) and that it was a hard thing to find one man of a noble mind, that could away with pouerty, and that ſuch onely might be aſhamed of pouerty, as were poore againſt their wils. So Ariſtides confirmed all hee ſpake to be true: and euery man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Ariſtides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by AEſchines the Socratian Philoſopher: and Plato reporteth of him alſo, that notwithſtanding there were many other famous and notable men of ATHENS, yet hee gaue Ariſtides praiſe aboue them all. For others, ſayd he, (as Themiſtocles, Cimon, and Pericles) haue beautified the city with ſtately porches, and ſumptuous buildings of golde and ſiluer, and with ſtone of other fine ſuperfluous deuiſes: but Ariſtides was only he, that vertuouſly diſpoſed himſelf and all his doings, to the furtherance of the ſtate and common weale. His iuſtice and good nature appeared plainely in his doings and behauiour towards Themiſtocles. For though Themiſtocles was euer againſt Ariſtides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practiſe he was baniſhed from ATHENS: yet when Themiſtocles was accuſed of treaſon to the ſtate, hauing diuerſe ſharpe enemies againſt him: as Cimon, Alcmaon, with diuerſe other: Ariſtides ſought not reuenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither ſpake nor did any thing againſt him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioice to ſee his enemy in miſery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his proſperity. And touching Ariſtides death, ſome write that he died in the realme of PONTVS, being ſent thither about matters of the ſtate: and other think he died an old man in the city of ATHENS, greatly honored and beloued of al the citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN writeth of his death in this ſort. After that Themiſtocles (ſaith he) was fled, the people of ATHENS became very ſtubborn and inſolent: wherupon, many lewd men grew to be common appeachers and accuſers of the noble men & chiefeſt citizens, and to ſtirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people againſt them, who were waxen proud by reaſon of their proſperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Among the reſt, Arſtides was condemned for extorcion and ill behauiour in the commõ wealth, vpon one Diophantes accuſation, of the village of AMPHITROPE: who burdned him, that he tooke money of the IONIANS, to make the annual tribute ceaſe which they payed vnto ATHENS: & ſo Craterus ſaith, that becauſe Ariſtides was not able to pay the fine they ſet vpon his head (which was fiue Minas) he was driuen to forſake ATHENS, and to get him into IONIA where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he writeth: as his Moreouer, Ariſtides tombe is to be ſeene at this day vpon the hauen of Phalerus, which was ſet vp for him at the charge of the common wealth, as it is reported, becauſe he died ſo poore a man, as they found nothing in his houſe to bury him with. Other go further, and ſay that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the common wealth, and that the city gaue euery one of them three thouſand Drachmas: and his ſonne Lyſimachus, a hundred Minas of ſiluer, and a hundred Iugera, & at Alcibiades requeſt, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him foure Drachmas a day beſides, of ordinary allowance. Furthermore, when this Lyſimachus died, hee left aliue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Calliſthenes writeth, as much prouiſion to liue withall, as they gaue to any that wan the Olympian games. Yet Panatius doth write againſt them, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well hee had ſeene one Lyſimachus, Ariſtides ſonnes ſonne, or his daughters ſonne, that was very poore, and liued of that he could get to interpret dreames, by certaine tables, wherein was written the arte to interpret the ſignification of dreames: and that he kept commonly about the temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, vnto whom, together with his mother and his ſiſter, he ſayd he had cauſed the people to giue them a Triobolum a peece, euery day towardes their liuing. It is very true that the ſelfe ſame Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the ſtate of ATHENS, ordained that his mother and ſiſter ſhould haue ech of them a Drachma by the day to finde them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new, nor ſtrange thing, that the people of ATHENS were ſo carefull to helpe, and to relieue, the women that dwelt in the city: conſidering that in times paſt, Ariſtogiton hauing a litle daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poore ſtate, and that could not be beſtowed in mariage for her pouerty, they cauſed her to be brought to ATHENS, and maried her in one of the nobleſt houſes of the city, and made her a ioynter beſides in the village of POTAMOS. # THE LIFE OF Marcus Cato the Cenſor.

CATO M. PORTIVS

MArcus Cato and his auncesters, were (as they ſay) of the city of THVSCVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and dealt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt and liued in the countrey of the SABYNES, vpon certaine land his father left him. And though to many his auncesters were knowen to haue bene obſcure: yet hee him ſelfe did highly commend his father Marcus, by bearing his name, & ſaying he was a ſouldier, and had ſerued valiantly in the fielde. And he teleth alſo of another Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his valiant ſeruice had bene oft rewarded of the generals, with ſuch honorable gifts, as the ROMAINES did vſe to giue vnto them, that had done ſome famous act in any battel: and how that he hauing loſt fiue horſes of ſeruice in the wars, the value of the ſame were reſtored to him againe in money of the common treaſure, becauſe he had ſhewed himſelfe truſty and valiant for the common welth. And where they had a common ſpeach at ROME to call them vpſtarts, that were no gentlemen borne, but did riſe by vertue: it fortuned Cato to be called one of them. And for his part he did confeſſe it, that he was of the firſt of the houſe that euer had honour, and office of ſtate: but by reaſon of the noble actes and good ſeruice of his auncestors, he maintained he was very auncient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priſcus: but afterwards by reaſon of his great wiſedome and experience he was ſurnamed Cato, becauſe the ROMAINS call a wiſe man, and him that hath ſeene much, Cato. He was ſomewhat giuen to be red faced, and had a paire of ſtaring eyes in his head, as this man telleth vs, that for ill will wrote theſe verſes of him after his death.

Cato called an vpſtart.

his common ſlaunderous tales, which he did in this world deuiſe,

and all becauſe he did vſe to labor and toile euen from his youth, and to liue ſparingly, as one that was euer brought vp in the wars from his youth: ſo that he was of a very good conſtitution, both for ſtrength of body, as for health alſo. As for vtterance, he eſteemed it as a ſecond body, and moſt neceſſary gift, not only to make men honeſt, but alſo as a thing very requiſite for a man that ſhould beare ſway and authority in the common wealth. He practiſed to ſpeake well in litle villages neare home, whither he went many times to plead mens cauſes in courts iudiciall, that would retaine him of counſell: ſo as in ſhort time hee became a perfect pleader, and had tongue at will, and in proceſſe of time became an excellent orator.

After he was thus well knowen, they that were familiar with him, began to perceiue a graue manner and behauiour in his life, and a certaine noble mind in him, worthy to be employed in matters of ſtate and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he did not only refuſe to take fees for his pleading, and following the cauſes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckoning of the eſtimation he wan by that manner and practiſe, as though that was not the only marke he ſhot at. But his deſire reached further, rather to win him ſelfe fame by ſeruice in the wars, and by valiant fighting with his enemy: then with ſuch a quiet and pleaſing manner of life. Inſomuch as when he was but a young ſtripling in maner, he had many cuts vpon his breſt, which he had receiued in diuerſe battels and encounters againſt the enemies.

Cato a ſouldier at 17. yeares of age.

For he him ſelfe writeth, that he was but ſeuenteene yeare old, when he went firſt vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe proſperity, when he ſpoyled and deſtroyed al ITALY. So when he came to fight, he would ſtrike luſtely, and neuer ſturre foote nor giue backe, and would looke cruelly vpon his enemy, and threaten him with a fearfull & terrible voice, which he vſed him ſelfe, and wiſely taught other alſo to vſe the like: for ſuch countenances, ſayed he, many times do feare the enemies more, then the ſword yee offer them.

When he went anie iourney, he euer marched a foote, and caried his armor vpon his backe, and had a man waiting on him that caried his vittels with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they ſay) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or ſupper, but did helpe to dreſſe it him ſelfe for the moſt part, if he had any leyſure, when hee had done the duty of a priuate ſouldier in fortifying the campe, or ſuch other needfull buſineſſe. All the while he was abroad in ſeruice in the wars, he neuer dranke other then cleane water, vnles it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a litle vineger: but if he ſaw he were weake, he would then drinke a litle wine.

Now it fortuned that Manius Curius the ROMAINE, who had triumphed thriſe, had a prety houſe and land hard by Cato, where he kept in times paſt, which Cato for a walke would viſite oft. And he conſidering how litle land he had to his houſe, and what a litle houſe he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondered with him ſelfe what maner of man Curius hadde bene, that hauing bene the greateſt man of ROME in his time, and hauing ſubdued the mightieſt nations and people of all ITALY, and driuen king Pyrrus alſo out of the ſame: yet him ſelfe with his owne hands did manure that litle patch of ground, and dwell in ſo poore and ſmall a farme.

Whither notwithſtanding, after his three triūphs, the SAMNYTES ſent their Ambaſſadours to viſite him, who found him by the fires ſide ſeething of parſeneapes, and preſented him a maruellous deale of gold from their ſtate and communalty. But Curius returned them againe with their gold, and told them, that ſuch as were contented with that ſupper, had no neede of gold nor ſiluer: and that for his part, he thought it greater honour to commaund them that had gold, then to haue it him ſelfe. Cato remembring theſe thinges to him ſelfe, went home againe, and beganne to thinke vppon his houſe, of his liuing, of his family and ſeruaunts, and alſo of his expences: and to cut off all ſuperfluous charges, and fell him ſelfe to labour with his owne handes, more then euer he had done before.

Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, Cato ſerued vnder him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the PYTHAGORIAN philoſopher, in whō he toke maruellous delight to hear him talke of Philoſophy. Which Nearchus held the ſame opinion of pleaſure, that Plato did, by calling it the ſweete poyſon and chiefeſt bayte to allure men to ill: and ſaying that the body was the firſt plague vnto the ſoule, and that her onely health, remedy, and purgation ſtoode vppon rules of reaſon, good examples and contemplations, that driue ſinfull thoughts and carnall pleaſures of the body, far off from her. Cato moreouer gaue him ſelfe much to ſobriety and temperaunce, and framed him ſelfe to be contented with litle. They ſay he fell in his very olde age to the ſtudy of the Greeke tongue; and to reade Greeke books, and that he profited ſomwhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demoſthenes, to frame his matter, and alſo to be eloquent. Which plainely appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, & ſtories taken out of Greeke authors: and many of his ſentences and morals, his adages and quick anſwers, are tranſlated out of the ſame word for word. Now there was a noble man of Rome at that time, one of great authority, and a deepe wiſe man beſides, who could eaſily diſcerne buddes of vertue ſprowting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable diſpoſition to helpe forward, and to aduaunce ſuch. His name was Valerius Flaccus, a neare neighbour vnto Cato, who was informed by his ſeruaunts of Catoes ſtrange life, how he would be doing in his ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to litle villages thereabout, to pleade mens cauſes that praied his counſaile, & that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in winter, that he would but caſt a litle coat on his ſhoulders, and being ſommer hee would go out bare, naked to the waſt, to worke in his ground among his ſeruaunts and other workemen: and would beſides, ſit and eate with them together at one bord, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him alſo a world of ſuch maners and faſhions which he vſed, that ſhewed to be a maruellous plaine man, without pride and of a good nature. Then they told him what notable wiſe ſayings and graue ſentences they heard him ſpeake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to ſupper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiuing he was of a very good nature, & well giuen, & that he was a good griffe to be ſet in a better ground: he perſwaded him to come to Rome, and to practiſe there in the aſſembly of the people, in the common cauſes and affaires of the common weale. Cato followed his counſaile, who hauing bene no long practiſer among them, did grow ſtraight into great eſtimation, and wanne him many friends, by reaſon of the cauſes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken alſo, by means of the ſpeciall fauor and countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For firſt of all, by voice of the people he was choſen Tribune of the ſouldiers, (to ſay, colonell of a thouſand footemen) and afterwards was made treaſurer: and ſo went forwards, and grew to ſo great credit and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus companion in the chiefeſt offices of ſtate, being choſen Conſull with him, & then Cenſor. But to begin withal, Cato made choiſe of Quintus Fabius Maximus, aboue all the Senators of Rome, & gaue him ſelfe to follow him altogether: and not ſo much for the credit & eſtimation Fabius Maximus was off, (who therein exceeded all the Romains of that time) as for the modeſty and diſcrete gouernment he ſaw in him, whom hee determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour and example. At which time Cato paſſed not for the malice and euill will of Scipio the great, who did ſtriue at that preſent being but a yong man, with the authority and greatneſſe of Fabius Maximus, as one that ſeemed to enuy his riſing and greatnes. For Cato being ſent treaſurer with Scipio, when he vndertooke the iourney into Afrike, and perceiuing Scipioes bountifull nature and diſpoſition to large giftes without meane to the ſouldiers: he tolde him plainely one day, that he did not ſo much hurt the common wealth in waſting their treaſure, as he did great harme in changing the auncient manner of their aunceſters: who vſed their ſouldiers to be contented with litle, but hee taught them to ſpend their ſuperfluous money (all neceſſaries prouided for) in vaine toies and trifles, to ſerue their pleaſure. Scipio made him aunſwer, hee would haue no treaſurer ſhould controll him in that ſort, nor that ſhould looke ſo narrowly to his expenſes: for his intent was to go to the warres, with full ſailes as it were, and that he would (and did alſo determine to) make the ſtate priuy to all his doings, but not to the money he ſpent. Cato hearing this aunſwere, returned with ſpeede out of Sicile vnto Rome, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio ſpent infinitely, and that he tended plaies, commedies, and wreſtlings, as if he had not beene ſent to make warres, inuaſions, and attempts vppon their enemies. Vpon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to goe and ſee if their informations were true: and finding them ſo, that they ſhould bring him backe againe to Rome. But Scipio ſhewed farre otherwiſe to the commiſſioners that came thither, and made them ſee apparaunt victory, through the neceſſary preparation and prouiſion he had made for the warres: and he confeſſed alſo, that when he had diſpatched his great buſines, and was at any leyſure, he would be priuately mery with his friends: and though he was liberall to his ſouldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duety and charge in any matter of importaunce. So Scipio tooke ſhipping, and ſailed towards AFRIKE, whither he was ſent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increaſed ſtill in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, ſo that diuerſe called him the Demoſthenes of ROME: howbeit the maner of his life was in more eſtimation then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did ſeeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of wordes, and one enuied another which of them ſhould come neareſt: but few of them would file their handes with any labour as their forefathers did, and make a light ſupper and dinner, without fire or prouiſion, or would be content with a meane gowne, and a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honorable to defie fanſies & pleaſures, then to haue and enioy them. Becauſe the ſtate was waxẽ now of ſuch power and wealth, as it could no more retaine the auncient diſcipline, and former auſterity and ſtraightnes of life it vſed: but by reaſon of the largenes of their dominion and ſeigniory, and the numbers of people and nations that were become their ſubiects, it was euen forced to receiue a medley of ſundry countrey faſhions, examples, and maners. This was a cauſe, why in reaſon men did ſo greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they ſaw other ſtraight wearied with paines and labour, tenderly brought vp like pulers: and Cato on the other ſide neuer ouercommen, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he moſt coueted honor, nor in his age alſo when he was gray headed and balde, after his Conſulſhip and triumphe, but like a conquerour that had gotten the maiſtery, he would neuer giue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he writeth him ſelfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backe that coſt him aboue a hundred pence, & that his hindes and workemen alwaies drunke no worſe wine, when he was Conſull and generall of the army, then he did him ſelfe: and that his Cater neuer beſtowed in meate for his ſupper, aboue thirty Aſſes of ROMAINE money, and yet he ſayed it was, becauſe hee might be the ſtronger, and apter to do ſeruice in the wars for his countrey and the common wealth. He ſayd furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that died, he had a peece of tapeſtry by him with a deepe border, which they called then the Babylonian border, and he cauſed it ſtraight to be ſold: and that of all his houſes he had abroade in the countrey, hee had not one wall plaſtered, nor rough caſt. Moreouer he would ſay, hee neuer bought bondeman or ſlaue dearer, then a thouſand fiue hundred pence, as one that ſought not for fine made men, and goodly perſonages, but ſtrong fellowes that could away with paines, as carters, horſekeepers, neatheardes, and ſuch like: and againe he would ſell them when they were olde, becauſe hee would not keepe them when they could do no ſeruice. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a man bought any thing deare, that was for litle purpoſe: yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to beſtow ſo litle, for that which needed not. Hee would haue men purchaſe houſes, that had more ſtore of arable land and paſture, then of fine horteyardes or gardeins. Some ſay, he did thus, for very miſery and couetouſneſſe: other thinke, and tooke it that he liued ſo ſparingly, to moue others by his example to cutte off all ſuperfluity and waſt. Neuertheleſſe, to ſell ſlaues in that ſort, or to turne them out of dores when you haue had the ſeruice of all their youth, and that they are growen old, as you vſe brute beaſtes that haue ſerued whileſt they may for age: me thinkes that muſt needes proceede of too ſeuere and greedy nature, that hath no longer regard or conſideration of humanity, then whileſt one is able to to doe an other good. For we ſee, gentleneſſe goeth further then iuſtice. For nature teacheth vs to vſe iuſtice onely vnto men, but gentleneſſe ſometimes is ſhewed vnto bruite beaſtes: and that commeth from the very fountaine and ſpring of all curteſie and humanity, which ſhould neuer drie vp in any man liuing. For to ſay truely, to keepe caſt horſes ſpoiled in our ſeruice, and dogs alſo not onely when they are whelps, but when they be old: be euen tokens of loue and kindneſſe. As the ATHENIANS made a law, when they builded their temple called Hecatompedon: that they ſhould ſuffer the moyles and mulets that did ſeruice in their cariages about the building of the ſame, to graze euery where, without let or trouble of any man. And they ſay, there was one of their moiles thus turned at liberty, that came her ſelfe to the place to labour, about, going before all the other draught beaſtes, that drew vp cartes loden towardes the caſtle, and kept them companie, as though ſhe ſeemed to encourage the reſt to draw: which the people liked ſo well in the poore beaſt, that they appointed ſhee ſhould be kept whileſt ſhe liued, at the charge of the towne. And yet at this preſent are the graues of Cimons mares to be ſeene, that wanne him thriſe together the game of the horſe race at the games Olympian, and they are hard by the graue of Cimon himſelfe. We heare of diuerſe alſo that had buried their dogges they brought vppe in their houſe, or that waited on them: as among other, olde Xanthippus buried his dogge on the toppe of a cliffe, which is called the dogges pit till this day. For when the people of ATHENS did forſake their citie at the comming downe of Xerxes the king, this dogge followed his maiſter, ſwimming in the ſea by his gallies ſide, from the firme lande, vnto the Ile of SALAMINA. And there is no reaſon, to vſe liuing and ſenſible things, as wee would vſe an olde ſhoo or a ragge, to caſt it out vppon the dunghill when we haue worne it, and can ſerue vs no longer. For if it were for no reſpect elſe, but to vſe vs alwaies to humanitie: we muſt euer ſhewe our ſelues kinde and gentle, euen in ſuch ſmall pointes of pittie. And as for me, I could neuer finde in my heart to ſell my draught Oxe that had ploughed my lande a long time, becauſe he could plough no longer for age: and much leſſe my ſlaue to ſell him for a litle money, out of the country where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life wherewith he was beſt acquainted, and then ſpecially, when he ſhall be as vnprofitable for the buier, as alſo for the ſeller. But Cato on the other ſide gloried, that he left his horſe in SPAYNE he had ſerued on in the warres during his Conſulſhip, becauſe he would not put the commonwealth to the charge of bringing of him home by ſea into ITALIE. Now a queſtion might be made of this, and probable reaſon of either ſide, whether this was nobleneſſe, or a niggardlineſſe in him: but otherwiſe to ſay truly, he was a man of a wonderful abſtinēce. For when he was generall of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three buſhels of wheat a moneth of the cōmonwealth, for himſelfe & his whole family: and but a buſhell and halfe of barley a day, to keepe his horſe and other beaſts for his cariage. On a time when he was Prætor, the gouernment of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot. And where the other Prætors before him had put the country to exceeding great charge, to furniſh them with tents, bedding, clothes, and ſuch like ſtuffe, and burthened them alſo with a maruellous traine of ſeruants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expence of feaſting and banketing of them: Cato in contrary maner brought downe all that exceſſe and ſuperfluitie, vnto a maruellous neere and vncredible ſauing. For when he went to viſite the cities, he came a foote to them, and did not put them to a penny charge for himſelfe: and had onely one officer or bailife of the ſtate, that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cup with him, to offer vp wine to the gods in his ſacrifices. But though he came thus ſimply to the ſubiects, and eaſed them of their former charges, yet he ſhewed himſelfe ſeuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iuſtice: and ſpared no man, in any commaundement or ſeruice for the ſtate and common wealth. For he was therein ſo preciſe, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his gouernment, both to loue and feare the Empire of ROME, more then euer they did before. For his grace both in ſpeaking and writing did rightly ſhew him ſelfe: becauſe it was pleaſant and yet graue: ſweete and fearefull: merry and ſeuere: ſententious, and yet familiar: ſuch as is meete to be ſpoken. And he was to be compared, as Plato ſayed vnto Socrates: who at the firſt ſight ſeemed a plaine ſimple manne to them that knew him not outwardly, or elſe a pleaſaunt taunter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him throughly, they ſaw he was full of graue ſentences, goodly examples, and wiſe perſwaſions, that he could make men water their plantes that heard him, and leade them as hee would by the eare. Therefore I can not ſee any reaſon that moues men to ſay, Cato hadde Laſias grace and vtteraunce. Notwithſtanding, lette vs referre it to their iudgements that make profeſſion to diſcerne orators graces and ſtiles: for my part I ſhall content my ſelfe to write at this preſent, onely certaine of his notable ſayings and ſentences, perſwading my ſelfe that mens manners are better diſcerned by their wordes, then by their lookes, and ſo doe many thinke. On a time he ſeeking to diſſwade the people of ROME, which would needes make a thankefull diſtribution of corne vnto euerie citizen, to no purpoſe: beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a harde thing (my Lordes of ROME) to bring the bellie by perſwaſion to reaſon, that hath no eares. And an other time, reprouing the ill gouernement of the citie of ROME, hee ſaide: it was a hard thing to keepe vp that ſtate, where a litle fiſh was ſolde dearer then an Oxe. He ſaid alſo that the ROMAINES were like a flocke of ſheepe. For ſaieth he, as euery weather when he is alone, doth not obey the ſhepheard, but when they are all together they one follow an other for loue of the formoſt: euen ſo are you, for when you are together, you are all contented to be ledde by the noſes by ſuch, whoſe counſell not a man alone of you would vſe in any priuate cauſe of your owne. And talking an other time of the authoritie the women of ROME had ouer their husbandes. He ſaide: other men commaunde their wiues, and we commaund men, and our wiues commaund vs. But this laſt of all he borrowed of Themiſtocles pleaſant ſayings. For his ſonne making him doe many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day. The ATHENIANS commaund all GRECE, I commaunde the ATHENIANS, you commaund me, and your ſonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vſe the libertie he hath with ſome better diſcretion, foole and aſſe as he is, ſithence he can doe more by that power and authoritie, then all the GRECIANS beſides. He ſaide alſo that the people of ROME did not onely delight in diuerſe ſorts of purple, but likewiſe in diuerſe ſorts of exerciſes. For ſaide he, as diuerſe commonly die that colour they ſee beſt eſteemed, and is moſt pleaſant to the eye: euen ſo the luſtie youthes of ROME do frame themſelues to ſuch exerciſe, as they ſee your ſelues moſt like, and beſt eſteeme. He continually aduiſed the ROMAINES, that if their power & greatneſſe came by their vertue & temperance, they ſhould take heed they became no changelings, nor waxe worſe: and if they came to that greatneſſe by vice and violence, that then they ſhould change to better, for by that meanes he knew very well they had attained to great honor and dignity. Againe he told them, that ſuch as ſued ambitiouſly to beare office in the commonwealth, and were common ſuters for them: did ſeeme to be afraid to loſe their way, and therefore would be ſure to haue vſhers & ſergeants before them, to ſhew them the way, leaſt they ſhould loſe themſelues in the city. He did reproue them alſo, that often choſe one man to continue one office ſtill: for it ſeemeth, ſaith he, either that you paſſe not much for your officers, or that you haue not many choiſe men you thinke worthy for the office. There was an enemy of his that led a maruellous wicked & an abhominable life, of whom he was wont to ſay, that when his mother prayed vnto the gods that ſhe might leaue her ſonne behinde her, ſhe did not thinke to pray, but to curſe: meaning to haue him liue for a plague to the world. And to another alſo that had vnthriftely ſolde his lands which his father had left him, lying vpon the ſea ſide: he pointed vnto them with his finger, & made as though he wondred how he came to be ſo great a man, that he was ſtronger then the ſea. For that which the ſea hardly conſumeth, & eateth into, by litle & litle a long time: he had conſumed it all at a clappe. An other time, when king Eumenes was come to ROME, the Senate entertained him maruellous honorably, and the nobleſt citizens did ſtriue, enuying one an other, who ſhould welcome him beſt. But Cato in contrary maner ſhewed plainely, that he did ſuſpect all this feaſting and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friendes told him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes company, that is ſo good a Prince, and loues the ROMAINES ſo well. Yea, ſayed he, let it be ſo, but for all that, a king is no better then a rauening beaſt that liues of the prey: neither was there euer any king ſo happy, that deſerued to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themiſtocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylcar, ſurnamed Barca. They ſay his enemies did malice him, becauſe he vſed commonly to riſe before day, & did forget his owne buſines to follow matters of ſtate. And he affirmed, that he had rather looſe the reward of his well doing, then not to bee puniſhed for doing of euill: and that he would beare with all other offending ignorantly, but not with him ſelfe. The ROMAINES hauing choſen on a time three Ambaſſadors to ſend into the realme of BITHYNIA, one of them hauing the goute in his feete, the other his head full of cuttes and great gaſhes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, ſayed the ROMAINES ſent an Ambaſſade that had neither feete, head nor heart. Scipio ſued once to Cato at Polybius requeſt, about thoſe that were baniſhed from ACHAIA. in the Senate, and there fell out diuers opinions about it. Some would haue had them reſtored to their country and goods againe: other were wholly againſt it. So Cato riſing vp at the laſt, ſaid vnto them. It ſeemes we haue litle elſe to doe, when we ſtande beating of our braines all day, diſputing about theſe olde GRECIANS, whether the ROMAINES or the ACAIANS ſhall burie them. In the end, the Senate tooke order they ſhould be reſtored vnto their countrie againe. Whereupon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the baniſhed men whom they had reſtored by their order, might enioy their former eſtates and honors in ACHAIA, they had at the time of their baniſhment: but before he would moue the ſute vnto the Senate, he would feele Catoes opinion firſt, what he thought of it. Who anſwered him, ſmyling: me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlyſſes, that when he had ſcaped out of Cyclops caue the giant, he would needes goe thither againe, to fetch his hatte and girdle he had left behind him there. He ſaid alſo, that wiſe men did learne and profite more by fooles, then fooles did by wiſe men. For wiſe men ſaide he, do ſee the faultes fooles commit, and can wiſely auoide them: but fooles neuer ſtudie to follow the example of wiſe mens doings. He ſaid alſo that he euer liked young men better that bluſhed, then thoſe that looked euer whitely: and that he would not haue him for a ſouldier, that wagges his hande as he goeth, remoues his feete when he fighteth, and rowteth and ſnorteth louder in his ſleepe, then when he cryeth out to his enemie. An other time when he would taunt a maruellous fatte man: ſee, ſaide he, what good can ſuch a body do to the commonwealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was giuen to pleaſure, and deſired to be great with him: my friend, ſaied Cato, as refuſing his acquaintance: I cannot liue with him that hath better iudgement in the pallate of his mouth, then in his hart. This was alſo his ſaying, that the ſoule of a louer, liued in anothers body: and that in all his life time he repented him of three things. The firſt was, if that he euer tolde ſecret to any woman: the ſecond, that euer he went by water, when he might haue gone by lande: the third, that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Alſo when he ſaw a vicious olde man, he would ſay, to reproue him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not beſides with your vice. And to a ſeditious Tribune of the people that was ſuſpected to be a poiſoner, and would needes paſſe ſome wicked law by voice of the people, he would ſay: O young man, I know not which of theſe two be worſe, to drinke the drugges thou giueſt, or to receiue the lawes thou offereſt. An other time, being reuiled by one that led a lewde and naughtie life: go thy way, ſaid he, I am no man to ſcolde with thee. For thou art ſo vſed to reuile, and to be reuiled, that it is not dainty to thee: But for my ſelfe, I neuer vſe to heare ſcolding, and much leſſe delight to ſcolde. Theſe be his wiſe ſayings we finde written of him, whereby we may the eaſilier coniecture his maners and nature. Now, when he was choſen Conſul with his friend Valerius Flaccus, the gouernment of SPAYNE fell to his lot, that is on this ſide of the riuer of BÆTIS. So, Cato hauing ſubdued many people by force of armes, and wonne others alſo by friendly meanes: ſodainly there came a maruellous great army of the barbarous people againſt him, and had enuironed him ſo, as he was in maruellous danger, either ſhamefully to be taken priſoner, or to bee ſlaine in the field. Wherefore, he ſent preſently vnto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours vnto the marches where he was. Theſe CELTIBBERIANS did aske him two hūdred talents to come & helpe him: but the ROMAINS, that were about him, could not abide to hire the barbarous people to defend them. Then Cato told them ſtraight, there was no hurt in it, nor any diſhonour vnto them. For ſayed he, if the field be ours, then we ſhall pay their wages we promiſed, with the ſpoile and money of our enemies: and if we loſe it, then our ſelues and they lie by it, being left neither man to paie, nor yet any to aske it. In the end hee wanne the battell, after a ſore conflict, and after that time he had maruellous good fortune. For Polybius writeth, that all the walles of the cities that were on this ſide the riuer of BÆTIS, were by his commaundement raſed all in one day, which were many, and full of good ſouldiers. Him ſelfe writeth, that hee tooke moe cities in SPAINE, then he remained there daies: and it is no vaine boaſt, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of them. Now, though the ſouldiers vnder him had gotten well in this iourney, and were rich, yet he cauſed a pound weight of ſiluer to be giuen to euery ſouldier beſides: ſaying, he liked it better that many ſhould returne home with ſiluer in their purſes, then a few of them with gold onely. But for himſelfe he affirmed: that of all the ſpoile gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, ſauing that which hee tooke in meate and drinke. And yet, ſaith he, I ſpeake it not to reproue them that grow rich by ſuch ſpoiles: but becauſe I would contend in vertue rather with the beſt, then in money with the richeſt, or in couetouſneſſe with the moſt vertuous. For, not onely he himſelfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his officers alſo vnder him kept the ſame courſe. In this Spaniſh iorney, he had fiue of his ſeruantes with him, whereof one of them called Pauus, bought three young boyes that were taken in the warres, when the ſpoile was ſold to them that would giue moſt. So Cato knew it. But Pauus being affraide to come neere his maiſter, hung himſelfe: and then Cato ſolde the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treaſurie cheſtes of ſauing at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAINE. Scipio the great that was his enemy, & ſought to hinder the courſe of his proſperitie, and to haue the honour of conquering all the reſt of SPAYNE: he made all the friendes he could to the people, to be choſen in Catoes place. He was no ſooner entred into his charge, but he made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authoritie ceaſe the ſooner. Cato hearing of his haſtie comming, tooke only fiue enſignes of footemen, and fiue hundred horſmen to attend vpon him home: with the which, in his iorney homeward, he ouercame a people in SPAYNE called the LACETANIANS, and tooke ſixe hundred traitors alſo that were fled from the ROMAINES campe to their enemies, and did put to death euery mothers childe of them. Scipio ſtorming at that, ſaid Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, ſaid: it was the right way to bring ROME to floriſh, when noble borne citizens would not ſuffer meane borne men, and vpſtarts as himſelfe was, to go before them in honor: and on the other ſide when meane borne men would contend in vertue, with thoſe that were of nobleſt race, and farre aboue them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to ROME, the Senate commaunded that nothing ſhould be changed nor altered otherwiſe, then Cato had appointed it, whileſt he was in his office. So that the gouernment for which Scipio made ſuch earneſt ſute in SPAYNE, was a greater diſgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: becauſe he paſſed al his time & office in peace, hauing no occaſion offered him to do any notable ſeruice worthy memorie. Furthermore, Cato after he had bene Conſull, and had graunted to him the honor to triumphe: did not as many others doe, that ſeeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honor and dignity. Who, when they haue bene called to the higheſt offices of ſtate, as to be Conſuls, and haue alſo granted them the honour to triumphe: do then leaue to deale any more in matters of ſtate, & diſpoſe themſelues to liue merrily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themſelues any more. Now Cato, farre otherwiſe behaued himſelfe. For he would neuer leaue to exerciſe vertue, but began a freſh, as if he had bene a young noueſſe in the worlde, and as one greedy of honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleaſure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and plead their cauſes for them that required his counſell, and goe with his friends alſo into the warres. As he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Conſull, and was one of his Lieutenants at the conqueſt of the countrey of THRACE, and vnto the prouinces adioyning to the riuer of DANVBYE vpon thoſe marches. After that, he was in GREECE alſo, Collonell of a thouſand footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, againſt king Antiochus ſurnamed the great, who made the ROMAINES ſo much affraid of him, as euer they were of enemy but Hanniball. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of ASIA, which Seleucus Nicanor enioyed before, & had ſubdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was ſo proud hearted, as he would needs haue wars with the ROMAINS, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and beſt able to fight with him. So he made ſome honeſt ſhew and pretence of warres, ſaying: it was to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty, who had no cauſe thereof, conſidering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philip, and of the MACEDONIANS, through the goodneſſe of the ROMAINES. Notwithſtanding, he came out of ASIA into GREECE with a maruellous great army, and all GREECE was ſtraight in armes and in wonderfull daunger, becauſe of the great promiſes and large hopes the gouernours of diuerſe cities (whom the king had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto them. Whereupon Manius diſpatched Ambaſſadors vnto the citie, and ſent Titus Quintius Flaminius among others, who kept the greateſt part of the people from rebelling (that were eaſily drawen to giue eare to this innouation) as we haue expreſſed more amply in his life: and Cato being ſent Ambaſſadour alſo, perſwaded the CORINTHIANS, thoſe of PATRAS, and the ÆGIANS, and made them ſticke ſtill to the ROMAINES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some ſay they finde an oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which hee made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their aunceſtors: wherein he ſaid, he tooke great pleaſure to ſee ATHENS, for the beautie and ſtatelineſſe of the citie. But this is falſe. For he ſpake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he could haue vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had beene diſpoſed: but he did like the lawes and cuſtomes of his owne countrie, and the ROMAINE tongue ſo well, that he laughed at them that would praiſe and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Poſthumius Albinus, who wrote an hiſtorie in the Greeke tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the tongue: mary, ſaide Cato, he had deſerued pardon in deede, if he had beene forced to haue written his ſtorie in the Greeke tongue, by order of the ſtates of GRECE, called the councel of the Amphictyons. They ſay the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his ready tongue. For what he had vttered quickly in few words vnto the interpreter: the interpreter was driuen to deliuer them againe with great circumſtances, and many wordes. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words lay all in their lips, and the ROMAINES wordes in their heads. Now king Antiochus kept all the ſtraites and narrow paſſages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary way and entry into GRECE) and had fortified them aſwell with an armie that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as alſo with walles and trenches he had made by hand, beſides the naturall ſtrength and fortification of the mount itſelfe in ſundry places: and ſo he determined to remaine there, truſting to his owne ſtrength and fortifications aforeſaid, and to turne the force of the warres ſome other way. The ROMAINES alſo, they deſpaired vtterly they ſhould be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembring with himſelfe the compaſſe the PERSIANS had fetched about before time likewiſe to enter into GRECE: he departed one night from the campe with part of the armie: to proue if he could finde the verie compaſſe about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the mountaine, their guide that was one of the priſoners taken, in the countrie, loſt his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruellous ſteepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore ſouldiers were in maruelous ill taking. Cato ſeeing the danger they were brought into by this lewde guide, commaunded all his ſouldiers not to ſturre a foot from thence, and to tarry him there: and in the meane time he went himſelfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him (a luſtie man, and nimble to climbe vpon the rockes) and ſo went forwarde at aduenture, taking extreame and vncredible paine, and in as much danger of his life, grabbing all night in the darke without moone light, through wilde Olyue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not ſee before them, neither could tell whither they went) vntill they ſtumbled at the length vppon a litle path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they ſet vppe certaine markes and tokens, vppon the higheſt toppes of the rockes they could chooſe, by view of eye to be diſcerned furtheſt off vppon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the ſouldiers, whom they led towardes their markes they had ſet vp: vntill at the length they found their path way againe, where they putte their ſouldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way fayled them ſtraight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worſe caſe then before, and in greater feare, not knowing they were ſo neare their enemies, as in deede they were. The day began to breake a litle, and one of them that marched formoſt, thought he heard a noiſe, and that he ſaw the GREEKES campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine ſouldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made thẽ ſtay, and willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, becauſe hee had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a triſe to know his pleaſure: ſo Cato ſayd vnto them.

My fellowes, I muſt haue ſome of our enemies taken priſoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that paſſage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they are camped and armed, and after what ſort they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke this feate ſtandeth vpon ſwiftneſſe and hardineſſe to runne vpon them ſodainely, as Lions doe, which being naked feare not to runne into the middeſt of any heard of fearefull beaſtes.

Cato aduertiſed of the ſtrength of king Antiochus campe.

He had no ſooner ſpoken theſe wordes, but the FIRMANIAN ſouldiers beganne to runne downe the mountaine as they were, vpon thoſe that kept the watch: and ſo ſetting vpon them, they being out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man priſoner. When they had him, they ſtraight brought him vnto Cato, who by oath of the priſoner, was aduertiſed howe that the ſtrength of their enemies armie was lodged about the perſon of the king, within the ſtraight and valley of the ſaide mountaine: and that the ſouldiers they ſaw, were ſixe hundred ÆTOLIANS, all braue ſouldiers, whom they had choſen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer king Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making ſmall account of the matter, as well for their ſmall number, as alſo for the ill order they kept: he made the trumpets ſound ſtraight, and his ſouldiers to march in battell with great cries, himſelfe being the formoſt man of all his troupe, with a ſword drawen in his hand.

Cato tooke the ſtraight of Thermopyles.

But when the ÆTOLIANS ſaw them comming downe the rockes towardes them, they beganne to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all diſorder. Now Manius at the ſame preſent alſo, gaue an aſſault vnto the walles and fortifications the king had made, ouerthwart the vallies and ſtraights of the mountaines: at which aſſault king Antiochus ſelfe had a blow on the face with a ſtone, that ſtrake ſome of his teeth out of his mouth, ſo that for very paine and anguiſh he felt, he turned his horſe back, and got him behinde the preaſe.

And then there were none of his armie that made any more reſiſtance, or that could abide the fierceneſſe of the ROMAINES. But notwithſtanding that the places were very ill for flying, becauſe it was vnpoſſible for them to ſcatter and ſtraggle, being holden in with high rockes on the one ſide of them, and with bogges and deepe mariſſes on the other ſide, which they muſt needes fall into if their feete ſlipped, or were thruſt forward by any: yet they fell one vpon an other in the ſtraights, and ranne ſo in heapes together, that they caſt themſelues away, for feare of the ROMEINES ſwords that lighted vpon them in euery corner.

And there Marcus Cato, that neuer made ceremonie or niſeneſſe to praiſe himſelfe openly, nor reckoned it any ſhame to do it: did take a preſent occaſion for it, as falleth out vpon all victorie and famous exploites. And ſo did ſet it out with all the oſtentation and braue words he could giue.

Cato would praiſe his owne doings.

For he wrote with his owne hands, and ſuch as ſaw him chaſe and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driuen to ſay, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINS, but the ROMAINS bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Conſull ſelfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was alſo hotte with chaſing of the enemie: and ſpake aloude with great ioy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of ROME could recompence Cato for his valiant ſeruice that day.

Manius ſendeth Cato to Rome to cary newes of the victory.

After this battell, the Conſull Manius ſent Cato to ROME, to be the meſſenger him ſelfe to report the newes of the victory. So hee imbarked incontinently, and had ſuch a faire winde, that he paſſed ouer the ſeas to BRINDES without any daunger, and went from thence vnto TARENTVM in one day, and from TARENTVM in foure daies more to ROME. And ſo he came to ROME in fiue dayes after his landing in ITALIE, and made ſuch ſpeede, that him ſelfe was in deede the firſt meſſenger that brought newes of the victory. Whereupon he filled all ROME with ioy and ſacrifices, and made the ROMAINES ſo proude, that euer after they thought them ſelues able men to conquer the world both by ſea and land. And theſe bee all the martiall deedes and noble actes Cato did.

But for his doings in ciuill policy and ſtate, he ſeemed to be of this opinion. That to accuſe and purſue the wicked, he thought it was the beſt thing an honeſt man and good gouernour of the common wealth could employ him ſelfe vnto: for he accuſed many, and ſubſcribed many other accuſations which they preferred. And to be ſhort, he did alwaies ſtirre vp ſome accuſer, as he did Petilius againſt Scipio. But Scipio, by reaſon of his nobility, the greatnes of his houſe, and the magnanimity of his minde, paſſed not for any accuſation they could lay againſt him: being out of all feare, they ſhould be able to condemne him. And ſo he let fall the accuſation he had againſt gainſt him. Notwithſtanding,he ioyned with other that accuſed Lucius Scipio,his own brother, and followed the matter ſo ſore againſt him, that he cauſed him to be condemned in a great ſumme of money to the cõmon wealth : who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to priſon,and hardly ſcaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people reuoked his condemnation. It is ſaid that Cato comming through the market place one day, and meeting with a young man by the waye that had ouerthrowne his aduerſarie in ſute, and put one of his late fathers greateſt enemies to open ſhame and ſoyle before the people: he imbraced him with a good countenance, and ſayed vnto him. Oh my ſonne, ſacrifices that good children ſhould offer to their fathers ſoule, be not lambes nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, ſo he ſcaped not free himſelfe from danger, in adminiſtration of the commonwelth. For if they could catch the leaſt vantage in the world of him,his enemies ſtraight accuſed him : ſo as they ſay he was accuſed almoſt a fifty times, and at the laſt time of his accuſation,he was about the age of foureſcore yeares. And then he ſpake a thing openly that was noted : that it was a harder thing to giue vp an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongſt whome he liued. And yet was not this the laſt ſute he followed : for foure yeares after,when he was foureſcore and tenne yeares of age,he accuſed Seruius Galba. And thus he liued as Neſtor, in manner three ages of man, alwayes in continuall ſute & action. For when he wreſtled with the firſt Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of ſtate and commonwealth : he went on vnto the time of the ſecond, that was adopted by the firſt Scipioes ſonne,the naturall ſonne of Paulus AEmilius, who ouercame Perſeus king of MACEDON. Furthermore,Marcus Cato tenne yeares after his Conſulſhip,ſued to be Cenſor, which was in ROME the greateſt office of dignity that any citizen of ROME could attaine vnto: & as a man may ſay, the roome of all glory and honour of their common wealth. For among other authorities, the Cenſor had power to examin mens liues and manners,and to puniſh euery offendor. For the ROMAINES were of that minde,that they would not haue men marry, beget children, liue priuately by themſelues, and make feaſtes and banquets at their pleaſure, but that they ſhould ſtand in feare to be reproued and inquired of by the magiſtrate : and that it was not good to giue euery body liberty,to do what they would,following his owne luſt and fanſie. And they iudging that mens naturall diſpoſitions do appeare more in ſuch things,then in all other things that are openly done at noone dayes, and in the ſight of the world : vſed to chooſe two Cenſors,that were two Surueyors of mãners,to ſee that euery man behaued himſelfe vertuouſly,and gaue not themſelues to pleaſure, nor to breake the lawes and cuſtomes of the common wealth. Theſe officers were called in their tongue,Cenſores, and alwayes of cuſtome one of them was a PATRICIAN,and the other a cõmoner. Theſe two had power & authoritie to diſgrade a knight by taking away his horſe,and to put any off the Senate,whom they ſaw liue diſſolutely and diſorderly. It was their office alſo,to ceſſe and rate euery cittizen according to the eſtimation of their goodes, to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man,and to keepe bookes of them, beſides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therefore when Cato came to ſue for this office among other, the chiefeſt Senators were all bent againſt him. Some of them for very enuy, thinking it ſhame and diſhonor to the nobility, to ſuffer men that were meanely borne, and vpſtartes ( the firſt of their houſe and name,that euer came to beare office in the ſtate) to be called and preferred vnto the higheſt offices of ſtate in all their cõmon wealth. Other alſo that were ill liuers, & knowing that they had offended the lawes of their coũtry: they feared his cruelty too much,imagining he would ſpare no man,nor pardon any offence,hauing the law in his own hands. So when they had conſulted together about it,they did ſet vp ſeuen competitors againſt him,who flattered the people with many fayre words and promiſes, as though they had neede of magiſtrates to vſe them gentely, and to doe things for to pleaſe them. But Cato contrariwiſe,ſhewing no countenance that he would vſe them gentely in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning thoſe that had liued naughtily and wickedly,he cryed out: that they muſt reforme their citie, and perſwaded the people not to chooſe the gentleſt, but the ſharpeſt phiſitions : and that himſelfe was ſuch an one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaccus an other,in whoſe company he hoped ( they two being choſen Cenſors ) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydras heades) all vanitie and voluptuous pleaſures, that were crept in amongeſt them: and that he ſaw well enough, how all the other ſuters ſought the office by diſhoneſt meanes, fearing ſuch officers as they knew would deale iuſtly and vprightly. Then did the people of ROME ſhew themſelues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours.

For they refuſed not the ſowerneſſe or ſeuerity of Cato, but reiected thoſe meale-mouthed men, that ſeemed ready to pleaſe the people in all things: and thereupon choſe Marcus Cato Cenſor, and Valerius Flaccus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had beene preſent officer, and no ſuter for the office, being in themſelues to giue it to whom they thought good.

Cato put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Senate.

The firſt thing he did after he was ſtalled in his Cenſorſhip, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus, his frend & fellow Cenſor with him, prince of the Senate: & among many other alſo whom he thruſt out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Senate, that had bene Conſul ſeuen yeares before, and was brother alſo vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius that ouercame Philip king of MACEDON in battell, which was greater glory to him, then that he had bene Conſul. But the cauſe why he put him off the Senate, was this.

This Lucius Quintius caried euer with him a young boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credit vnto, as to any of his beſt familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a time whileſt Lucius Quintius was Conſul and gouernour of a prouince, that he made a feaſt, and this boy being ſet at his table, hard by him, as his manner was, he beganne to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was pretily merry: and ſoothing him, told him he loued him ſo deerly, that vpon his departing frõ ROME, when the Swordplayers were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated ſwords to ſhew the people paſtime, he came his way, and left the ſight of that he neuer ſaw, that was very deſirous to haue ſeene a man killed. Then this Lucius Quintius, to make him ſee the like, ſayed: care not for the ſight thou haſt loſt, boy, for I will let thee ſee as much.

And when he had ſpoken theſe wordes, he commaunded a priſoner, condemned to dye, to be fetched and brought into his hall before him, and the hangman with his axe. Which was forthwith done according to his commaundement. Then asked he the boy, if hee would ſtraight ſee the man killed: yea ſir, ſayed the boy: and with that he bad the hangman ſtrike off his head. Moſt writers report this matter thus. And Cicero to confirme it alſo, wrote in his booke de Senectute that the ſame was written in an oration Cato made before the people of ROME. Now Lucius Quintius being thus ſhamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus being offended withall, could not tell what to doe, but beſought the people that they would commaund Cato to declare the cauſe, why he brought ſuch ſhame vnto his houſe. Whereupon Cato openly before the people, made recitall of all this feaſt. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not ſo: Cato would haue had him ſworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who ſayed he would not ſweare: Whereupon the people iudged ſtraight that he deſerued well that ſhame. So not long after, certaine games being ſhewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and paſſing beyonde the ordinary place that was appointed for thoſe that had been Conſuls, he went to ſit aloofe off amongeſt the multitude. The people tooke pity on him, and made ſuch a do about him, as they forced him to riſe, and to go ſit among the other Senators that had bene Conſuls: ſaluing the beſt they could, the ſhame and diſhonor happened vnto ſo noble a houſe.

Merry with married men when Iupiter thundereth.

Cato put out of the Senate alſo, one Manlius, who was in great towardnes to haue beene made Conſul the next yeare following, onely becauſe he kiſſed his wife too louingly in the day time, and before his daughter: and reprouing him for it, he tolde him, his wife neuer kiſſed him, but when it thundered. So when he was diſpoſed to be merry, he would ſay it was happy with him whẽ Iupiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horſe from him, that had triumphed for the victories he had won of the great king Antiochus: which wan him much ill will, becauſe it appeared to the world he did it of purpoſe, for the malice he did beare Scipio the AFRICAN, that was dead.

But the thing that moſt grieued the people, of all other extreamities he vſed, was his putting downe of all feaſtes and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly ſeene in it, it was vnpoſſible, becauſe it was ſo common a thing, and euery man was giuẽ ſo to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praiſe euery citizens goodes, and rated their apparell, their coches, their litters, their wiues chaines and iewels, and all other moueables and houſehold ſtuffe, that had coſt aboue a thouſand fiue hundred Drachmes a peece, at tenne times as much as they were worth: to the end that ſuch as had beſtowed their money in thoſe curious trifles, ſhould pay ſo much more ſubſidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer he ordained for euery thouſand Aſſes that thoſe trifling things were praiſed at, the owners thereof ſhould pay three thouſand Aſſes to the common treaſury: to the end that they who were grieued with this taxe, and ſawe other pay leſſe ſubſidy (that were as much worth as themſelues, by liuing without ſuch toyes) might call home themſelues againe, and lay aſide ſuch fooliſh brauery and fineneſſe. Notwithſtanding Cato, was enuied euery way. Firſt, of them that were contented to pay the taxe impoſed, rather then they would leaue their vanity: and next, of them alſo, that would rather reforme themſelues, then pay the taxe. And ſome thinke that this law was deuiſed rather to take away their goods, then to let them to make any ſhewe of them: and they haue a fond opinion beſides, that their riches are better ſeene in ſuperfluous things, then in neceſſarie. Whereat they ſay Ariſtotle the Philoſopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and ſuperfluous things, then thoſe that had neceſſary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, whẽ one of his familiar frends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, & to make him grant it the ſooner, told him it was a thing he might well ſpare, and did him no good: marry ſayeth he, all the goods I haue, are in ſuch toyes as do me no good. So this couetous deſire we haue to be rich, commeth of no neceſſarie deſire in nature, but is bred in vs by a falſe opinion from the common ſort. Now Cato caring leaſt of all for the exclamations they made againſt him, grewe to be more ſtraight and ſeuere. For he cut off the pipes and quilles priuate men had made to cõuey water into their houſes & gardens, robbing the city of the water that came frõ their cõmon conduite heads, and did plucke downe alſo mens porches that were made before their dores into the ſtreete, and brought down the priſes of cõmon works in the city, and moreouer raiſed the common farmes and cuſtomes of the city, as high as he could: all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of moſt men. Wherefore, Titus Flaminius, and certaine other being bent againſt him in open Senate, cauſed all Catoes couenants and bargains made, with the maſter work-man for repairing and mending of the common buildings and holy places, to be made voyde, as things greatly preiudiciall to the common wealth. And they did alſo ſtirre vp the boldeſt and raſheſt of the Tribunes of the people againſt him, becauſe they ſhould accuſe him vnto the people, and make requeſt he might be condemned in the ſumme of two talents. They did maruellouſly hinder alſo the building of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate houſe: which pallace was finiſhed notwithſtanding, and called after his name, Baſilica Porcia: as who would ſay, the pallace Porcius the Cenſor built. Howbeit it ſeemed the people of ROME did greatly like and commend his gouernment in the Cenſorſhip. For they ſet vp a ſtatue of him in the tẽple of the goddeſſe of health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nor triumph, but onely ingraued this inſcription word for word, to this effect by tranſlation: For the honor of Marcus Cato the Cenſor: becauſe he reformed the diſcipline of the common wealth of ROME (that was farre out of order, and giuen to licentious life) by his wiſe precepts, good manners, and holy inſtitutions. Indeed, before this image was ſet vp for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were deſirous of ſuch things: ſaying; they did not conſider how they bragged in founders, painters and image makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for himſelfe, the people did alwaies carry liuely images of him in their hartes, meaning the memory of his life and doings. When ſome wondred why diuerſe meane men & vnknowne perſons had images ſet vp of thẽ, and there were none of him: he gaue them this anſwer. I had rather men ſhould aske why Cato had no image ſet vp for him, then why he had any. In the end, he would haue no honeſt mã abide to be praiſed, vnles his praiſe turned to the benefit of the cõmon wealth: and yet was he one of them that would moſt praiſe himſelfe. So that if any had done a fault, or ſtept awry, and that men had gone about to reproue them: he would ſay they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offend. And ſuch as counterfeated to follow any of his doings, and came ſhort of his manner, he called them left handed Catoes. He would ſay that in moſt daungerous times the Senate vſed to caſt their eyes vpon him, as paſſengers on the ſea do looke vpon the maſter of the ſhippe in a ſtorme: and that many times when he was abſent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other as by himſelfe. His authoritie was great in matters of ſtate, for his wiſdome, his eloquence, and great experience. Beſides this commendation, they praiſed him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, and a good ſauer for his profit: for he was neuer careleſſe of them, as things to be lightly paſſed on. And therefore me thinkes I muſt needes tell you by the way ſome part of his wel doing, to follow our declaration of him. Firſt of all he married a gentlewomā more noble then rich, knowing that either of both ſhould make her proud and ſtout enough: but yet he thought the nobler borne, would be the more aſhamed of diſhoneſty, then the meaner borne: and therefore they would be more obedient to their husbandes, in all honeſt manner and reaſonable things. Furthermore, he ſayed: that he that bet his wife or his childe, did commit as great a ſacriledge, as if he polluted or ſpoyled the holieſt thinges of the worlde: and he thought, it a greater praiſe for a man to be a good husband then a good Senator. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of olde Socrates, then his patience, in vſing his wife well, that was ſuch a ſhrewe, and his children that were ſo harebrainde. After Catoes wife had brought him a ſonne, he coulde not haue ſo earneſt buſines in hand, if it had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, to go home to his houſe, about the time his wife did vnſwadell the young boy to waſh and ſhift him: for ſhe gaue it ſucke with her owne breaſts, and many times would let the ſlaues children ſucke of her alſo, becauſe they might haue a naturall loue towardes her ſonne, hauing ſucked one milke, and beene brought vp together. When his ſonne was come to age of diſcretion, and that he was able to learne any thing, Cato himſelfe did teach him, notwithſtanding he had a ſlaue in his houſe called Chilo (a very honeſt man, and a good Grammarian) who did alſo teach many other: but as he ſayed himſelfe, he did not like, a ſlaue ſhould rebuke his ſonne, nor pull him by the eares, when peraduenture he was not apt to take very ſodainly that was taught him: neither would he haue his ſonne bounde to a ſlaue for ſo great a matter as that, as to haue his learning of him. Wherefore he himſelfe taught him his grammer, the lawe, and to excerciſe his body, not onely to throwe a dart, to play at the ſword, to vawte, to ride a horſe, and to handle all ſortes of weapons, but alſo to fight with fiſtes, to abide colde and heate, and to ſwim ouer a ſwift running riuer. He ſayed moreouer, that he wrote goodly hiſtories in great letters with his owne hand, becauſe his ſonne might learne in his fathers houſe the vertues of good men in times paſt, that he taking example by their doings, ſhould frame his life to excell them. He ſayed alſo, that he tooke as great heed of ſpeaking any foule or vncomely words before his ſonne, as he would haue done if he had been before the Veſtall Nunnes. He neuer was in the hotte houſe with his ſonne: for it was a common vſe with the ROMAINES at that time, that the ſonnes in law did not bathe themſelues with their fathers in lawe, but were aſhamed to ſee one another naked. But afterwardes they hauing learned of the GREEKES to waſh themſelues naked with men, it taught them alſo to be naked in the bathe euen with their wiues. There lacked no towardlines, nor good diſpoſitiō in Catoes ſonne, to frame himſelfe vertuous: for he was of ſo good a nature, that he ſhewed himſelfe willing to followe whatſoeuer his father had taught him. Howbeit he was ſuch a weake puling, that he could not away with much hardneſſe. & therefore his father was contēted not to binde him to that ſtraight and painefull life, which himſelfe had kept. Yet he became valiant in the warres. For he fought maruellous ſtoutly in the battell, in which Perſeus king of MACEDON was ouerthrowen by Paulus AEmilius: where his ſword being ſtricken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reaſon his hand was ſomewhat ſweaty beſides, he fell into a great fury and prayed of his frends about him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemies in that place where his ſword fell out of his hand, & came in ſo fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them, and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much a do, being vnder ſuch a heape of dead bodies and other weapons as well

ROMAINES as MACEDONIANS, one lying on an other. Paulus Æmilius the generall hearing of this act of his, did highly cõmend the young man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his ſonne, in the which he praiſeth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the recouering of his ſworde againe. Afterwardes, this Cato the younger maried Tertia, one of Paulus AEmilius daughters, and ſiſter vnto Scipio the ſecond, & ſo was matched in this noble houſe, not only for his own vertues ſake, but for reſpect of his fathers dignity and authority: whereby the great care, paines and ſtudy that Cato the father tooke in bringing vp his ſon, in vertue and learning, was honorably rewarded in the happy beſtowing of his ſonne. He euer had a great number of young litle ſlaues which he bought, when any would ſell their priſoners in the warres. He did chooſe them thus young, becauſe they were apt yet to learne any thing he would traine them vnto, & that a man might breake thẽ, like yoũg coltes, or litle whelps. But none of them all, how many ſoeuer he had, did euer go to any mans houſe, but whẽ himſelfe or his wife did ſend them. If any man asked them what Cato did: they anſwered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they muſt needs be occupied about ſomewhat, or elſe they muſt ſleepe: for he loued them well that were ſleepy, holding opinion that ſlaues that loued ſleepe were more tractable, and willing to do any thing a man would ſet them to, then thoſe that were waking. And becauſe he thought that nothing did more prouoke ſlaues to miſchiefe and naughtines, then luſt & deſire of women: he was contented his ſlaues might company with his bondwomen in his houſe, for a peece of money he appointed them to pay, but with ſtraight commaundement beſides, that none of them ſhould deale with any other woman abroad. At the firſt when he gaue himſelfe to followe the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his ſeruants did about his perſon: ſaying that it was a foule thing for a gentleman or noble man, to fall out with his ſeruants for his belly. Afterwardes, as he roſe to better ſtate, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or ſupper for any of his friends and familiars, they were no ſooner gone, but he would ſcourge them with whips and leather thongs, that had not waited as they ſhould haue done at the borde, or had forgotten any thing he would haue had done. He would euer craftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they ſhould be friends, being euer iealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deſerued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to dye, he would put him to death before thẽ all. Howbeit in his latter time he grew greedie, and gaue vp his tillage, ſaying that it was more pleaſant, thẽ profitable. Therefore becauſe he would lay out his mony ſurely, & bring a certen reuenue to his purſe, he beſtowed it vpon ponds, and naturall hotte bathes, places fit for fullers craft, vpon meadows and paſtures, vpon copiſes and young wood: and of all theſe he made a great & a more quiet reuenue yearely, which he would ſay, Iupiter himſelfe could not diminiſh. Furthermore, he was a great vſurer, both by land and by ſea: and the vſurie he tooke by ſea, was moſt extreame of all other, for he vſed it in this ſort. He would haue them to whom he lent his money vnto, that trafficked by ſea, to haue many partners, and to the nũber of fifty: and that they ſhould haue ſo many ſhippes. Then he would venture among them for a part only, whereof Quintius his ſlaue whom he had manumiſſed, was made his factor, & vſed to ſayle, and traficke with the marchantes, to whom he had lent his money out to vſury. Aud thus he did not venture all the money he lent, but a litle peece only for his part, and got maruellous riches by his vſury. Moreouer he lent monie to any of his ſlaues, that would therwith buy other yoũg ſlaues, whom they taught & brought vp to do ſeruice, at Catoes charge and coſt: & then they ſold them againe at the yeares end, and ſome of them Cato kept for his owne ſeruice, and gaue his ſlaues as much for them, as any other offred. Therefore to allure his ſon in like manner to make profit of his money: he told him it was no wiſe mans part to diminiſh his ſubſtance, but rather the parte of a widdowe. Yet this was a token of a moſt greedy couetous minde, that he durſt affirme him to be diuine, and worthy immortall praiſe, that increaſed his wealth and patrimony more, then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was grown very old, Carneades the ACADEMICKE, and Diogenes the STOICKE, were ſent from ATHENS as Ambaſſadors to ROME, to ſue for a releaſe of a fine of fiue hundred talents which they had impoſed on the ATHENIANS vpon a condẽnatiõ paſſed againſt thẽ for a contempt of appearaunce, by the ſentence of the SICYONIANS, at the ſute of the OROPIANS. Immediately whē theſe two Philoſophers were arriued in the city of ROME, the yoūg gentlemen that were giuen to their bookes, did viſit and welcome them, and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them ſpeake, and ſpecially to Carneades: whoſe grace in ſpeaking, and force of perſwading was no leſſe, then the fame ranne vpon him, and ſpecially when he was to ſpeake in ſo great an audience, and before ſuch a ſtate, as would not ſuppreſſe his praiſe. ROME ſtraight was full, as if a winde had blown this rumor into euery mans eare: that there was a GRECIAN arriued, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence would leade a man as he luſt. There was no other talke a while through the whole city, he had ſo inflamed the young gentlemens mindes with loue and deſire to be learned: that all other pleaſures and delightes were ſet aſide, and they diſpoſed themſelues to no other excerciſe, but to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, as if ſome ſecret and diuine inſpiration from aboue had procured them to it. Whereof the Lordes and Senators of ROME were glad, and reioyced much to ſee their youth ſo well giuen to knowledge, and to the ſtudie of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the company of theſe two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from the beginning that young men beganne to ſtudie the Greeke tongue, and that it grew in eſtimation in ROME, did diſlike of it: fearing leaſt the youth of ROME that were deſirous of learning and eloquence, would vtterly giue ouer the honour and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he ſawe the eſtimation and fame of theſe two perſonages did increaſe more and more, and in ſuch ſort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefeſt of the Senate made ſute to be their interpretour: he determined then to conuey them out of the cittie by ſome honeſt meane and colour. So he openly found fault one daye in the Senate, that the ambaſſadours were long there, and had no diſpatch: conſidering alſo they were cunning men, and could eaſily perſwade what they would. And if there were no other reſpect, this only might perſwade them to determine ſome anſwer for thē, and ſo to ſend them home againe ſo to their ſchooles, to teach their children of GRECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he ſpake this to the Senate, not of any priuate ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as ſome men thought: but becauſe he generally hated Philoſophy, and of ambition deſpiſed the muſes and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more ſuſpected, becauſe he had ſayed, the anciēt Socrates was but a buſy man, & a ſturrer vp of ſedition, and ſought by all meanes poſſible to vſurpe tiranny, and rule in his coūtrie: by peruerting & changing the manners & cuſtōs of the ſame, and alluring the ſubiectes thereof to a diſliking of their lawes and auncient cuſtomes. And he laughed at Socrates ſchoole, that taught the arte of eloquēce: ſaying his ſcholers waxed olde, and were ſtill ſo long in learning, that they ment to vſe their eloquence and pleade cauſes in an other world, before Minos when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his ſonne from the ſtudie of the Greeke tongue, he ſayed to him with a ſtrained voyce, and in a bigger ſound then he was wont to do: (as if he had ſpoken to him by way of prophecy or inſpiration) that ſo long as the ROMAINES diſpoſed themſelues to ſtudie the Greeke tongue, ſo long would they mar and bring all to naught. And yet time hath proued his vaine words falſe and vntrue. For the cittie of ROME did neuer flouriſh ſo much, nor the ROMAINE Empire was euer ſo great, as at that time, when learning and the Greeke tongue moſt flouriſhed. Howbeit Cato did not onely hate the philoſophers of GRECE, but did diſlike them alſo, that profeſſed phiſicke in ROME. For he had either heard or read the anſwer Hippocrates made, when the king of PERSIA ſent for him, & offred him a great ſumme of gold and ſiluer, if he would come and ſerue him: who ſware he would neuer ſerue the barbarous people, that were naturall enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed, it was an oth that all other phiſitians ſware euer after: wherefore he commaunded his ſonne to flye from them all alike, and ſayed he had written a litle booke of phiſicke, with the which he did heale thoſe of his houſe when they were ſicke, and did keepe them in health when they were whole. He neuer forbad them to eate, but did alwaies bring them vp with hearbes, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringdoues and hares: for ſuch meates, ſayed he, are good for the ſicke, and light of digeſtion, ſauing that they make them dreame and ſnort that eate them. He boaſted alſo how with this maner of phiſicke, he did alwaies keepe himſelfe in health, and his family from ſickneſſe. Yet for all that, I take it he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife, and his ſonne alſo. But he himſelfe was of a ſtrong nature, and a luſtie bodie, full of ſtrength, and health, and liued long without ſickeneſſe: ſo that when he was a very olde man and paſt mariage, he loued women well, and married a young maiden for that cauſe onely. After his firſt wife was dead, he maried his ſonne vnto Paulus Æmylius daughter, the ſiſter of Scipio, the ſecond AFRICAN. Cato him ſelfe being a widower, tooke paines with a pretie young maide that waited in his houſe, and came by ſtelth to his chamber: howbeit this haunt could not long continue ſecret in his houſe, and ſpecially where there was a young gentlewoman maried, but needs muſt be ſpied. So, one day when this young maide went ſomwhat boldly by the chamber of young Cato, to goe in to his father, the young man ſaid neuer a worde at it: yet his father perceiued that he was ſomewhat aſhamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his ſonne and daughter in law were angrie with the matter, ſaying nothing to them of it, nor ſhewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the market place (as his maner was) with a traine that followed him, amongeſt whom was one Salonius, that had bene his clearke, and waited vpon him as the reſt did. Cato calling him out aloude by his name, asked him if he had not yet beſtowed his daughter. Salonius aunſwered him, he had not yet beſtowed her, nor would not before he made him priuie to it. Then Cato tolde him againe: I haue found out a husbande for her, and a ſonne in lawe for thee, and it will be no ill match for her, vnleſſe ſhe miſlike the age of the man, for in deede hee is very olde, but otherwiſe there is no fault in him. Salonius tolde him againe, that for that matter, he referred all to him, and his daughter alſo, praying him euen to make what match he thought good for her: for ſhe was his humble ſeruant, and relyed wholly vppon him, ſtanding in neede of his fauour and furtherance. Then Cato beganne to diſcouer, and tolde him plainely hee would willingly marrie her himſelfe. Salonius therewith was abaſhed, becauſe he thought Cato was too olde to marrie then, and him ſelfe was no fit man to match in any honourable houſe, ſpecially with a Conſull and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the ende, when he ſawe Cato ment good earneſt, he was very glad of the match, and ſo with this talke they went on together to the market place, and agreed then vpon the marriage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the ſonne taking ſome of his kinne and friendes with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thing, that for ſpight he ſhould bring him a ſteppe mother into his houſe. Then his father cried out, and ſaid: O my ſonne, I pray thee ſay not ſo, I like well all thou doeſt, and I find no cauſe to complaine of thee: but I do it, becauſe I deſire to haue many children, and to leaue many ſuch like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some ſay that Piſiſtratus the tyrant of ATHENS, made ſuch a like aunſwere vnto the children of his firſt wife, which were men growen, whẽ he maried his ſecond wife Timonaſſa, of the towne of ARGOS, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Theſſalus. But to returne againe to Cato, he had a ſonne by his ſecond wife, whom he named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldeſt ſonne died in his office being Prætor, of whom he often ſpeaketh in diuerſe of his bookes, commending him for a very honeſt man. And they ſay, he tooke the death of him very paciently, and like a graue wiſe man, not leauing therefore to do any ſeruice or buſineſſe for the ſtate, otherwiſe then he did before. And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus ſurnamed P*ius*, did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of gouernment and ſtate, after they were waxen olde. For he thought it a charge and duetie, whereunto euery honeſt man whileſt he liued was bound in all pietie. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN had done before him, who perceiuing that the glorie and fame of his doings did purchaſe him the ill will of the citizens, he changed the reſt of his life into quietneſſe, and forſooke the citie and all dealings in cõmon wealth, and went & dwelt in the country. But as there was one that told Dionyſius the tirant of SYRACVSA, as it is written, that he could not die more honorably, then to be buried in the tyrannie: euen ſo did Cato thinke, that he could not waxe more honeſtly old, then in ſeruing of the common wealth vnto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was deſirous a litle to recreate and refreſh himſelfe, he paſſed his time away in making of bookes, and looking vppon his husbandry in the country. This is the cauſe why he wrote ſo many kindes of bookes and ſtories. But his tillage and husbandry in the country, he did tend and follow all in his youth, for his profit. For he ſaid he had but two ſortes of reuenue, tillage, and ſparing: but in age, whatſoeuer he did in the countrie, it was all for pleaſure, and to learne ſome thing euer of nature. For he hath written a booke of the countrie life, and of tillage, in the which he ſheweth how to make tartes and cakes, and howe to keepe frutes. He would needes ſhew ſuch ſingularity and skill in all things: when he was in his houſe in the country, he fared a litle better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and ſuch as had land lying about him, to come and ſuppe with him, and he would be merry with them: ſo that his companie was not onely pleaſant, and liking to old folkes as him ſelfe, but alſo to the younger ſort. For he had ſeene much, and had experience in manie things, and vſed much pleaſant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the borde one of the chiefeſt meanes to breede loue amongeſt men, and at his owne table would alwaies praiſe good men and vertuous citizens, but would ſuffer no talke of euill men, neither in their praiſe nor diſpraiſe. Now it is thought the laſt notable act and ſeruice he did in the common wealth, was the ouerthrow of CARTHAGE: for in deede he that wanne it and raſed it vtterly, was Scipio the ſecond, but it was chiefely through Catoes counſell & aduiſe, that the laſt warre was taken in hand againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, & chaunced vpon this occaſion. Cato was ſent into AFRICKE to vnderſtand the cauſe and controuerſie that was betwene the CARTHAGINIANS and Maſsiniſſa, king of NVMIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was ſent thither becauſe king Maſſiniſſa had euer bene a friend vnto the ROMAINES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates ſince the laſt wars, in the which they were ouerthrowen by Scipio the firſt, who tooke for a fine of them, a great part of their Empire, and impoſed vpon them beſides, a great yearely tribute. Nowe when he was come into that countrie, he found not the citie of CARTHAGE in miſerie, beggerie, and out of hart, as the ROMAINES ſuppoſed: but full of luſtie youthes very rich and wealthy, and great ſtore of armour and munition in it for the warres, ſo that by reaſon of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high ſaile, and ſtouped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMAINES to leaue to vnderſtand the controuerſies betwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Maſſiniſſa, and rather to prouide betimes to deſtroy CARTHAGE, that had bene euer an auncient enemie to the ROMAINES, and euer ſought to be reuenged of that they had ſuffered at their hands before, and that they were now growen to that greatneſſe and courage in ſo ſhort time, as in manner it was incredible: ſo as it was likely they would fall into as great enmitie with the ROMAINES, as they euer did before. Therefore ſo ſoone as he returned to ROME, he plainely told the Senate, that the loſſes and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had receiued by the laſt warres they had with them, had not ſo much diminiſhed their power and ſtrength, as the ſame had ſhewed their owne folly and lacke of wiſedome: for it was to be feared much, leaſt their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakened them for the warres. And that they made warres now with the NVMIDIANS, to exerciſe them onely, meaning afterwards to warre with themſelues: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermiſſion and ſtay of warres, onely expecting time and opportunity to breake with them againe. They ſay moreouer, that beſides the perſwaſions he vſed, he brought with him of purpoſe, AFRICKE figges in his long ſleeues, which he ſhooke out amongeſt them in the Senate. When the Senators maruelled to ſee ſo goodly faire greene figges, he ſaide: the countrie that beareth them, is not aboue three daies ſailing from ROME. But yet this is more ſtraunge which they report of him beſides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was euer the one end of his tale: me thinketh ſtill CARTHAGE would be vtterly deſtroyed. Publius Scipio Naſica, vſed euer in like manner the contrarie ſpeech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE ſhould ſtand. This Publius Scipio ſawe, in my opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and inſolency were full of abſurdities, and caried themſelues very high, by reaſon of their happy ſucceſſe and victories, and were ſo lofty minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reaſon of their great authoritie, they imagined they might bring their citie to what height they would. Therefore he ſpake it that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a bridle, to raigne in the inſolencie

Scipio Naſica, againſt Cato, for the deſtroying of Carthage of the people of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no ſufficient power to make wars with the ROMAINES, nor yet to ouercome them: & euen ſo were they not wholly to be deſpiſed, and not to be feared at all. Cato ſtill replied to the contrary, that therein conſiſted the greateſt danger of all: that a citie which was euer of great force & power, and had bene puniſhed by former warres & miſerie, would alwaies haue an eie of reuenge to their enemies, & be much like a horſe that had broken his haltar, that being vnbridled, would runne vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor ſound aduiſe, ſo to ſuffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their ſtrength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward daunger, and the feare they ſtood in to looſe their conqueſt: and ſpecially, when they left meanes within the citie ſelfe to fall ſtill againe to their former rebellion. And this is the cauſe why they ſuppoſe Cato was the occaſion of the third and laſt warre the ROMAINES had againſt the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the warre was begun, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would ſay, who it ſhould be that ſhould end thoſe wars. And it was Scipio the ſecond, who being a young man at that time, had charge only as a Colonell ouer a thouſand footmen: but in all battels, and whereſoeuer there was wars, he ſhewed himſelfe euer valiant and wiſe. Inſomuch as newes being brought thereof continually vnto ROME, and Cato hearing them, ſpake as they ſay, theſe two verſes of Homer:

This only man right wiſe, reputed is to be,
all other ſeeme but ſhadowes ſet, by ſuch wiſe men as he.

Which prophecie Scipio ſoone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreouer, the iſſue Cato left behinde him, was a ſonne he had by his ſecond wife: who was called (as we ſaid before) Cato SALONIAN, by reaſon of his mother, & a litle boy of his eldeſt ſon that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a ſonne behind him that came to be Conſull, & was grandfather vnto Cato the Philoſopher, one of the moſt vertuous men of his time.

Ariſtides with Marcus Cato.

NOW that we haue ſet downe in writing, theſe notable and worthy thinges of memorie: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhappes the difference betweene the one and the other will not eaſily be diſcerned, ſeeing there be ſo many ſimilitudes and reſemblances one of an other. But if wee come to compare them in euery particularitie, as we would do Poets works, or pictures drawen in tables: firſt, in this we ſhall finde them much a like, that hauing had nothing elſe to preferre and commend them, but their only vertue and wiſedom, they haue bene both gouernors

in their common wealth, and haue thereby atchieued to great honour and eſtimation. But me thinkes when Ariſtides came to deale in matters of ſtate, the common wealth and ſeigniorie of Athens was then of no great power, & therefore it was eaſie for him to ſet himſelfe in preaſe. Beſides, the other gouernors & captaines that were of his time, & competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authoritie. For the taxe of the richeſt perſons then at Athens in reuenue, was but at fiue hundred buſhels of corne and vpwards, and therefore were ſuch called Pentacoſiomedimni. The ſecond taxe was but at three hundred buſhels, and they were called knights. The third & laſt was at two hundred buſhels, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato comming out of a litle village from a rude countrie life, went at the firſt daſh (as it were) to plunge himſelfe into a bottomleſſe ſea of gouernement in the common wealth of Rome: which was not ruled then by ſuch gouernors and captaines, as Curius, Fabricius, and Oſtilius were in old time. For the people of Rome did no more beſtow their offices vpon ſuch meane labouring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they would looke now vpon the nobilitie of their houſes, and vpon their riches that gaue them moſt money, or ſued earneſtly to them for the offices. And by reaſon of their great power and authoritie, they would be waited vpon and ſued vnto, by thoſe that ſought to beare the honorable offices of the ſtate and common wealth. And it was no like match nor compariſon, to haue Themiſtocles an aduerſarie and competitor, being neither of noble houſe, nor greatly rich (for they ſay, that all the goods his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fiue hundred talents, when he began to deale in ſtate) in reſpect as to contend for the chiefeſt place of honour & authority againſt Scipio African, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, hauing no other maintenance, nor helpe to truſt vnto, but a tongue ſpeaking boldly with reaſon and all vprightnes. Moreouer, Ariſtides at the battels of Marathon, and of Platæes, was but one of the ten captaines of the Athenians: where Cato was choſen one of the two Conſuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Cenſors, before ſeuen other that made ſute for it, which were all men of great reputation in the citie, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Ariſtides was neuer the chiefeſt in any victorie. For at the battell of Marathon, Miltiades was the generall: and at the battell of Salamina, Themiſtocles: and at the iourney of Platæes, king Pauſanias, as Herodotus ſaith, who writeth that he had a maruellous victory there. And there were that ſtriued with Ariſtides for the ſecond place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable valiant ſeruice at thoſe battels. Now Cato was generall himſelfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthineſſe and counſell, during the warre he made in Spayne while he was Conſull. Afterwards alſo in the iourney where king Antiochus was ouerthrowen in the country of Thermopyles, Cato being but a Colonell of a thouſand footemen, and ſeruing vnder an other that was Conſull, wanne the honour of the victorie, when he did ſodainely ſet vpon Antiochus behind, wheras he looked only to defend himſelfe before. And that victorie without all doubt was one of the chiefeſt actes that euer Cato did, who draue Asia out of Grece, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to paſſe afterwardes into Asia. So then for the warres, neither the one nor the other of them was euer ouercome in battell: but in peace and ciuill gouernement, Ariſtides was ſupplanted by Themiſtocles, who by practiſe got him to be baniſhed Athens for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greateſt and nobleſt men of Rome that were in his time ſworne enemies vnto him, and hauing alwaies contended with them euen to his laſt houre, he euer kept him ſelfe on ſound grounde, like a ſtout champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foyle. For he hauing accuſed many before the people, and many alſo accuſing him: him ſelfe was neuer once condemned, but alwaies his tongue was the buckler and defence of his life and innocencie. Which was to him ſo neceſſarie a weapon, and with it he could help himſelfe ſo in great matters, that (in my opinion) it was only cauſe why he neuer receiued diſhonour, nor was vniuſtly condemned: rather then for any thing elſe he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truely, eloquence is a ſingular gift, as Antipater witneſſeth, in that he wrote of Ariſtotle the Philoſopher after his death: ſaying, that amongeſt many other ſingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perſwade what he liſted. Now there is a rule confeſſed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater

vertue or knowledge, then to knowe how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a citie: a part whereof is Oeconomia, cõmonly called houſerule, conſidering that a citie is no other, then an aſſembly of many houſholds & houſes together, and then is the citie commonly ſtrong and of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wiſe and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that baniſhed gold and ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, and coyned them money of iron, that would be marred with fire & vineger when it was hot, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not only cut off all ſuperfluous expences that commonly waite vpon riches, but did alſo prouide that his people ſhould lacke nothing neceſſarie to liue withall, fearing more to ſee a begger and needy perſon dwelling in his citie, and enioy the priuiledges of the ſame, then a proud man by reaſon of his riches. So me thinkes, Cato was as good a father to his houſehold, as he was a good gouernor to the common wealth: for he did honeſtly increaſe his goods, and did teach other alſo to doe the ſame, by ſauing and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof in his booke he wrote ſundry good rules and precepts. Ariſtides contrariwiſe, made iuſtice odious and ſlaunderous by his pouertie, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans ſelfe that vſed iuſtice. And yet Heſiodus the Poet, that commendeth iuſtice ſo much, doth wiſh vs withall to be good husbands, reprouing ſloth and idlenes, as the roote and originall of all iniuſtice. And therefore me thinkes Homer ſpake wiſely when he ſaid.

In times paſt, neither did I labour, carcke nor care for buſineſſe, for family, for foode, nor yet for fare:
but rather did delight, with ships the ſeaes to ſaile,
to draw a bow, to fling a dart in warres, and to preuaile.

The nature of oyle.

No man wiſe, that is not wiſe to himſelfe.

VVhether pouertie be an ill thing.

As giuing vs to vnderſtand that iuſtice & husbandry are two relatiues, & neceſſarily linked one to the other: and that a man who hath no care of his owne things, nor houſe, doth liue vniuſtly, and taketh from other men. For iuſtice is not like oyle, which Phiſitions ſay is very holſome for mans bodie, if it be applied outwardly: and in contrary manner very ill, if a man drinke it: neither ought a iuſt man to profite ſtraungers, and in the end not to care for him ſelfe nor his. Therefore, me thinkes this gouerning vertue of Ariſtides had a fault in this reſpect, if it be true that moſt authors write of him: that he had no care nor forecaſt with him to leaue ſo much, as to marrie his daughters withall, nor therewith to burie himſelfe. Where thoſe of the houſe of Cato, continued Prætors and Conſuls of ROME, euen vnto the fourth deſcent. For his ſonnes ſonnes, and yet lower, his ſonnes ſonnes ſonnes came to the greateſt offices of dignitie in ROME. And Ariſtides, who was in his time the chiefeſt man of GRECE, left his poſteritie in ſo great pouerty, that ſome were compelled to become Soothſaiers (that interprete dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy of him. But to contrary this, it might be ſaid, pouertie of it ſelfe is neither ill nor diſhoneſt: but where it groweth by idleneſſe, careleſſe life, vanitie, and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth vpon any man that is honeſt, and liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iuſt, valiant, wiſe, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great ſigne of a noble minde. For it is vnpoſſible that man ſhould doe any great thinges, that had ſuch a baſe minde as to thinke alwaies vppon trifles: and that he ſhould relieue the poore greatly, that lacketh himſelfe reliefe in manie thinges. And ſure, riches is not ſo neceſſarie for an honeſt man that will deale truely in the common wealth, and gouernement, as is ſufficiencie: which being a contentation in it ſelfe, and deſirous of no ſuperfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his buſineſſe in the common wealth, that enioyeth the ſame. For God is he alone, who ſimply and abſolutely hath no neede of any thing at all: wherefore the chiefeſt vertue that can be in man, and that commeth neereſt vnto God, ought to be eſteemed that, which maketh man to haue neede of leaſt things. For like as a luſtie bodie, and well complexioned, hath no neede of ſuperfluous fare and curious apparell: euen ſo a cleane life, and ſound houſe, is kept with a little charge, and ſo ſhould the goods alſo be proportioned, according to vſe and neceſſitie. For hee that gathereth much, and ſpendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no deſire to ſpend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do deſire it, and dare nor for niggardlineſſe ſpend part of that he laboureth for, then is he miſerable. Now would I aske Cato with a goodwill, if riches be made but to vſe them, why do you boaſt then you haue gotten much together, when a litle doth ſuffiſe you? and if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you finde, to drinke of the ſame tappe workemen and labourers do, not to care for purple died gownes, nor for houſes with plaſtered walles: it followeth then that neither Ariſtides, nor Epaminondas, not Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabricius, haue forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vſe nor occupie. For it was to no purpoſe for a man that eſteemed rootes and parſenippes to be one of the beſt diſhes in the worlde, and that did ſeeth them himſelfe in his chimney, whileſt his wife did bake his bread, to talke ſo much of an Aſſe, and to take paines to write by what art and induſtrie a man might quickely enrich himſelfe. For it is true, that ſufficiencie and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is becauſe it taketh from vs all deſire of vnneceſſarie thinges, and maketh vs not to paſſe for them. And therefore we finde that Ariſtides ſaide, when rich Callias caſe was pleaded, that ſuch as were poore againſt their wils, might well be aſhamed of their pouertie: but ſuch as were willingly poore, had good cauſe and might iuſtly reioyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Ariſtides pouertie proceeded of a baſe minde and ſlothfulnes, ſince he might quickly haue made himſelfe rich without any diſhoneſtie at all, by taking only the ſpoile of ſome one of the barbarous people whom he had ouercome, or any one of their tentes. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victorie and battels Cato had wonne, they did in manner litle helpe to increaſe the Empire of ROME: for it was already ſo great, as it could almoſt be no greater. But Ariſtides victories are the greateſt conqueſtes and nobleſt actes that the GRÆCIANS euer did in any warres: as the iourney of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, and the battell of PLATEES. And yet there is no reaſon to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, nor the wals of the citie of SPAINE which Cato ouerthrew and raſed, vnto ſo many thouſandes of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrowen and put to the ſword by the GRECIANS, aſwell by land as by ſea. In all which ſeruices, Ariſtides was the chiefeſt before all other, as touching his valiantnes in fighting: notwithſtanding, he gaue other the glory of it, that deſired it more then himſelfe, as he did eaſily alſo leaue the gold & ſiluer vnto thoſe, that had more neede of it then himſelfe. Wherein he ſhewed himſelfe of a nobler minde, then all they did. Furthermore, for my part, I will not reproue Catoes manner, to commend and extoll himſelfe ſo highly aboue all other, ſince he himſelfe ſayth in an oration he made, that to praiſe himſelfe is as much folly, as alſo to diſpraiſe himſelfe: but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect, that deſireth other ſhould not praiſe him, then he that commonly doth vſe to praiſe himſelfe. For, not to be ambitious, is a great ſhew of humanitie, & neceſſary for him that will liue amongeſt men of gouernement: and euen ſo, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuie vnto him, that is infected withall. Of the which Ariſtides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Ariſtides did helpe Themiſtocles his chiefeſt enemie, in all his nobleſt actes, and did ſerue him (as a man would ſay) like a priuate ſouldier that garded his perſon, when Themiſtocles was generall, being the onely inſtrument and meane of his glorie: which was indeede the onely cauſe that the citie of ATHENS was ſaued, and reſtored againe to her former good ſtate. Cato contrariwiſe, croſſing Scipio in all his enterpriſes, thought to hinder his voyage and iourney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hanniball, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and ſo in the ende, continuing him ſtill in iealouſie with the ſtate, and euer accuſing of him, he neuer left him till he had driuen him out of the citie, and cauſed his brother Lucius Scipio to be ſhamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperance and modeſtie, which Cato did euer commende ſo highly: Ariſtides truely kept them moſt ſincerely. But Catoes ſecond wife, who maried a maide (that was neither fit for his dignitie and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifeſt cauſe. For he can not be excuſed with honeſtie, that being a man paſt mariage, brought his ſonne that was married, and his faire daughter in law, a ſteppe mother into his houſe, and but a clarkes daughter, whoſe father did write for money, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cato maried her to ſatisfie his luſt, or elſe for ſpight to be reuenged of his ſonne, becauſe his ſonne could not abide his young filth he had before: either of theſe turneth ſtill to his ſhame, as well the effect, as alſo the cauſe. Againe, the excuſe he made to his ſonne why he maried, was alſo a lye. For if he had grounded his deſire indeede, to haue gotten either children, as he ſayd, that might be as honeſt men as his eldeſt ſonne: then ſurely he had done well after the death of his firſt wife, if he had ſought him an other wife ſoone after, that had bene of an honeſt houſe, and not to haue lyen with a young harlatry filth, till his ſonne had ſpyed him and then when he ſaw it was knowen, to go and mary her, and to make alliance with him, not becauſe it was honorable for him to do it, but was eaſieſt to be obtained.

ΦΙΛΟΠΟΙΜΗΝ

IN the citie of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caſſander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time whatſoeuer. Notwithſtanding, fortune frowned on him in the end, in ſomuch as he was driuẽ out of this country, and went to lye in the city of MEGALOPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crauſis, Philopæmenes father, a rare mã, and nobly giuen in all things, and one that loued him alſo very well. Now ſo lõg as Crauſis liued, Caſſander was ſo well vſed at his hands, that he could lacke nothing: and when he was departed this world, Caſſander, to requite the loue Crauſis bare him in his life time, tooke his ſonne into his charge, being an orphane, and taught him, as Homer ſayd Achilles was brought vp by the old Phœnix. So this child Philopæmen grew to haue noble conditions, and increaſed alwayes from good to better. Afterwardes, when he came to grow to mans ſtate. Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALOPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernment. They were two Philoſophers that had bene hearers of Arceſilaus, in the ſchoole of Academia, and afterwardes employed all the Philoſophy they had learned, vpon their gouerning of the common wealth, and dealing in matters of ſtate, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they deliuered their city from the tyranny of Ariſtodemus, who kept it in ſubiection, by corrupting thoſe that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus alſo to driue the tyrant Niocles, out of SICYONE. At the requeſt of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with ciuill diſſentiõ & factions amõg them, they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the ſtate of the common wealth, and ſtabliſhed good lawes for them. But for themſelues, they reckened the education and bringing vp of Philopœmen, the chiefeſt acte that euer they did: iudging that they had procured an vniuerſall good vnto all GRECE, to bring vp a man of ſo noble a nature, in the rules and preceptes of Philoſophy. And to ſay truely, GRECE did loue him paſsingly well, as the laſt valiant man ſhe brought foorth in her age, after ſo many great and famous auncient Captaines: and did alwayes increaſe his power and authoritie, as his glory did alſo riſe. Whereupon there was a ROMAINE, who to prayſe him the more, called him the laſt of the GRECIANS: meaning, that after him, GRECE neuer brought ſorth any worthy perſon, deſeruing the name of a GRECIAN. And now concerning his perſon, he had no ill face, as many ſuppoſe he had: for his whole image is yet to be ſeene in the citie of DELPHES, excellently well done, as if he were aliue. And for that they report of his hoſteſſe in the citie of MEGARA, who tooke him for a ſeruing man: that was by reaſon of his curteſie, not ſtanding vpon his reputation, and becauſe he went plainly beſides. For ſhe vnderſtanding that the generall of the ACHAIANS came to Inne there all night, ſhe beſtirred her, and was very buſie preparing for his ſupper, her husband paraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane ſeaſon came Philopœmen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his backe. The ſimple woman ſeeing him no better apparelled, tooke him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and ſo prayed him to lend her his hand in the kitchin. He ſtraight caſt off his cloke, and began to fall to hew wood. So, as Philopœmen was buſie about it, in commeth her husband, and finding him riuing of wood: ha ha ha, ſayd he, my Lord Philopœmen, why what meaneth this? Truely nothing elſe, ſayd he in his DORICAN toung, but that I am puniſhed, becauſe I am neither fayre boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius ſayd one day vnto him, ſeeming to mocke him for his perſonage: O Philopœmen, thou haſt fayre hands, and good legges, but thou haſt no belly, for he was fine in the waſt, and ſmall bodied. Notwithſtanding, I take it this ieſting tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body: becauſe he had both good horſemen, and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. Theſe ieſtes, ſchollers haue taken vp in ſchooles, of Philopœmen. But now to deſcend to his nature and conditions: it ſeemeth that the ambition and deſire he had to winne honoúr in his doings, was not without ſome heate and wilfulneſſe. For, becauſe he would altogether follow Epaminondas ſteps, he ſhewed his hardineſſe to enterpriſe any thing, his wiſedome to execute all great matters, and his integrity alſo, in that no money could corrupt him: but in ciuill matters and controuerſies, he could hardly other whiles keepe himſelfe within the bondes of modeſtie, patience, and curteſie, but would often burſt out into choller, and wilfulneſſe. Wherefore it ſeemeth, that he was a better Captaine for warres, thẽ a wiſe gouernour for peace. And indeede, euen from his youth he euer loued ſouldiers, and armes, and delighted maruellouſly in all martiall exerciſes: as in hãdling of his weapõ well, riding of horſes gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And becauſe he ſeemed to haue a naturall gift in wreſtling, certaine of his friends, and ſuch as were carefull of him, did wiſh him to giue himſelfe moſt vnto that exerciſe. Then he asked them, if their life that made ſuch profeſsion, would be no hinderaunce to their martiall exerciſes. Aunſwere was made him againe, that the diſpoſition of the perſon, and manner of life that wreſtlers vſed, and ſuch as followed like exerciſes, was altogether contrary to the life and diſcipline of a ſouldier, and ſpecially touching life and limme. For wreſtlers ſtudied altogether to keepe themſelues in good plight, by much ſleeping, eating, and drinking, by labouring, and taking their eaſe at certaine houres, by not miſſing a iotte of their exerciſes: and beſides, were in hazard to looſe the force and ſtrength of their body, if they did ſurfet neuer ſo litle, or paſſed their ordinary courſe & rule of diet. Where ſouldiers contrariwiſe are vſed to all chaunge, and diuerſitie of life, and ſpecially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardneſſe, and ſcarſitie, and to watch in the night without ſleepe. Philopœmen hearing this, did not onely forſake thoſe exerciſes, and ſcorned them, but afterwardes being generall of an armie, he ſought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wreſtling, and ſuch kinde of exerciſe, which made mens bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become ſouldiers for to fight in defence of their country, that otherwiſe would haue bene very able and handſome for the ſame. When he firſt left his booke and ſchoolemaſters, and began to weare armour in inuaſions the MANTINEIANS vſed to make vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get ſome ſpoile on a ſodaine, or to deſtroy a part of their coũtry: Philopœmen then would euer be the formoſt to go out, and the hindermoſt to come in. When he had leaſure, he vſed much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his body with toyle and trauell, or elſe he would be digging of his groundes. For he had a fayre manor, not paſsing twenty furlongs out of the citie, whither he would walke commonly after dinner or ſupper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lye vpon ſome illfauored matreſſe, as the meaneſt labourer he had, and in the morning by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine men to labour in his vineyard, or elſe with his plough mẽ to follow the plough, and ſometimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his friends and other officers of the ſame. Whatſoeuer he could ſpare and get in the warres, he ſpent it in buying of goodly horſes, in making of fayre armours, or paying his poore countrymens ranſome, that were taken priſoners in the warres: but for his goods and reuenue, he ſought onely to increaſe them, by the profit of tillage, which he eſteemed the iuſteſt and beſt way of getting of goods. For he did not trifle therein, but employed his whole care and ſtudy vpon it, as one that thought it fit for euery noble man & gentleman ſo to trauell, gouerne, and increaſe his owne, that he ſhould haue no occaſion to couet or vſurpe an other mans. He tooke no pleaſure to heare all kinde of matters, nor to read all ſortes of bookes of Philoſophie: but thoſe onely that would teach him moſt to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to read Homers workes, ſauing thoſe places onely that ſtirred vp mens harts moſt vnto valiantneſſe. But of all other ſtories, he ſpecially delighted to read Euangelus bookes, which treated of the diſcipline of warres, how to ſet battels, and declared the actes and geſtes of Alexander the great, ſaying: that men ſhould euer bring his wordes vnto deedes, vnleſſe men would take them for vaine ſtories, and things ſpoken, but not to profit by. For in his bookes of the feates of warre, and how battels ſhould be ordered, he was not onely contented to ſee them drawen and ſet out, in chartes and mappes: but would alſo put them in execution, in the places themſelues as they were ſet out. And therefore, when the armie marched in order of battell in the field, he would conſider and ſtudie with himſelfe, the ſodaine euents and approches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they comming downe to the valley, or going out of a plaine, were to paſſe a riuer or a ditch, or through ſome ſtraight: alſo when he ſhould ſpread out his army, or elſe gather it narrow: and this he did not onely forecaſt by himſelfe, but would alſo argue the ſame with the Captaines that were about him. For Philopœmen doubtleſſe was one of the odde men of the world, that moſt eſteemed the diſcipline of warre, (and ſometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the moſt large field and moſt fruitefull ground that valiantneſſe could be exerciſed in: ſo that he deſpiſed & cōtemned all that were no ſouldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes king of LACEDÆMON, came one night vpon the ſodaine, and gaue an aſſault to the city of MEGALOPOLIS, ſo luſtely, that he draue backe the watch and got into the market place, and wanne it. Philopœmen hearing of it, ranne immediatly to the reſcue. Neuertheleſſe, though he fought verie valiantly, and did like a noble ſouldier, yet he could not repulſe the enemies, nor driue them out of the citie. But by this meanes he got his citizens leaſure, and ſome time to get them out of the towne to ſaue themſelues, ſtaying thoſe that followed them: and made Cleomenes ſtill waite vpon him, ſo that in the end he had much a do to ſaue himſelfe being the laſt man, and very ſore hurt, & his horſe alſo ſlaine vnder him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being aduertiſed that the MEGALOPOLITANS were gottẽ into the city of MESSINA, ſent vnto them to let them vnderſtãd, that he was ready to deliuer them their citie, lands, & goods again. But Philopœmen ſeeing his coũtreymen very glad of theſe newes, & that euery man prepared to returne againe in haſt: he ſtayd them with theſe perſwaſions, ſhewing them that Cleomenes deuiſe was not to redeliuer thẽ their citie, but rather to take thẽ together with their city: foreſeeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keepe naked walles and emptie houſes, and that himſelfe in the end ſhould be compelled to go his way. This perſwaſion ſtayed the MEGALOPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occaſion to burne and plucke downe a great part of the citie, and to cary away a great ſumme of money and a great ſpoyle. Afterwardes, when king Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIANS againſt Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of the mountaines of Sellaſia, and kept all the paſſages, & wayes vnto them out of all thoſe quarters: king Antigonus ſet his armie in battell hard by him, determining to ſet vpon him, and to driue him thence if he could poſsibly. Philopœmen was at that time amongeſt the horſemẽ with his citizens, who had the ILLYRIANS on the ſide of them, being a great number of footemen & excellent good ſouldiers, which did ſhut in the taile of all the army. So they were commaunded to ſtand ſtill, and to keepe their place, vntill ſuch time as they did ſhew them a redde coate of armes on the top of a pyke, from the other wing of the battell, where the king himſelfe ſtood in perſon. Notwithſtanding this ſtraight cõmaundement, the Captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to ſee if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAIANS contrariwiſe, kept their place and order, as they were commaunded. Euclidas, Cleomenes brother, perceiuing thus their enemies footemen were ſeuered from their horſemen, ſodainly ſent the lighteſt armed ſouldiers & luſtieſt fellowes he had in his bands, to giue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behind, to proue if they could make them turne their faces on them, becauſe they had no horſemen for their garde. This was done, and theſe light armed men did maruellouſly trouble and diſorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopœmen perceiuing, that, and conſidering how theſe light armed men would be eaſily broken and driuen backe, ſince occaſion ſelfe inforced them to it: he went to tell the kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes. But when he ſaw he could not make them vnderſtand it, and that they made no reckening of his reaſons, but tooke him of no skill, becauſe he had not yet attained any credit or eſtimation to be iudged a man, that could inuent or execute any ſtratageme of warre: he went thither himſelfe, and tooke his citizens with him. And at his firſt comming, he ſo troubled theſe light armed men, that he made them flie, and ſlue a number of them. Moreouer, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them giue a luſty charge vpon the enemies, whileſt they were thus troubled and out of order: he left his horſe, and marched a foote vp hill and downe hill, in rough and ſtony wayes, full of ſprings and quauemyres, being heauily armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fighting in this ſort very painfully and vneaſily, he had both his thighes paſt through with a dart, hauing a leather thong on the middeſt of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the fleſh, yet was it a ſtrong blow, for it pearced both thighs through & through, that the iron was ſeene on the other ſide. Then was he ſo combered with this blow, as if he had bene ſhackled with irons on his feete, and knew not what to do: for the leather faſtened in the middeſt of the dart, did greeue him maruellouſly, when they thought to hane pulled the dart out of the place where it entred in, ſo as neuer a man about him durſt ſet his hands to it. Philopœmen on the other ſide, ſeeing the fight terrible on either ſide, and would ſoone be ended: it ſpited him to the guttes, he would ſo fayne haue bene among them. So at the length he made ſuch ſtruggling, putting backe one thigh, and ſetting forward an other, that he knapped the ſtaffe of the dart a ſunder, and made them pull out the two troncheons, the one on this ſide, and the other on the other ſide. Then when he ſaw he was at libertie againe, he tooke his ſword in his hand, and ranne through the middeſt of them that fought, vnto the foremoſt ranckes, to meete with the enemy: ſo that he gaue his men a new courage, and did ſet them on fire with enuie, to follow his valiantneſſe. After the battell was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN Captaines, to proue them: who moued the horſemen to deuide themſelues, and giue the charge, before the ſigne that was commannded. They aunſwered him, that they were forced to do it againſt their willes, becauſe a young MEGALOPOLITAN gentlemã gaue a charge with his company, before the ſigne was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played the part of a wiſe and valiant Captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus teſtimony, gaue great reputatiõ vnto Philopœmen, as we may eaſily imagine. So king Antigonus maruellouſly intreated him he would ſerue with him, and offered him a bande of men at armes, and great entertainement, tainement, if he would go with him. But Philopœmen refuſed his offer, and chiefly, becauſe he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commaunded by any. Notwithſtanding, becauſe he could not be idle, he tooke ſea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there were warres, onely to continue himſelfe in exerciſe thereof. So when he had ſerued a long time with the CRETANS, which were valiant ſouldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of warre, and moreouer were men of a moderate and ſpare dyet: he returned home againe to ACHAIA, with ſo great credit and reputation of euery one, that he was preſently choſen generall of all the horſemen. So when he entred into his charge, he founde many horſemen very ill horſed, vpon litle iades, ſuch as might be gotten cheapeſt, and how they vſed not to go themſelues in perſon to the warres, but did ſend other in their ſtead: and to be ſhort, how they neither had harts, nor experience of the warres, and all becauſe the Generals and Captaines of the people of the ACHAIANS that ſerued before him, did take no heede to thoſe matters, as fearing to offend any, becauſe they had the greateſt authority in their hands, to puniſh or reward whom they thought good. Philopœmen fearing none of all theſe things, would leaue no part of his charge and duety vndone, but went himſelfe in perſon to all the cities, to perſwade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horſed, & well armed, that they might winne honour in the field, be able to defend themſelues, and ouerthrow their enemies. And where perſwaſion could do no good, there he would ſet fynes vpon their heades that ſo refuſed, and did vſe to muſter them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turning, and barriers, and one to fight with an other, and at ſuch times and places ſpecially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the looking on: that in ſhort ſpace he made them very forward, proper, and ready horſemen, whoſe chiefeſt propertie is, to keepe their order and ranckes in the battell. So as when neceſsitie ſerued for the whole company of horſemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or elſe euery man by himſelfe: they were ſo throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe ſet in battell ray, did ſeeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued ſo together, and withall ſo eaſily, and at all times, and ſo oft, as turne they would on the one ſide, or on the other. Now in a great battell the ACHAIANS had with the ÆTOLIANS and the ELIANS, by the riuer of Lariſſus: Demophantus generall of the horſemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to fight with Philopœmen, who alſo made towardes him, and gaue him firſt ſuch a blow with his ſpeare, that he ſtrake him ſtarke dead. When Demophantus fell to the ground, his ſouldiers fled by and by vpon it. This wanne Philopœmen great honour, who gaue no place to the youngeſt men in fighting moſt valiantly with his owne hands: nor to the oldeſt men in wiſedome, for the wiſe leading of his army. In deed the firſt man that made the people of ACHAIA grow in power and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time ACHAIA was of ſmall reckning, becauſe the cities of the ſame ſtood deuided betweene themſelues, and Aratus was the firſt man that made them ioyne together, & ſtabliſhed among them an honeſt ciuill gouernement. Whereby it happened, that as we ſee in brookes and riuers where any litle thing ſtoppeth and falleth to the bottom, which the courſe of the water bringeth downe the ſtreame, there the reſt that followeth doth vſe to ſtay, and go no further: euen ſo in the citie of GRECE that were in hard ſtate, and ſore weakened, by faction one againſt an other, the ACHAIANS were the firſt that ſtayd themſelues, and grew in amitie one with the other, and afterwardes drew on the reſt of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours & confederates. Some by helping and deliuering them from the oppreſſion of tyrants, and winning other alſo by their peaceable gouernement and good concorde: they had a meaning in this wiſe, to bring all the country of PELOPONNESVS into one body and league. Neuertheleſſe, while Aratus liued, they depended moſt vpon the ſtrength & power of the MACEDONIANS: firſt with ſticking vnto king Ptolomie, and then vnto Antigonus, and laſt to P*hilip*, who ruled in manner all the ſtate of GRECE. But when Philopœmen came to gouerne, & to be the chiefeſt man, the ACHAIANS being ſtrōg enough to reſiſt the ſtrongeſt, would march thē no more vnder any other bodies enſigne, nor would ſuffer any more ſtrāuge gouernours or Captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it ſeemed) was ſomwhat too ſoft and cold for the warres, and therefore the moſt things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligēces, & by the kings friendſhips with whom he was great, as we haue at large declared in his life. But Philopœmen being a man of execution, hardy and valiant of perſon, and of very good fortune, in the firſt battell that he euer made, did maruellouſly encreaſe the courage and hartes of the ACHAIANS: becauſe vnder his charge they euer foyled their enemies, and alwayes had the vpper hand ouer them. The firſt thing Philopœmen began withall at his comming, he chaunged the manner of ſetting of their tables, and their faſhion of arming themſelues. For before they caried litle light targettes, which becauſe they were thinne and narrow, did not couer halfe their bodies, and vſed ſpeares farre ſhorter then pykes, by reaſon whereof they were very light, and good to skirmiſh and fight a farre off: but when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then had great vantage of them. As for the order of their battelles, they knew not what it ment, nor to caſt themſelues into a ſnaill or ring, but onely vſed the ſquare battell, nor yet gaue it any ſuch fronte where the pykes of many ranckes might puſh together, and where the ſouldiers might ſtand ſo cloſe, that their targettes ſhould touch one an other, as they do in the ſquadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reaſon whereof, they were ſoone broken, and ouerthrowen. Philopœmen reformed all this, perſwading them to vſe the pyke and ſhield, in ſtead of their litle target, ſpeare, or boreſtaffe, and to put good morrians or burganettes on their heads, corſelettes on their bodies, and good taſſes and greaues to couer their thighes and legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not giuing a foote of ground, as light armed men that runne to and fro in a skirmiſhe. And thus hauing perſwaded and taught the young men to arme themſelues throughly, firſt he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had bene men that could not haue bene ouercome: then he turned all their vaine ſuperfluous charge, into neceſſarie and honeſt expences. But he could not poſsibly bring them altogether from their vaine and riche apparell, they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceede an other: nor from their ſumptuous furniture of houſes, as in beddes, hangings, curious ſeruice at the table, and delicate kinde of diſhes. But to begin to withdraw this deſire in them which they had, to be fine and delicate, in all ſuperfluous and vnneceſſarie things, and to like of things neceſſarie, and profitable: he wiſhed them to looke more nearely to their ordinarie charge about themſelues, taking order as well for their apparell, as alſo for their diet, and to ſpare in them, to come honorably armed to the field, for defence of their country. Thereupon, if you had looked into the goldſmithes ſhoppes, ye ſhould haue ſeene nothing elſe in their handes, but breaking and battering of pottes of gold and ſiluer, to be caſt and molten downe againe, and then gilding of armours and targettes, and ſiluering of bittes. In the ſhew places for the running of horſes, there was mannaging and breaking of young horſes, and young men exerciſing armes. Womens handes alſo were full of morrians and head peeces, whereto they tyed goodly braue plumes of feathers of ſundry colours, and were alſo full of imbrodered arming coates and caſſockes, with curious and very rich works. The ſight of which brauerie did heaue vp their hartes, and made them gallant and liuely: ſo as enuie bred ſtraight in them who ſhould do beſt ſeruice, and no way ſpare for the warres. Indeede, ſumptuouſneſſe and brauerie in other ſightes, doth ſecretly cary mens mindes away, and allure them to ſeeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womaniſh perſons: becauſe this ſweete tickling, and intiſing of the outward ſence that is delighted therewith, doth ſtraight melt and ſoften the ſtrength and courage of the minde. But againe, the ſumptuous coſt beſtowed vpon warlike furniture, doth incourage and make great a noble hart. Euen as Homer ſayth it did Achilles, when his mother brought him new armour and weapons, ſhe had cauſed Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who ſeeing them, could not tarie, but was ſtraight ſet on fire with deſire to occupie them. So when Philopœmen had brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good paſſe, to come thus brauely armed and furniſhed into the field, he began then to exerciſe them continually in armes: wherein they did not onely ſhewe themſelues obedient to him, but did moreouer ſtriue one to excell an other, and to do better then their fellowes. For they liked maruellous well the ordering of the battell he had taught them, becauſe that ſtanding ſo cloſe together as they did, they thought ſurely they could hardly be ouerthrowen. Thus by continuaunce of time, being much vſed to weare their armour, they found them a great deale eaſier and lighter then before, beſides the pleaſure they tooke to ſee their armor ſo braue, and ſo riche : in ſo much as they longed for ſome occaſion to trie them ſtraight vpon their enemies. Now the ACHAIANS at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, who ſought by all deuiſe he could with a great armie, to become chiefe Lorde of all the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the countrie of the MANTINIANS, Philopœmen ſtraight marched towards him with his armie : ſo they met both not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themſelues in order of battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of ſtrangers to ſerue them, beſides the whole force of their countrie : and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his ſtrangers gaue ſuch a luſty charge vpon certaine ſlingers and archers being the forlorne hope whom Philopœmen had caſt off before the battel of the ACHAIANS to begin the skirmiſh, that he ouerthrew them, and made them flie withall. But where he ſhould haue gone on directly againſt the ACHAIANS that were ranged in battell ray, to haue proued if he could haue brokẽ them: he was very buſie, and earneſt ſtill, to follow the chaſe of them that firſt fled, & ſo came hard by the ACHAIANS that ſtood ſtill in their battel, and kept their rancks. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but caſt away. But Philopœmen made as though it had bin nothing, and that he ſet light by it, and ſpying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the ſpur, whom they had ouerthrowne, and ſtraying ſo far from the battell of their footmen, whom they had left naked, and the field open vpon them : he did not make towards them to ſtay them, nor did ſtriue to ſtop them that they ſhould not follow thoſe that fled, but ſuffered them to take their courſe. And when he ſaw that they were gone a good way from their footmen, he made his men marche vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, whoſe ſides were naked, hauing no horſemen to garde them: and ſo did ſet vpon them on the one ſide, & ran ſo haſtily on them to win one of their flancks, that he made them flie, and ſlue withall a great number of them. For it is ſaid, there were foure thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine in the field, becauſe they had no man to leade them. And moreouer, they ſay they did not looke to fight, but ſuppoſed rather they had wonne the field, when they ſaw Machanidas chaſing ſtill thoſe vpon the ſpur, whom he had ouerthrowne. After this Philopœmen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chaſe with his ſtrangers. But by chance there was a great broad ditch betwene them, ſo as both of them rode vpon the bancks ſides of the ſame, a great while together, one againſt another of them : the one ſide ſeeking ſome conuenient place to get ouer and flie, and the other ſide ſeeking meanes to keepe them from ſtarting away. So, to ſee the one before the other in this ſort, it appeared as they had bin wilde beaſts brought to an extreamitie, to defend themſelues by force, from ſo fierce a hunter as Philopœmen was. But whileſt they were ſtriuing thus, the tyrants horſe that was luſty and couragious, and felt the force of his maſters ſpurres pricking in his ſides, that the bloud followed after, did venter to leape the ditche, comming to the bancks ſide, ſtood vpon his hindmoſt legs, and aduaunced forward with his foremoſt feete, to reach to the other ſide. Then Simmias and Polyænus, who were about P*hilopœmen* when he fought, ranne thither ſtraight to keepe him in with their boreſtaues that he ſhould not leape the ditch. But P*hilopœmen* who was there before them, perceiuing that the tyrants horſe by lifting vs his head ſo high, did couer all his maiſters body : forſooke by and by his horſe, and tooke his ſpeare in both his hands, and thruſt at the tyrant with ſo good a will, that he ſlue him in the ditche. In memory whereof, the ACHAIANS that did highly eſteeme this valiant act of his, and his wiſdome alſo in leading of the battell : did ſet vp his image in braſſe, in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme he ſlue the tyrant. They ſay, that at the aſſembly of the cōmon games called Nemea, (which they ſolemnize in honor of Hercules, not far from the citie of ARGOS) and not long after he had wonne this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the ſecond time of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, and being at good leiſure alſo by reaſon of the feaſt : he firſt ſhewed all the GRECIANS that were come thither to ſee the games and paſtimes, his armie ranging in order of battell, and made them ſee how eaſily they remoued their places euery way, as neceſſitie and occaſion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their ranckes, and that with a maruelous force and redineſſe. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the muſitians play,and ſing to their inſtruments,who ſhould win the beſt game,being accompanied with luſty young gentlemen apparrelled in purple cloakes, and in ſkarlet coates & caſſockes they ware vpon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well giuen and diſpoſed: who did greatly honor and reuerence their captaine,and beſides that,ſhewed themſelues inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable battels they had fought, in which they had euer attained the victorie, and gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chance,as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the muſitian,ſinging certaine poems of Timotheus,called the Perſes,fell into theſe verſes.

Hath giuen to you: and therewithall a noble liberty.

When he had ſweetly ſong out aloude theſe noble verſes,paſſingly well made: the whole aſſembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to ſee the games, caſt all their eyes ſtraight vpon Philopœmen, and clapped their hands one to an other for ioy, becauſe of the great hope they had in him, that through him they ſhould ſoone recouer their auncient reputation, and ſo imagined they poſſeſſed already the noble and worthy mindes of their aunceſters. And as young horſe that do alwaies looke to be ridden by their ordinarie riders, if any ſtranger get vp on their backes, do ſtraight waxe ſtrange to be handeled, and make great a do: euen ſo, when the ACHAIANS came to any dangerous battell, their hearts were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopœmen, on whom ſtill they depended and looked. And when they ſaw him euer, the whole armie reioyced, and deſired ſtraight to be at it, they had ſuch confidence in his valiantneſſe and good fortune: and truely not without cauſe. For of all men, their enemies did feare him moſt, and durſt not ſtand before him: becauſe they were afraide to heare his name onely, as it ſeemed by their doings. For Philip king of MACEDON, imagining that if he could finde meanes to diſpatche Philopœmen out of the way, howſoeuer it were, the ACHAIANS would ſtraight take part againe with him: ſent men ſecretly into the city of ARGOS, to kill him by treaſon. Howbeit the practiſe was diſcouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GRECIANS generally, and taken for a cowardly and wicked Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS laid ſiege to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainly to haue wonne it at the firſt aſſault: there roſe a rumor ſodainly amongſt them, that Philopœmen came to aide the city, and was not farre from it with his armie. But it was a falſe report. Notwithſtanding, the BOEOTIANS were ſo ſcared, that for feare they left their ſcaling ladders behinde them, which they had ſet againſt the wals to haue ſcaled the towne, and fled ſtraight to ſaue themſelues. An other time, when Nabis the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, that ſucceeded Machanidas, had taken the city of MESSINA vpon the ſodaine: Philopœmen being then a priuate man, and hauing no charge of ſouldiers, went vnto Lyſippus, general of the ACHAIANS that yere, to perſwade him that he would ſend preſent aide vnto them of MESSINA. Lyſippus told him, it was too late now to go thither, and that it was but a loſt towne, not to be holpen: conſidering the enemies were in it already. Philopœmen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither himſelfe with the force of MESSINA only, not ſtaying for the aſſembly of the MEGALOPOLITANS, that were in counſel about it, to giue him cōmiſſion by voices of the people to take thē with him: but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthieſt of all other to commaund them. Now when he came neere vnto MESSINA, Nabis hearing of his comming, durſt not tary him, though he had his army within the citie, but ſtole out at an other gate, and marched away in all the haſt he could, thinking himſelfe a happy man and he could ſo eſcape his hands, and retire with ſafety, as indeed he did. And thus was MESSINA, by his meanes deliuered from captiuitie. All that we haue written hitherto concerning Philopœmen, falleth out doutleſſe to his great honor and glory: but afterwards he was greatly diſpraiſed for a iorney he made into CRETA, at the requeſt of the GORTYNIANS, who ſent to pray him to be their Captaine, being ſore troubled with wars at that time. Becauſe Philopœmen went then to ſerue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyrant Nabis had greateſt wars with the MEGALOPOLITANS, in their own country: they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flie the warres, or elſe that he ſought honor out of ſeaſon with forreine nations, when his poore citizens the MEGALOPOLITANS were in ſuch diſtreſſe, that their country being loſt & deſtroyed, they were driuen to keep them within their city, and to ſow all their voide groundes and ſtreetes in the ſame with corne, to ſuſtaine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almoſt hard at their towne gates. And the rather, becauſe himſelfe making warres with the CRETANS, and ſeruing ſtrangers beyonde the ſea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occaſion to ſlaunder him that he fled, that he would not tary to fight for defence of his countrie. Againe, there were that ſaid, becauſe the ACHAIANS did chooſe other for their Generall, that he being a priuate man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had maruellouſly intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that could not abide to liue idlely, and that deſired ſpecially aboue all things to ſerue continually in the warres, and to put in practiſe his ſkil and diſcipline in the leading of an armie. The wordes he ſpake one day of king Ptolomie do witneſſe as much. For when there were ſome that praiſed king Ptolomie highly, ſaying that he trained his army well, and that he ſtill continued his perſon in exerciſe of armes: It is not commendable for a king (ſaid he) of his yeares, to delight in training his men to exerciſe armes, but to do ſome act himſelfe in perſon. Well, in the ende, the MEGALOPOLITANS tooke his abſence in ſuch euill part, that they thought it a peece of treaſon, and would needs haue baniſhed him, and put him from the freedome of the citie: had not the ACHAIANS ſent their Generall Ariſtænetus vnto them, who would not ſuffer the ſentence of baniſhment to paſſe againſt him, although otherwiſe there was euer contention betweene them about matters of the commonwealth. Afterwards, Philopœmen perceiuing his countrimen made no more account of him, to ſpight them withall, he made diuerſe ſmall villages and cities rebell againſt them, and taught them to ſay, & to giue it out, that they were not their ſubiects, neither paide them tribute from the beginning: and he made them ſtand to it openly, and maintaine their ſedition againſt the city of MEGALOPOLIS, before the counſell of the ACHAIANS. Theſe things hapned ſhortly after. But whileſt he made wars in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS, he ſhewed not himſelfe a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open wars: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vſe their owne policies, fine deuiſes, and ambuſhes againſt themſelues. And made them know alſo, that all their crafts, were but childiſh ſports as it were: in reſpect of thoſe that were deuiſed, and put in execution, by a wiſe experienced captaine, and ſkilfull to fight a battell. So Philopœmen, hauing wun great fame by his acts done in CRETA, returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, where he foũd, that Philip king of MACEDON had bin ouercome in battell, by T. Q. Flaminius: and that the ACHAIANS ioyning with the ROMAINES, did make war againſt the tyrant Nabis, againſt whom he was made generall immediatly vpon his returne, and gaue him battell by ſea. In the which it ſeemed he fell into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the euent of this battell falling out much worſe with him, then was looked for, in reſpect of his former courage and valiantneſſe. But as for Epaminondas, ſome ſay he returned willingly out of ASIA, & the Iles, without any exploit done, becauſe he wold not haue his countrimen fleſhed with ſpoile by ſea, as fearing leaſt of valiant ſoldiers by land, they wold by litle & litle (as Plato ſaid) become diſſolute mariners by ſea. But Philopœmen contrariwiſe, preſuming on the ſkill he had to ſet the battel in good order by lãd, wold needs take vpon him to do the ſame by ſea. But he was taught to his coſt to know what exerciſe & experience ment, & how ſtrong it maketh them that are practiſed in things. For he loſt not only the battell by ſea, being vnſkilful of that ſeruice: but he cõmitted beſides a fouler error. For he cauſed an old ſhip to be rigged, which had bin very good of ſeruice before, but not occupied in 40 yeares together, and imbarked his countrimen into the ſame, which were all likely to periſh, becauſe the ſhip had diuers leakes, by fault of good calking. This ouerthrow made his enemies deſpiſe him vtterly, perſwading themſelues he was fled for altogether, & had giuen them ſea rome: whereupon they laid ſiege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopœmen being aduertiſed therof, imbarked his men ſodainly, and ſet vpon his enemies ere they wiſt it, or had any thought of his comming: and found them ſtragling vp and downe, without watch or garde, by reaſon of the victorie they had lately wonne. So he landed his men cloſely by night, and went and ſet fire vpon his enemies campe, and burnt it euery whit: and in this feare and hurly burly, ſlue

a great number of them. Shortely after this ſtealing vpon them, the tyrant Nalis alſo ſtole vpon him againe vnwares, as he was to go through a maruellous ill & dangerous way. Which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the firſt, thinking it vnpoſsible for them that they could euer ſcape that danger, conſidering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopœmen bethinking himſelfe, and conſidering the nature & ſcituation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he ſhewed them plainly then, that the chiefeſt point of a good ſouldier, and man of war, was to know how to put an armie in battell, according to the time and ſcituation of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battell a litle, and ſorted it according to the ſcituation of the place, wherein he was compaſſed: and by doing this without trouble or buſineſſe, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in ſuch fierce wiſe, that in a ſhort time he put thē all to flight.

And when he perceiued that they did not flie all in troopes together towards the city, but ſcatteringwiſe, abroade in the fields in euery place: he cauſed the trumpet to ſound the retreate. Then he commaunded the chaſe to be followed no further, for that all the countrie thereabout was full of thick woods and groues, very ill for horſemen: and alſo becauſe there were many brookes, vallies, and quauemires, which they ſhould paſſe ouer, he encamped himſelfe preſently, being yet broade day. And ſo, fearing leaſt his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he ſent a great number of ACHAIANS, and laid them in ambuſh amongſt the brookes and hils neere about it, which made great ſlaughter of Nabis ſouldiers, becauſe they came not altogether in troopes, but ſcatteringly one after an other as they fled, one here, an other there, and ſo fell into their enemies hands, as birds into the fowlers net. Theſe acts made Philopœmen ſingularly beloued of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honour in all their Theaters and common aſſemblies.

Whereat Titus Quintius Flaminius, of nature very ambitious, and couetous of honour: did much repine, and was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Conſul of ROME ſhould haue place and honor amongſt the ACHAIANS, before a meane gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deſerued better of all GRECE, then Philopœmen had: conſidering, how by the only proclamation of an herald, he had reſtored GRECE againe to her ancient liberty, which before his comming was ſubiect vnto king Philip, & vnto the MACEDONIANS.

Afterwards, Titus Quintius made peace with the tyrant Nabis. Nabis was ſhortly after very traiterouſlie ſlaine by the ÆTOLIANS. Wherupon the city of SPARTA grew to a tumult, & Philopœmen ſtraight taking the occaſion, went thither with his armie, & handled the matter ſo wiſely: that partly for loue, and partly by force, he wan the city, and ioyned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he maruellouſly commended and eſteemed of the ACHAIANS for this notable victory, to haue wonne their tribe and communalty ſo famous a city, and of ſo great eſtimation. For the city of SPARTA was no ſmall encreaſe of their power, and being ioyned as a member of ACHAIA. Moreouer he wan by this meanes, the loue & good will of all the honeſt men of LACEDÆMON, of the hope they had to finde him a protector and defender of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis houſe and goods were ſold, as forfited to the ſtate: they reſolued in their counſell to make him a preſent of the money thereof, which amounted to the ſum of ſixe ſcore talents, and ſent Ambaſſadors purpoſely vnto him, to offer it him.

Then Philopœmen ſhewed himſelf plainly to be no counterfeit honeſt man, but a good man indeed. For firſt of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durſt preſume to offer him this money, but euery man was afraide to tell him of it: & euery body that was appointed to do it, made ſome excuſe or other for themſelues. Notwithſtãding, in the end they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar friend, and alſo his hoaſt. And yet the ſame Timolaus when he came vnto MEGALOPOLIS, & was lodged and entertained in Philopœmens houſe, did ſo much reuerence him for his wiſe talke & conuerſation, for his moderate diet, & iuſt dealing with all men: that he ſaw there was no likely poſsibility to corrupt him with money, ſo as he durſt not once open his mouth to ſpeake to him of the preſent he had brought him, but found ſome other occaſion to excuſe the cauſe of his cõming vnto him. And being ſent vnto him again the ſecond time, he did euē as much as at the firſt time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the laſt to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good will the city of SPARTA did beare him. Philopœmen became a glad man to heare it: and when he had heard all he had to ſay to him, he went himſelfe vnto the citie of Sparta. There he declared vnto the counſell, that it was not honeſt men, and their good friends, they ſhould ſeeke to win and corrupt with money, conſidering they might command their vertue vpon any occaſion, without coſt vnto them: but that they ſhould ſeeke to bribe naughty men with money, and ſuch as by ſeditious orations in counſell did mutine, and put a whole citie in vprore: to the end that hauing their mouthes ſtopped with gifts, they ſhould trouble them the leſſe in the commonwealth. For, ſaid he, it is more neceſſarie to ſtop your enemies mouthes, and to ſowe vp their lips from libertie of ſpeaking: then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopœmen againſt all couetouſneſſe of money. Shortly after, the Lacedæmonians beginning to ſtir againe, Diophanes (who was then Generall of the Achaians) being aduertiſed of it, began to prepare to puniſh them. The Lacedæmonians on the other ſide preparing for the warres, did ſet all the country of Peloponneſus in armes. Hereupon Philopœmen ſought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the Romaines, being at warres together at that preſent time, and they both hauing puiſant armies one againſt an other in the middeſt of Grece: it was meete for a good Generall & wiſe gouernor, to haue an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the ſame, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his countrie at that inſtant, but then rather to diſſemble it, & not to ſeeme to heare any fault whatſoeuer they did. Diophanes would not be perſwaded, but entred the territories of Lacedæmon with a great army, and Titus Quintius Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the city of Sparta. Philopœmen was ſo mad with their doings, that he tooke vpon him an enterpriſe not very lawfull, nor altogether iuſt: neuertheleſſe, his attempt proceeded of a noble minde, & great courage. For he got into the citie of Sparta, and being but a priuate perſon, kept out the Generall of the Achaians, and the Conſull of the Romains for entring the citie: & when he had pacified all troubles and ſeditions in the ſame, he deliuered it vp again as it was before, into the hands of the comunalty of the Achaians. Neuertheleſſe, himſelfe being afterwards generall of the Achaians, did compell the Lacedæmonians to receiue thoſe home againe whom they had baniſhed for certaine faults, and did put foure ſcore naturall borne citizens of Sparta vnto death, as Polybius writeth. Or three hundred & fifty, as Ariſtocrates an other hiſtoriographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the wals of the city, and raſed them to the ground, and tooke away the moſt part of their territories, and gaue them to the Megalopolitans. All thoſe whome the tyrants had made free denizens of Sparta, he compelled them to depart the country of Lacedæmon, and forced them to dwell in Achaia, three thouſand only excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all thoſe he ſolde for ſlaues, & with the money he made of them (to ſpight them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the citie of Megalopolis. Yet furthermore, to do the Lacedæmonians all the miſchiefe he could, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their moſt grieuous miſery: he did a moſt cruell and vniuſt act toward them. For he compelled them to leaue the diſcipline and maner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of olde time inſtituted: and made them to follow the maner the Achaians vſed, in liew of their old grounded country cuſtome, becauſe he ſaw they would neuer be humble minded, ſo long as they kept Lycurgus order and inſtitution. Thus were they driuen to put the heads in the choller, by the miſerable miſhap that befell them: and in all deſpight, to ſuffer Philopœmen in this maner to cut a ſander (as it were) the ſinews of their commonwealth. But afterwards they made ſute to the Romaines, that they might be ſuffered to enioy their ancient diſcipline againe, which being graunted them, they ſtraight left the maner of the Achaians, and did ſet vp againe as much as was poſſible (after ſo great miſerie & corruption of their maners) their old ancient cuſtomes and orders of their countrie. Now about the time the wars began in Grece, betwene the Romaines & king Antiochus, Philopœmen was then a priuate man, & without any authority. He ſeeing that king Antiochus lay ſtill in the citie of Chalcis, and did nothing but feaſt and loue, and had maried a young maide farre vnmeete for his years: & perceiuing that his Syrian ſoldiers wandred vp & downe the townes in great diſorder, playing many lewde parts without guide of Captaines, he was very ſory he was not at that time Generall of the Achaians, and tolde the Romaines, that he enuied
